Y most honoured LORDS; The desire to know, and to be knowne, are equally predominant. There is in both a kinde of infinitenesse, which Nature comes short off, and can not fill. Bookes, including matter supernaturall, better satisfie it: They extend Fame as farre as the utmost limit of Time, and Knowledge beyond; being the clearest Oracles to the living, and faith-fullest Heralds to the dead: All other Inuentions are lame. Touching Fame, how barren a shift was be driven to, that was faine to adopt a Pillar? Tombes die like their Tenants, and are buried in their dust whom they burie. Those Liuing Tombes, and Speaking Epitaphs (Children) are neither built when; nor as wee would. Whereas Bookes (the only issue, wherein our Wines cannot defraude vs) though they be often conceald by Time, yet in euery next impression fude a new being, and haue an artificall Immortalitie of their owne, still protecting their Protectors from the murther of Obluion.

Hence I haue extracted a hope, that your Lordships might be pleased to pardon my gratefull and humble presumption, in consecrating my Labours to your Names. The great French Henrie, and the Illustrious Leonardo Donato now Duke of Venice, held their greatnesse no whit lessened by Patronizing the Originall, neither will your Honours bee much blotted by the Translation. Your Names shall shine to

TO THE READER.

INALIE is the Face of Europe; Venice the Eye of Italie. It is not only the Fairest, but the Strongest, and Actiuest part of that Beautifull and Powerfull Nation. In dismembriug of any sensitiue Bodie we may obserue some one limbe to out-lieue all the rest, as if all had bequeathed their Motion to that one, and left it sole Executor of Life. It seemes in the dissolution of the last Monarchie, the Genius of it made transmigration to Venice. In her the Wisedome, Fortitude, Iustice, and Magnanimitie of old Rome doe yet moue and stirre. That which now Vsurps that name is not Rome, but her Carkasse, or rather Sepulcher. All but her Ruines, and the Cause of them, (her Vice) is removed to Venice; of whome I may truly affirme their VVarres haue ingendred the Peace, and their Peace the plentie of all Christendome. Few States haue performed matter more worthie writing than that; few Historians composed lines more worthy reading than this. I meane not for curiositie of stile, but integritie. Not that they had not, but that this Subject needed not Rhetoricall illustration. The nakednesse of Truth is her best Ornament, and Noble actions are eloquent, not only in any Language, but without any, euen in mute Pictures. Touching my Translation, though I haue not, as some that write by Precedent, followed euery letter of my Copie, Copie, nor Ecchoed my Author in euery word, yet I haue not contradicted or denied him in any sense. Touching my stile, I haue not made it so high, but that the lowest vnderstanding may get ouer, nor affected any thing so much, as not to affect. For my chiefe ambition was, that my lines might rather be fit to crowne my Readers braine, than hang in his care, and make him a Man, than a Parrot. To conclude, those bright and translucent judgments which shall shine vpon my worke, will soone dissolue, and cleare any mist of errour that shall arise before them, and so warme and cherish my endeouours, that the second crop may bee more worthie tasting. But those which, like the spies of Ignorance, come on-ly to finde fault, if they lose their labour in mee, perhaps may saue it in themselves, and exercise that censorious humour nearer home.

Fare-well.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECADE OF THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF Venice: From the foundation of the CITTIE.

The Contents of the first Booke of the first DECADE.

In this first Booke is contained the originall of the ancient Venetians, with the fundarie opinions of the Cities foundation. In what place, and by whom it was first of all built in the Marishes. The terrible fire whereby it was consumed at her first rising. Her first Officers vnder the Consularie dignitie. Her ancient reueneue, and new increase thereof. The Tribunes Government who succeeded the Consuls. From whence the Lombards are issued, with their progression in Italie. The confines which this Nation had limited to the Venetians. The Venetians first iourne against the Dalmatians. The ancient opinion concerning their Mariages. The Islanders offer succours to NARSES against the Gothes. The forme of the ancient buildings. The Church of Grada declared Metropolitane. A great inundation ouer all the Venetian Territorie. The daylie increase of the Citie. Dissension betwixt the Prelates of Grada and Aquileia. The Creation of the first Duke. The Venetians surpris Rauenna from the Barbarians. The dangerous Warre betwixt the Heraclians and the Iesulans. Prince VRSVS murdered. The Government of the Master or Colonell of the men at Armes newly erected. And lastly, the retreat of the Heraclians and Iesulans to Medoac.

OR as much as no man doubts, but that the first Venetians were the founders of this Cittie and State, whose Historie we undertake: I haue thought it not vnfit (seeing I perceiue the Historians to disagree about their true originall) before we treat of the beginning of the Cittie, briefly to speake some what of their Antiquitie. Now these first Venetians had not their beginning from Italie: but were issued, as some thinke, from the Venetians of Gaule, who dwelt on the Coastes of the Ocean Sea. And this opinion was not grounded vpon the name only: but because those

those which possessed the Adriaticke Gulphe, were like their neighbours very much addicted to Sea businesse, and they differed from the Gauls in speech only, (as Po-libius saith) and not in manners nor apparrell.

Others, as Titus Livius, doe affirme that they are descended from Paphlagonia. Hee sets downe, how that their Captaine Pilemon being dead at Troy, they came with Antenor into Italie. Cato following him, did thinke that the Venetians were descended from the Troian race. Cornelius Nepos imagines that the Venetians were so named in Italie of the Henetians, which inhabited the towne of Cromna neere to Paphlagonia. There be some that haue written, how that this nation was a neighbour to the Cappadocians, and did make warre vpon the Cimmerians, and came afterwards into the Adriaticke Sea.

Others thinke that they posselt a little towne neere to Amasra, and that they went ouer all the Countrey to meete with the Henetians, as if they had beene no where to bee found. But all of them doe in a manner affirme, that this nation of whom wee speake, did come from Paphlagonia. The which Xenodotus did not only maintaine, but thought that the Cittie of Amisa was the same, which was afterward called Henisa. Howsoever, those which thinke so, bring in for their proofes, the industrious care which both these nations had to breede Horses and Mules: according to the testimony of Homer, who saith,

And from the Henetians come strong Mules.

And albeit this great Poet spake then of those of Asia; Strabo a very diligent obseruer of Antiquitie, maintaines that euen almost in his time the choicest and best Mares came from the Venetians, inhabiting a parcell of the Adriaticke Sea, which were highly esteemed for their singular pace and swiftnesse. These things indeed, and diuers others doe cause me to follow the opinion of those, which say that the Henetians came into Italie with Antenor, and were afterward by the altering of a letter called Venetians. *Antenor*s comming into the Adriaticke Gulphe is not only proued by the Venetians who were his fellowes; but because the place where they first arrived, was called Troy, which name the Burrough hath euer since carried. These men hauing first of all driven away the Euganeans, which inhabited this Countrey, which lies betwixt the Sea and the Alpes, did build the Cittie of Padua. After that, they did in proceesse of time so encrease, as they did not only make themselves masters of that which did belong to the Euganeans (whose power in times past was so great, as it contained, according to the opinion of Cato in his booke of originals, foure and thirtie Citties:) but of diuers places of Brescia and Furlis: which they named Venetian. For what places soeuer they conquered, were afterward called Venice. Some haue confined this Countrey, with the Riuer of Po, and Adda; with the lake of La Garda, in old time called Bene; with the Alpes, and the Adriaticke Sea. Plinie comprehended on the East side thereof Aquileia, and Strabo on the contrary cuts it off.

After this fort did the ancient Venetians extend their Dominion in length and breadth in the pleasantest Countrey of Italie. But the situation of the places, rather then this peoples manner of life, did alwaies procure enuie to the ancient State of the Prouince. For on the one side the ordinary thefts of the Liburnians, and the fearefull and continuall roades of cruell nations on the other, did hinder them from enioying any long rest: so as it oftentimes happened, that by how much their publicke and priuate affaires did seeme to be increased by some relaxation from forraine warres, by so much the more were they miserably ouerthrowne by these sodaine storms and alarmes. This nation, without this, had beene most happy, in regard it wonne by right of warre the goodliest Countrey of Italie for their dwelling: For beside, that it is enuironed on the south side with a most calme circuite of the Sea, which makes it capable to receiue all manner of forraine marchandize: it is moreover watered with most pleasant Riuer, by which, all that comes from the Sea, is easily trans-transported into the midst of the Prouince: It aboundes in Lakes, Pooles and Forreits: the territoric being meruailous fertile in Corne, Wine, Oyle, and in all manner of Fruits. It is stored besides, with goodly Houses in the Countrey, with Townies, Castles, and Citties very much recommended for their situation, and circuit of their walls, whereof we will hereafter make mention in his place.

But let vs now returne to these new inhabitants, who from the time that their affaires grew prosperous, were seldom freed from forraine warres. It would bee too long and tedious a labour, orderly to set downe in so ancient a matter, their paines and traualle, as also it not being my meaning to insist farther on the deedes of the first Venetians.

Now after diuers and sundry roades of the Barbarians, and that by continuall warres the one against the other, from their beginning euen to the time of Attila, their substance had beene continually wasted, and were besides daunted by the fearefull assaults of the Goths: A greater danger than all the rest, did on a sodaine assaile them. The Huns, conducted by Attila sonne to Mandue, with a horrible spoile did cast themselves into the Prouince. This Nation, as saith Paiscus, came from Scythia, and dwelt neere to the Riphean mountains: After a long siege they tooke Aquileia, spoiled and wholly burnt it. They destroyed after the same manner Concorda, Altina, and almost the whole Venetian Territorie.

At the fearefull report of these warres, the Venetians, and the rest of Italie were in alarme long time before: But in this trouble the Venetians were more amazed than any others, as being accustomed euer to endure the first assaults of the Barbarians. It is reported that at the same time great numbers of men left the firme Land, and retired into the Islands where Venice now stands: but at the enemies approach, greater numbers ran thither.

Certaine vnknown Historians who haue written this Historie, haue in such sort ordered the warres of the Huns, as it seemeth that Attila did twice enter Italie, the which none of the most trustie haue noted: but all of them say that neither at the same time, nor yet all together went to dwell in one selfe same place. The same authors doe affirme that diuers of the choicest men of Padua began the retreat, and that vnder their conduct this runaway multitude arriving at the mouth of the Riuer, which was then very deepe (whereby the name of Riuoalto remained to that place) the first foundations of the Cittie were there laid: And that those of the Countrey of Padua who fled, being possessed with the like feare, began to people Chioggia, Malamor, and Albiola. They affirme besides, that diuers of Aquileia withdrew themselves at the same time into the marishes of Grada: But so soone as Attila was gone, they ranne in troopes from the fields along the Sea coasts to the neighbour Islands: That the Aquileians put themselves into Grada, a place neere to the firme land enuironed with water. The runaways of Concorda possessed Caorli, and the Altinoes, sixe small Islands neere together, which they called by the names of the gates of their lost Cittie: Tourcella, Maiorba, Buriana, Muriana, Amiana, and Constantia. This is in a manner all that which those Authors haue left vs in many words of the originall of the Cittie, whom I finde almost to agree in euery point with the rest who haue written the same Historie, except in this, where they are of opinion that the Huns entered twice into Italie. I suppose that this error proceeded from that they did read, that in the time of the Huns they did twice retire themselves from the firme Land to those Islands, and that they would not else haue done so, had not the enemies come vpon them. But wee will hereafter set downe what wee thinke thereof: For from thence in a manner proceeded all the diuersitie in opinions about the originall of the Cittie, so as some affirme it to bee built at one time, some at another.

Diuers doe truly affirme, that the yeare of our Saluation 421, it receiued her first foundations, at the same time when as at the report of the Huns arrivall, all Italie began to be afraid: For then, or certainly a little before, Attila hauing passed the river of Danubie, ouerthrow in battaile Marin the Gouvernor of Hungarie and Macedonia; wherewith being putt vp with pride, he promised to himselfe the entire conquest of the Westerne Empire. Others reiect this opinion as erroneous, and dare affirme that this Cittie was first of all built, about the time that Aquileia, and all the Venetian territorie was destroyed, which hapned, (as it is very credible) certaine yeares after: But nothing hinders vs from beleueing, that at the first motions of this warre, all the noblest and richest persons accompanied with troops of household seruants, began the flight, that by their meanes they began to build in those places first possessed, and that afterward in tract of time, so loone as the enemye was entred Italy, they ranne from all parts in great numbers to those Islands, whereby of necessity, these places were heere and there inhabited, that from thence the diuers opinions of the originall of Venice did proceed. But to avoid all confusion, wee will willingly follow their opinion, which beleuee that the Cittie of Venice was builded before the destruction of Aquileia, the which wee will declare in order how it hapned.

How the originall of Venice hapned.

Who they were that began to flie.

What the places were, whereon Venice is at this day built.

Where the first foundations of the Cittie were laid.

On what day the Cittie of Venice was builded.

The originall of the Cittie of Venice, (as wee haue learned by reading those authors, who haue most faithfully written thereof) hapned almost in this manner: As the feare of the Hunnes war had already possessed the people of Italy, and that the Venetians as the foremost in the danger, were also by meanes thereof greatly moped (for all men beleueed that the Hunnes would come into Italy) then more than barbarous cruelty towards the Christians, was the cause, why the ancient Venetians, which dwelt in those pleasant places neere to the Adriaticke Sea, some of them in their flight seized on the Islands of the Sea next at hand, and others consequently on the rest: And those who began the flight were honorable persons, full of pietie and Religion: I cannot warrant ought, of other places; But it is certaine, that from two most excellent Citties of the Venetians Countrey, Padua, and Aquileia, there ran thither from the beginning great multitudes: so as in this tumult, diuers of Aquileia with their children and richest moueables retired themselves to Grada: diuers of the cheefe of Padua did likewise resort to Rialto.

Those places whereon at this day the Cittie of Venice is seated, were in times past very strait and narrow Islands, and neere to one another, seperated by the pleasant current of riuers, which run turning into the Sea, according to the change of her cbbing and flowing: There was nothing to be seene in these strait places, but Sea-fowle, which came thither from the Sea to seeke shelter, sometime likewise fishermen, (but very seldome) came thither to rest themselves.

Now those of Padua which came to the Rialto (this place is now almost in the midst of the City) were the first, which began to build, and in that place were the first foundations of the new City laid. How religiously the same was done, may be coniectured, because by how much any one did affect true godlinesse and religion, by so much more for feare of the Hunnes, whom he knew to hate the Christians, and to pursue them with more then a barbarous cruelty, he made himselfe head of those who by flight sought a place of safety, fortifying it, the better to preserve themselves. After then they had given thanks to Almighty God, and performed the vowes worthy their piety, and such as was conuenient for such businesse, they began in an happie place to raise the happie walls. Diuers dare affirme, that they began to build in the same place, where at this day the golden Church of Saint Marke doth stand.

All authors doe agree together, that the Cittie received her first foundation on the first and twentieth of March. If we will curiously obserue certaine exquisite workes of nature, which are reported to haue bene done on such a day, it will not bee impertinent to say, that nothing could on that day be vndertaken, which was not admirable, great, perpetual, and surmounting all humane heighth and excellency. The holy Scriptures doe witnesse vnto vs, that on such a day the Almighty created our first Father, & that the Sonne of God a long time after, was conceived in the womb of the most sacred Virgin. The greatnesse of this mysterie is thought to surpasse mans vnderstanding, whereby it is hard, not only to declare it by speech (which can not be done) but to conceiue it in minde. But as we doe religiously beleuee it, wee doe likewise wisely and constantly confesse the diuinity to bee ioyned to the humanity, and the Eternall, incomprehensible, & holy, to be mingled with the corruptible and measurable. And we must not meruaile wherefore this great God did do it, because it behooued it so to be, nor if it were possible to be done, in regard it was his pleasure, for he can do whatsoeuer pleaseth him. But it may be, that some will scoffe heereat, as at a vaine and ridiculous obseruation, and will count it folly to make a difference of daies. Let them thinke what they please: I thinke it auaileth very much, when we begin any thing, to chooseth such a day, wherein nature hath once or twice wrought excellently.

Now albeit that for the peopling of this new Citie, all the most experienced mariners were called thither from all parts, with promise of great reward, to such as could build all manner of Ships: it is neuertheless reported, that they neuer receiued any man of seruile condition, nor a murtherer, or of wicked life: whereby it appeares that those good founders of this Cittie would not haue hir birth defiled by the access of such commers. The which some founders of other very renowned Citties tooke no care of; but haue freely called the most lewd persons, and haue receiued them into their Citie with all freedom and immunity. But those men sought nothing but how to people them, whereas these had regard to the sincerity of their manners, and to their ancient Nobility.

This new Citie did daily encrease both in people and buildings: When as fire, kindled on a suddaine in a Carpenters house, did in a moment consume with continuall burning foure and twenty houses, and because the matter which maintained this fire, was without order scattered heere and there, and that there was no likelihood to quench it by humane strength, all the Cittie betooke themselves to prayers, and so soone as they had made a vow to build a Church to the honor of Saint James, the Towne was preserved from that danger. This Church is at this day to be seene standing in the midst of the Rialto with signes of great antiquity. It is to be supposed that these first buildings, whereof we speake, were very weake and slender, as those which the multitude of the people had rather erected in forme of houses, then for any shew at all: Seeing that diuers had builded houses of moonish substance to serue onely their present needs, being resolved to returne into the firme Land, if the Hunnes had not entred into Italie. As also because that Attila made no halt to come for certaine yeares, diuers did returne to their ancient dwellings. For after the first report of this great warre, Subthor brother to Mandlach, who was chiefe of the enterprize, marched into Germany: where he afterward dying, Attila, who with his brother did succede him, after he had along time runne ouer France, fought a bloudy battaile in the plaines of Tholouise, with Etius the Roman, and Theodoric king of the Gothes, and going thence halfe vanquished, hee went into Hungary; where after he had stayed five yeares to renew his Army, he determined to enter Italy by force. And in the meane time that iourney was not short, nor without great trouble, for in the same hee subdued a part of Illiria, Dalmatia, and Hiltria, so as it is supposed that foure and twentie yeares were expired, from the first alarmes of the Hunnes, and their passage ouer Danubie, vntill the totall ruine of Aquileia. This new Citie in the meane time began to encrease neere to the Rialto, but not very much; yet neuertheless such as it then was, it is certaine that it was gouerned by Consuls, as shall be declared in his place. But so soone as Attila began with his Armes to molest Italie, then did men of all sortes and conditions, runne in heapes from all places to the Islands which were neerest them, with their wiues, children and household. Euery one being enforced by necessity, began to build new houses, and by continuall labour to ioyn one street to another; so as a man would say, that they builded as many new Citties, as there were Islands and Streets. For they seemed in a small circuit to build sundrie Cities, although both in name and effect it was but one. And this is the most common and frequent opinion of the originall of Venice, approued by diuers moderne writers, who affirme this to haue bene after the totall destruction of Aquileia. But diuers other doe thinke the first foundation of the Rialto to be the true originall and beginning of the Citie, seeing that the buildings since then, ought rather to be called encroachments, as made not only during the troubles with the Hunnes; but by little and little during the tumults of the Gothes and Lombards. And although they came at sundry times into those Islands, (as hath bene said :) Yet notwithstanding; because it hapned in the time that the Hunnes were there, that they ranne thither in greater number then before, by reason that their Countrey being taken and burnt, all hope of returne was lost, the common opinion was, that the originall of Venice was after the destruction of Aquileia: albeit that it ought rather to be called an increase than an originall.

But we haue sufficiently spoken of the foundation of the Citie. Let vs now come to discourse to take away all doubts, from whence these new Venetians are descended. I will briefly shew vnto whom their true originall is to be referred. I doe certainly know, that if the question be demanded, diuers, yea almost all men will say that they are Issued from the Paphlagonian Henetians, which came with Antenor by reason of the name: but if we search out the matter from farre, we shall undoubtedly finde, that they least of all came from thence. Antenor was a Troian, so were the Paduans, and all those which followed him, who were in greater number then the Henetians, who being arrived in Italy, did suffer themselves neuertheless to be called Henetians, not that they were either in number or dignity inferior to them, but only because they thought it more honorable to haue the kingly authority to remaine to Antenor, and afterwards vnto his, than the title only, esteeming much more the thing it selfe, then the simple shadow of the name. Those which with Enes came into Latium, did the like, who being victors, did easily endure to be called by the names of those whom they had conquered. Those of Aquileia were afterwards a Colonie of the Latins, and Concordia of the Romans: These being mingled with the ancient Venetians, did possesse Grada and Caorli, at what time as the Huns arrived, they changed their dwellings. It is certaine that in proceesse of time, the inhabitants of these two places went to dwell in the Citie that now is.

This being so, we may much more truly say, that the Venetians are descended from the Troians, from the Latins, and from the Romans; rather then from Paphlagonia, or from the Galles. This is it which we haue gathered together the most succinctly that we could, both of their antiquity, and true extraction. I will now set downe what the state of this new Citie was in the beginning, what were his conditions, his frugality and Religion, after that I haue called to remembrance, that there are some Historians, who referre the originall of the Citie to the yeare of our Saluation foure hundred fifty sixe, among whom is Blondius the Historian, who hath also followed the opinion of those who did thinke the City to be builded after the taking of Aquileia. But we may easily perceiue how much they deceive themselves, because that in the yeare of our Saluation foure hundred fifty like, Aquileia (as some thinke) was besieged by Attila, and they say that the siege lasted no more then three yeares. But grant that it lasted longer, there is no man so ignorant in humane matters, but may perceiue that they began to flie out of Aquileia vpon the report of the Barbarians arrivall, and not after that all was lost, seeing that the same flight would haue finally profited them, and would haue bene to no purpose at all. It is then most certaine that some yeares before the losse of Aquileia, they began the second time to build in the Islands. I will not deny but that the Citie did receive some beginning in the first troubles of the Goths, who were a little before the Hunnes, at such time as the Venetian State (as hath been said) was shaken. But we will cuer hold that Originall of it to be most true, which hapned the yeare of our Saluation foure hundred twenty one.

Now

Now what the ancient State and condition of this City was, may be knowne by many euident proofes, but principally by that, that the first founders thereof were very honest people, noble, and rich. For those ancient Venetians in that change, after they had carried away with them their wives and children, and the richest goods they had, did retire themselves at leisure into the places of most safety: But being hindred by the incursions of the Hunnes all along the Sea-Coasts from tilling the Earth; the poorest amongst them gave themselves to fishing, and to make fish; or else to transport their neighbours Merchandize, esteeming that gaine more honest than to till other mens ground; some of the richer sort gaue themselves to the traffick of forraigne Merchandize, others, keeping their Houses applied their wits to beautifie their Citie with new lawes and customes: and yet neuertheless such was their care of Iustice, and right was so maintained amongst them, as in so great a multitude of people no strife could be perceived.

The first and cheefest thing they gaue themselves to was the care of Religion, and by so much the more, as they perceived any great danger towards from the enemy. The presence of certaine Prelates, did augment in them this common affection to godlinesse, who for feare of the enemy to Christians, had with their Countreimen retired themselves thither. Their helpe came in good time; not only concerning the Ministry of sacred things, but to retaine this City as yet ignorant; in ancient pietie and Religion; from being infected with the poison of the Arrian heresie, seeing that contagion did no lesse ouer-runne the whole Prouince, than the Armes of the Hunnes. After that, they did contend and debate among themselves, not on voluptuous matters, but on pietie and continence. Riches and other things whereof men at this day make so much account, made no distinction amongst the Citizens for honor, but wisdom only. They did not regard mens sumptuous clothing, but their goodnesse, and to such (without seeking for it) did they freely offer their places of honor. In a word, a man would haue imagined that multitude not to haue bene fugitive Citizens, but Philosophers at their quiet studie. And because wee would not haue any man thinke, that wee feigne this matter to embellish our Stories: any one that hath the leisure, may read that which Cassiodorus of Rauenna hath written concerning the ancient state of the Citie: The poore (saith hee) and the rich liue there peaceably together, vnder one selfe-same equality of lawes, without any difference of dwelling, not knowing what enuie meaneth; and ordering their liues in this manner, they elchew the most common vice in the World. I passe ouer the rest of his long letter, which Bonitencius hath inserted in his Commentaries. Such was the beginning of the Citie of Venice, and after such a kind of life, and in such exercises did she spend hir childhood: afterward by hir virtue, it grew, and waxed strong. And because wee haue (as I thinke) amply and sufficiently declared what hath bene the beginning of this great State, we will speake some what of hir first gouernment. For I perceiue that those who haue written the Venetian Historie, doe likewise varie in this. Some of them say that the Common-wealth was first gouerned vnder the Consular dignity, by those who dwelt at Rialto. They doe moreouer affirme that Galieno Fontano, Simion Glauco, and Antonio Caluo (who were then Consuls at Padua at such time as the first foundations of the Citie were laid at Rialto) were the first that in qualitic of Consuls did gouerne the Citie at hir birth: Some thinke that these men were the Authors of the Paduans flight, and that their first arrivall was in that place, and likewise the first buildings. According to others I finde in these mens feedes, Alberto Phalerio, Thomaso Candiano, and Paulo el Conte. The third yeare of the Cities foundation, they created new Consuls for two yeares, Marino Lino, Hugo Fusco, and Luciano Graulo. They say that these men were likewise created at Padua, and sent to Rialto: from whence may be easily gathered, that the Cities foundation was altogether before the coming of Attila. Marco Aurelio, Andrea Clodio, and Albino Moro, were Consuls at the third election for the two yeares following. I doe not finde who succeeded them.

The history of

The true time when the City of Venice was built.

The first
gouernment
under Consuls.

But it is credible that this forme of Gouvernement lasted till Attilus comming: at which time, all Ilands thereabouts being peopled, in stead of Consuls they created Tribunes. All of them in a manner say, that the same hapned a little after Attilus comming, and that about the sixtie yeare of the Cities foundation, the Tribunarie dignitie began in the Ilands, which were already inhabited.

For the Creation of the Tribunes, the butinasse was first of all debated (as the manner is) by a few; after that, it was concluded in a generall assembly of the Ilanders, that every Iland should haue a Tribune, the Magistrate to be yearly, hee should doe Iustice to his fellow Citizens, and punish offences with severity. But that which concerned the generall State of the Commonwealt, was referred to the generall assembly of the Ilanders to be determined of.

That which we haue hitherto said, if it be narrowly obserued, belongs to the Cities originall. We will hereafter begin to speake of her infancy. For diuers Historians greatly delighted in this kind of writing, (in number of whom is Plinius) who haue distinguished the increasing of Cities, according to the severall ages of mans life, Infancie, Childhood, and Youth. Now the Tribunarie Government which neerely followed the originall thereof, shall be rightly termed Infancie. Wee will then set downe in order what passed within and without the Citie, during the same, after that we haue acquainted the Reader, how that in the time of the Lombards (which was during this Infancie) the Citie receiued a meruailous increase. For it hapned, that the Venetians hauing scarce time to breathe after the Warres of the Hunnes, did perceiue on a sodaine, the Lombards (so called by reason of their long Beards) to be entred into Italy, vnder Albinus their eleuenth King, who at their arriual, did possesse and subdue all that which had bene shaken; they did forthwith seale vpon all that which the Venetians held in the firme Land: not daring to assaile them at Sea, because they knew their strength to be great, or else it may bee, they deferred to doe it, till a more conuenient time.

This Nation (as it is reported) came from Scandinavia, an Iland of the German Sea, who hauing often a long time before, enterprised on the Prouince of the Romanes which lies about the Riuer of Danubie, vnder Geodich their King, he being dead, they passed into Hungarie vnder Andemius his succellour: then vnder Albinus, thirtie eight yeares after their arriual in Hungarie, they came furiously into Italy, where their power did so encrease, as they haue commanded there more then two hundred yeares.

At the arriual then of this people, the whole firme Land belonging to the Venetians lost her libertie, with the name of Venice: and the Venetians State which was in the Ilands, was limited from the Cape of Rising (so named at this day) euen to the Marthes of Grada, as witnesseth Paul Deacon, in his Historie of the Lombards. Now seeing we haue begun to speake of the deedes and maners of the Venetians, we will of set purpose omit the residue of this Nations exploiters, except so much as may seeme to belong to our Historie.

I will then declare in order all that which these new Ilanders did in common, during this Infancie, before the comming of the Lombards. The most ancient is (as they say) a happie Voyage which they made at Sea, which gaue beginning to their future Marine Dominion. The Histrians and Dalmatians did disquiet the State of this new Citie, by incursions and robberies, so as the Ilanders could keepe nothing safe from them. I know not whether hatred moued them thereunto, enuying to see so great a power as that was likely to be in time, to encrease so neere them, or else whether it were the ancient disposition of that people, to robbe and spoyle at Sea. Some doe belienae that the same was then done at the intreatie of the Triclines, who more then any other grew very ialous of the prosperitie of this new Citie. Against these, the Venetians with a common consent Armed themselves, and hauing met them in the maine Sea, they brauely defeated them, and by that losse constrained them wholly to abandon the same.

It

It is reported that at this Battell, certaine games were vowed to the honour of the glorious Virgine Marie, but others set downe other occasions of those games, much differing, and more likely to bee true. For they hold that the Countie custome was to betrooth their daughters in the Church; carrying their dowries thither to be publicly seene: It hapned by chance, that whilst they celebrated such a ceremony in S. Peters Church (which stands now in that part of the Citie called the Caltie) the Triclines who had already profest themselves their enemies, came in a night from Sea with two Gallies, and ambushed themselves in certaine places neere vnto the Citie. In the morning about such times as they celebrated the ceremonie, they came into the Church, and caried away the Priest of the place, with a great number of people and much wealth. Pietro Gandiano who then was Duke, thinking it needfull to be diligent to deporate a matter, did forthwith man the Gallies with numbers of men, and all sortes, and followed the enemies, whom they overtook. The Marthes of Marli, as they were parting the spoyle. They easily defeated them, and hauing rescued the Prelate, Citizens, and their goods, hee entered the second day of February, two dayes after his departure, into the Citie as it were in triumph. But because the feast of the Purification of the blessed Virgine hapned vpon that day, it is reported that those games were first ordered for the happy successe of that voyage. But being brought in for deuotion sake, they haue bene since depriued and corrupted by the dissolutenesse of those who succeded: who enuying one another, haue brought in for the adorning of them, an exceeding abundance of Gold and precious stones.

Now these Pirates being driuen from the Sea-coasts next vnto the Citie, and the Venetian name becoming famous and esteemed of all their neighbours, loone after the Eunuch Narfes, Lieutenant to the Emperour Iustinian, but a man valiant and carefull arriued; who being come into Italy in the time of the Gothes, to free it from their bondage, was with the consent of all men succoured by the Venetians. But we are not certaine whether it were with Armour, Victuals, or Ships, which he greatly needed for the passage of the great Armie which hee had brought. For so loone as he had sent twelue thousand Lombards (whom he chiefly trusted) before Aquileia, against the forces of Totila, who was by the commandement of the Barbarian, camped vpon the banks of the Riuer Adice, he resolved to passe along the coast to Raunha by the Adriaticke Sea, which hee could not doe without a great number of hired Ships, in regard all those places were either filled from the Marthes which ranne into the Sea, or else from the mouthes of great Riuer which held the same course. It is most likely, that this journey which otherwise would haue bene most hard and painefull for him, was by the Venetians helpe made easie; who were men that very wel knew the places, and skilful in Sea-matters. It is to be noted how that Narfes, for the great seruices which the Venetians did him in that Warre, did build in that new Citie with the spoyles of the enemies, two Churches; one to the other to the Saints Menez and Germanian, which is right ouer against it in the Market place.

This is that Narfes, who after he had driuen the Gothes forth of Italy, valiantly overcome so many barbarous Nations, and settled peace and quietnesse in the Prouince: being iustly moued with the Letters of the Empreffe Sophia (who at the same time commanded the Easterne Empire, by means of her husbands basenesse) reproaching him with his former condition, and calling him home in derision, to spinne and weaue like an effeminate Eunuch, did sollicite by great promises Albinus King of the Lombards, to march from Hungarie, to trouble the affaires of Italy. The which he had secretly before then, giuen her to vnderstand who had wronged him, saying, That it would come to passe, that he, whom to please his detractors, hee thought fit to be sent home as a woman to carde and spinne, would shortly spinne her such a threed, as neither her proud selfe, nor those who had so freely flattered him him should be euer able to vntwist. And wee must not wonder (as hath bene already said) that Narjes at his comming into Italie, was aided by the Lombards, who at that time had no power in the Prouince: for hee sent for that aide (such as it was) forth of Hungarie. Wee haue briefly heretofore declared, from whence this Nation is descended, because our purpose was from the beginning, not to strae farre from the affaires of Venice.

Now in the time of the Lombards: Paul, Bishop of Aquileia transported all the treasure, reliques, and seruice of his Church to Grada, where in times past the Church of S. Euphemia had bene builded. Pope Pelagius at the request of Helie who succeeded Paul, (or according to Probin following the opinion of some) did, decree, that in the generall assemblie of all the Prelats, the Church of Grada should be Metropolitan of all the Churches in the Venetian cuntry, and of the Citie called Aquileia the new: which some affirme to haue learned, by the most ancient letters pattens of the Citie.

About the same time did diuers prodigies appeare: Armies of fire coloured with blood were seene in the aire; The Earth brought forth a meruailous and incredible abundance of all manner of fruits. There happened besides ouer all the Venetian countries, and almost ouer all Tran-alpine Gaul, so great a deluge of waters on a sodaine, as the Riuer Adice which runnes through the Citie of Verona, being miraculously swelled, did almost couer the highest toppes of S. Zenos Church which stands neere to the Riuer in the Citie. Where it was obserued for a miracle, that albeit the windowes thereof were open, yet this violent flood did not enter into the Church, respecting (as it were) that sacred place. Helie caused a Church to bee built in the honour of the glorious Virgin, called at this day, Barbana.

Then certaine yeares after: Padua being taken and spoiled by the Lombards, the Citie, which daily encreased, was verie much augmented. They gaue the fugitiues that parte of the Citie to dwell in, which is called Embragola, betwix the common Ouens and the Arcenall. It is reported that they built two Churches, which at this day are to be seene at that place; the one neere to the other; to S. Iohn Baptist, the one; and the other to S. Martin. And because the Venetians should haue no time to rest, Fortunatus of Aquileia, strengthened with the Lombards forces, came and stole away all the treasure and ornaments of the Church of Grada, which at that time was the Metropolitan: To the which, being by this losse destitute of a Pastor, Pope Honorius at the request of the Emperour Heraclius appointed first fruits: and gaue it afterwards great store of golde and siluer, to buy vessels and ornaments for diuine seruice, with the Shrine of St. Marie brought from Alexandria. This Pope being tolde in a dreame, that the bodies of St. Hermagoras and Fortunatus were buried in a little field belonging to Alexandra of Aquileia a verie deuout woman: hee transported them to Grada, and did shut them vp there verie religiously in a secret place.

Almost the same time, the Citie of Vderzza was destroyed by Lotharius King of the Lombards. Those who fled from thence, came with their Bishop called Magnus, a man of an holie life, and rested in the territorie of the Iesulans, where they built a Citie which they called Heraclea, in honour of Prince Heraclius; but the Moderns haue called it Villanoua. It is at this day almost ruined to the ground. There are to be seene certaine signes of a verie ancient Church, which those first founders of Heraclea doe say was dedicated to Saint Peter. At the same time also, Paul Bishop of Altina, fearing the Armies of the Lombards, and amazed by the spoile of his neighbours, came with his Reliques and Jewels, being accompanied with a great multitude of people, to Tourcelles.

The Episcopall See of Padua likewise, was by the authoritie of Pope Seuerine translated to Malamoc. Diuers Churches were built neere to Tourcelles by the inhabitants thereof, who were very deuout people: the which Burrough, some write, was called by the inhabitants Constantiaca, by the name of Constantius, sonne to Heraclius; who going to Rome landed there.

But

But the Citie of Heraclea in the meane time being greatly encreased by the concourse of so many people, as the place was not sufficient to contain them; the Shepherds flying from the incursions of the Barbarians, did drue away a great heard of oxen & mares euen to those shoares, who not being able to dwell in Heraclea, they did neere thereunto fortifie a place for themselves, which they named Equiline of the thinge it selfe, as Bonifendus saith. I know that some thinke Equiline to be the same, which is now called Iesulane, but the Authors whom wee follow, make diuers mention of them both, as of two fundrie Cities.

This is that we can learne concerning the ancient Venetians their originall, and encrease of the Citie; which we haue collected with great labour and trauaile. I will now let downe how they created the first Duke. For although this manner of gouernment haue bene at times interrupted, yet notwithstanding it is maintained euen till now, as good and wholesome for the Common-wealth.

The Tribunes of the Islands abusing their office, had so troubled the State by ciuill dissension, as there was some likelihood, that the bodie of this new Citie would be soone dissolved, vnlesse a remedie were applied. Luitprand who with title of Duke commaunded the Prouince of the Carnons, (called now those of Forli) perceiving this discorde, and supposing (as it came to passe) that this Venetian State, might through ciuill diuision be easily ouerthrowne, (the encrease wherof he thought would bee ouer-dangerous for him and his neighbours) did resolute to assaile them; I knowe not vpon what ground. It is certaine that at the same time the Lombards did verie much trouble their Countrie: whereat the Islanders grew angrie, hauing found out the cause; which was their owne dissension, for which their neighbours contemned them, & wherby it would vndoubtedly soon come to passe, without speedy remedy, that the Common-wealth would recceae a notable losse by this enemy, who did daily seeke occasion to disquiet the peace of this new Citie. All men thus complaining: the generall assemblie of all the Islands was published at Heraclea.

Christopher Bishop of Grada held the cheife place there, being accompanied with great numbers of the Clergie: and there after the celebration of diuine seruice, at the first proposition which was made concerning the Common-wealth, euery man beganne to murmure: and some said, That there was no more hope to be had of the Venetian Common-wealth, nor yet of their libertie, which had bene purchased and maintained by their Ancestors with such generositie, vnlesse the furie of the Tribunes might haue an end. That their selfe-same Ancestors had in times past for the sweetnesse of libertie, abandoned their most pleasant Countrie, their houses, and all other matters, which men commonly hold most deare, and were come into barraine Islands, where they found nothing that might inuite them to dwell there. That if they could haue dispensed with their libertie, they might haue remained in all safety in the Cities where they were first borne and brought vp, and with this losse alone, haue liued peaceably vnder the dominion of the Barbarians: But being full of courage, they supposed that they ought not to loose their libertie, but with their liues. Wherefore did diuers of those that were there present, following the example of their Predecessors come into those places the precedent yeares but onely to liue at libertie? To what purpose then was their designs? what profit by their sodaine dislodging? why had they so many buildings, Churches, and so many publicke and priuate houses? why did they leaue the firme land to eschewe bondage, and yet meete it in the midst of the waters by the insolencie of a fesse? Whether it was likely, that this barbarous enemy would take any rest, till he had found some meanes to ruinate this new dwelling place of Libertie? Seeing that Tyrants hate nothing so much, as that name; That vndoubtedly it was his wishe, that all his desire was to see the Venetian State ouerthrowne by ciuill discorde, which he could not by any other meanes shake. Whereupon, those which desired the good and profit of the Common-wealth did resolute sodainly to elect a new Duke

Luitprand Duke of Forlino.

What moued the Venetians to change the gouernment. The generall assemblie held at Heraclea.

Complaint in the assemblie against the Tribunes.

Duke who should represent the whole honour and maiestie of the State, and haue power to assemble the generall Councell, at such time as the important affaires of the Common-wealth should be in question; to choose yearly Tribunes in euery Island, from whence the appeales should come before him: and moreover if any man had obtained any dignitie, Prelatship, or benefice, by the suffrages of the Clergie, or of the people, hee should not enjoy the same without the pleasure of the Duke.

This thus concluded: Paulutio of Heraclea, a man of singular iustice, was by the consent of all men declared Duke; the year (according to some) of the Cities foundation 282. or as others write, 297. and yet as some others affirme 276. They all agree, that the Tribunicarie power did gouerne more, than two hundred and thirtie yeares; But in this first Dukes election, they did not keepe this manner of choosling, as wee see to bee at this day obserued in the creation of Princes, but they then proceeded therein more simply. For, ambition being not as yet crept into so religious a Citie, no bribing for honors, they had not in those elections respect to wealth, nobilitie, and other such like matters, but onely to the vertue of the person: by which means they obtained it, and not by cunning. But although vertue and wisdom was respected aboue any thing, yet neuertheless, because men beleeue that wee can be neuer sure enough of that which is deereest vnto vs, it is reported, that the new Duke was constrained to sweare, well and faithfullly to provide for whatsoeuer should be fit for the honour of the Common-wealth and the Venetian name.

What forme they obserued as the first Dukes election.

Alcague made with Lusprand.

After he had taken his oath, this new Magistrate was honoured with diuers noble signes, whereby that soueraigne dignitie was made more illustrious: and yet for all that I will not affirme, that all the magnificence which at this day the Prince enioyeth was giuen him at the same time: for it is certaine that part of them was giuen him a long time after, and taken from else-where.

Now so soone as this new Duke was fully installed, hee determined to free the Common-wealth from this warre. And the better to effect it, hee entred league with Quisprand. (some say he ouercame him in fight) He extended the limits of Heraclea from the Riuer of Piauo, vnto the little streame called Piaucolle. By his authoritie rather then by force, he brought the Equilines vnder his dominion, (some name the Iesulans for the Equilines, which makes me to beleeue their opinion in some some sort to bee true who thinke Equiline and Iesulan to be one selfe-same place, though different in name) who at the same time had forsaken the Venetians. Those of Tourcelles in the meane space builded a sumptuous Temple to the glorious Virgin, where they placed the bodie of Saint Heliodore of Altina with diuers other Reliques.

These things effected, Paulutio dyed, after hee had reigned twenty yeares and six moneths. Marcello of Heraclea was by the common voyce chosen in his sted. Wee doe not finde in all the time of his gouernment, which lasted nine yeares, any memorable matter to haue hapned. Which in my opinion caused diuers Historians to leaue him out in the Catalogue of the Dukes, naming Horteo Hipates, surnamed Vrsus, next after Paulutio. Howsoeuer, they say that he was a vertuous man, wife, and reasonably well inclined to Armes, though his hap was to dye, after he had gotten more reputation by peace, than by warre.

Rauenna by the Venetians.
The creation of Exarch.

Orteo, whom we say was surnamed Vrsus, succeeded Marcello. The Lombards at the same time tooke Rauenna a verie ancient Citie. The Exarch who commanded therein fled for succour to the Venetians. Pope Gregorie did likewise by letters entreate them to aide the Exarch against those insolent Barbarians. The Venetians, much affecting the Pope, willingly graunted therunto, and comming before Rauenna with a mightie Armie, did forthwith take it, and being taken gaue it to the Exarch. It is reported that the name of this newe Magistrate was instituted at the same time by one named Longinus, whom the Emperour Iustinian sent into Italie in Narjes fled, to commaund with foueraigne authoritie. Prodeus of Vincenza, a valiant man and of great reputation among the Garrison of the Citie, died in that warre. Paulus Diaconus in his Historie of the Lombards sets downe this exploit, & so doth Bonitendus the Secretary, who hath inserted in his Commentaries the Copie of the Popes letters written to the Venetians to the same purpose.

The troubles round about Grada.

The Venetians in the meane time were in tumult round about Grada, because Calistus Bishop of Aquileia, disdaining (as it is thought) that the new Church of Grada should preceed his which was verie ancient, ouer-ran the bounds of Grada. But the Pope commanding to desist, the matter was forthwith ended.

There arose after that, great dissension, which in a manner produced a ciuill warre, greatly disquieting the State neere to Heraclea. It is said, that the Dukes in solency was the certaine cause of this commotion. For the Iesulans not being able any longer to endure his presumptuous pride, armed themselves and ioyned battaile. This proude Duke marched against them, meaning to bring them to reasonable termes, and they fought on either side with more fiercenesse and hatred, than force. At the last after diuers losses on either parte, the Heracleans being wearie of the warres, did on a sodaine turne all their hatred towards the enemies vpon the Duke, as one whom they knew to be the author of all those miseries: who was villainously murdered by his owne Citizens, about the latter end of the eleuenth yeare of his Magistracie.

owne Citizens.

The Heracleans being amazed at the newes of the Dukes death, remooued their dwelling soone after (as it is thought) to Malamoc; no man knows whether it were because they hated those places for the murder committed on the Dukes person, or else for that the same place was too neere the firme Land, and by that meanes more subiect to the ordinarie incursions of the enemies. Some affirme it hapned by reason of the warre which arose betwixt the Heracleans and the Equilins. Those which are more curious alleadge causes wholly different from these, and denie that these places were thus abandoned by and by after the murder. And to speake truly, this first cause seemes too frivolous to make so populous a Citie at an instant to change her dwelling. The troth is, that long after the Dukes murder, during the principalltie of Maurizio and Gionanni his sonne, Heraclea and Equiline were abandoned, as shall be hereafter declared in his place.

Difference arising about the creation of a new Duke.

I will now returne to that wherein the Authors agree among themselves. For Vrsus being slaine, in regard the Islanders could not agree about the creation of a new Duke, and that the Electors voyces did greatly varie, which was neuer scene before then, they concluded to choose no Duke in fixe yvares following, but to establish some new Magistrate, that should haue the whole power and authoritie, whose place should be but for a yeare. Thus it came to passe that the fortieth yeare or thereabouts, from the creation of the first Duke of the Common-wealth, they inuented a new manner of gouernment.

The master or Colonell of the men at Armes Dominico Leon
the first.
Felix Cornicula
the second.
Theodoro the third.
Iuliano Cepari
the fourth.

This new Magistrate set vp in the Dukes place, was called the Master or Colonell of the men at Armes. The first that was appointed to this office by the common consent, was Dominico Leon. Felix Cornicula succeeded him, who (as some say) was chosen at Malamoc. Next followed Theodoro sonne to Duke Vrsus, lately called from exile, who by the consent of euery one, continued the yeare following, but he died before before his time was expired to the great griefe of all men. Iuliano Cepari (or according to others) Hippati succeeded him. Some Authors say, that the Venetians in this mans time tooke Rauenna from the Barbarians. Fabritio Ciani, (some set downe Gionanni for Ciani) enioyed the fifth yeares gouernment, who before the yeares end, was deposed from his office, and had his eyes thrust out by the people. Some haue written, that this yeare the Heracleans and Iesulans fought one against the other with great furie, and that the place of battaile was for a perpetuall memorie called Parco de Canale. Both of them at the last being defeated, the Heracleans, Iesulans, and Equilins fought out new dwellings.

But wee will set downe in the booke following, vpon what occasion the inhabitants departed thence.

sent of the assemblie held at Malamoc, declared Duke of the Common-wealth. This man obtained of Astolpho King of Lombardie, that the bounds of Heraclea should stand for the Venetians in the same termes as they did of old, euen to the Riuer of Piau. Besides, there was an Hauen distant three miles from Chioggia; neere vnto the entrie whereof stood a Castle, stronger by arte then by nature, which the inhabitants thereof called Brundulla. Nothing is now to be seene there, but the ruines of a Tower; all the rest is razed to the ground. Theodato going thither to fortifie it, was surpris'd by Galla his enemie, the thirteenth year of his gouernment, and hauing his eyes put out by his disloyall aduersarie, was miserably deposed by him from his dignitie; the which he hauing purchased by so wicked a deed did enioy at his returne to Malamoc.

Diuers doe affirme that Theodato was suspected to haue affected tyrannie by the new fortification of this Castle: and that by Galla meanes the people made him blind. But Galla being verie dissolute, possessed with all manner of vices, abusing his ill-gotten Principallitie, did iustly receiue his deserued reward. For after that his eyes were likewise put out, hee was banished almost in the beginning of the second year of his gouernment.

Dominico Monegario was forthwith appointed in his place, vnto whom in regard of his violent and furious nature, were yearly Tribunes assigned; to assist him in the gouernment: For they feared that the Common-wealth might receiue some great hurt by his rashnesse, if there were not some in the Councell to counterpoise the violence of his Spirit. But this was to small purpose. For in steed of a bridle and stay, it proued a spur to his depraued humour; causing him to thunder forth all manner of mischiefs. The people then being impatient at his new tyrannie, after they had de-

seuenth Duke of Venice.

This

The first association into the Principallitie.

Conspiracie against the Duke.

What Bonitendius saith concerning the association.

His man hauing well and happily gouerned the Common-wealth for certaine time, and thereby purchased the loue and good will of the people, did obtaine in another assemblie (that which no man euer till then had done) libertie to associate his sonne Giuanni, as Colleague with him in the Principallitie. Some affirme that in these mens dayes those of Heraclea and Equiline retired themselves to Malamoc: and that the cause of their retreat proceeded from the secret hatred of the Dukes against Fortunato Bishop of Grada, about the gouernment of the Common-wealth. This Fortunato had with diuers others conspired against them; but their designes being discovered, he with his complices, for feare of being apprehended, fled for safetie to the Emperour Charles: where hauing accused the Venetians, for that contrarie to the agreement sworne betwixt him and Nicephorus, who commaunded the Easterne Empire, despising the Estate of the Roman Empire, they had shewed themselves affectionate to that of Constantinople: seeing that agreement did expressly import that the Venetians should be free, acknowledging neither of the Empires; This he did in such sort moue Charles, as in the end he did by letters commaund his sonne Pepin, who gouerned the affaires of Italie, to make furious warres vpon the Venetians. Vpon this commaund Pepin forthwith came and assailed the Venetian coast next to the firmeland, where Heraclea and Equiline stood. The inhabitants of those places frighted at the first alarme of this warre, and distrusting the sufficiency of their walles, nothing strong either by arte or nature, fled away in great troopes and retired themselves to Malamoc, and to Rialto.

But it seemeth that the Authors doe greatly differ concerning the destruction of Heraclea, and the troubles of those times. Bonitendius disposeth the affaires of those dayes in such sort, as hee saith, that Prince Mauritio (in whose time Charles King of France had wholly abolished in Italie the power and ancient Kingdome of the Lombards, enemies to the Pope, by reason whereof he was made Emperour) the affaires of the Venetians not being verie safe, neither at home nor abroad, amidst those tumultes of Italie, had drawne in to the gouernment of the Common-wealth, by hauing wisely appealed the quarrels of the Citizens, and brauely defended their frontiers, (rather by sufferance then approbation of the people,) a new and pernicious example, in taking Giuanni his sonne for Colleague in the Principallitie, which fell out vnhappy; not for himselfe who was old, and dyed soone after; but for his sonne which suruiued him, and his sonnes sonne, associated by his father, after the Grand-fires example.

Beauf, in the gouernment, Giuanni did not follow his fathers steps: and that besides his other mischiefs committed in his place, hee sent Mauritio his sonne with a mightie Sea-armie to assaile Giuanni Bishop of Grada, a vertuous man in those dayes: He, not yet the rest, doe not set downe the occasion of this warre. And it is to be supposed that they did expressly conceale it, because there was none at all. For it comes often to passe, that when a wicked man will hurt any one, hee neglects the occasion why. This naughtie sonne hauing obeyed the commaundment of his bad father, and taken this Bishop, threwe him head-long downe from an high Tower.

The cruell death of the Bishop of Grada.

Fortunato the Triestine, who soone after succeeded him, resolving to reuenge the vnworthie death of Giuanni, did secretly practise with certaine chiefe men of the Citie, to depose yong Mauritio, and his father likewise, from the Principallitie, who without occasion at all, had committed so cruell a murder. But the enterprise being discovered, hee with certaine of his adherents withdrew himselfe to Treuifo, among whom were Demetrio Marmani, Foscara de Georges, and Obellerio of Malamoc: who at that time were Tribunes.

Conspiracie against the Duke discovered.

Fortunato departed from Treuifo, and went into France to the Emperour Charles: at whose suite (saith Bonitendius) the Emperour commaunded his sonne Pepin, (who by Pope Adrian was named King of Italie) to make warre vpon the Venetians: and that in the meane time, in hatred of the murderer Mauritio, and his father, it hapned that Obellerio of Malamoc, who (as hath bene said) did follow the Bishop Fortunato to Treuifo, being declared Duke, both the father and sonne, were driuen forth of the Citie; the one being oppressed with olde age, went to Mantua, and the other into France: by meanes whereof, Heraclea, as the place of their birth, was wholly with the places adiacent destroyed. Some say that Iohn was sent by the first Mauritio to assaile Grada, to reuenge the death of Bishop Giuanni slaine in that place; in which charge not bearing himselfe faithfully, It is supposed that Fortunato was displeased with him: Neither is it certainly knowne how long these three commanded one after another. Yet Bonitendius sets it briefly downe thus; That the first Mauritio gouerned three and twenty yeares, accounting nine, wherein his sonne was his Colleague, who after that, commaunded as long alone and after hee had associated the yong Mauritio, they were both expelled the seventh yeare of their association. Some hold that in the time of the first Mauritio, the Church of Oliuolla (called afterwards the quarter of the Castle) was by Pope Adrian erected into an Episcopall See: the Islands of Rialto, Lupria, and Dorse-dura, which were called twinnes, being vnder the iurisdiction thereof. Some doe besides set downe, that at the same time, the Scopares an ancient Family as then in Venice builded the Church of Saint Moses of an excellent structure, according to the Cities abilitie in those dayes, and with goodly presents: And moreover, that Saint Michaels Church, which at this day hath many markes of antiquitie, neere to Brundula, was repaired and enriched by a stranger named Sergius, who hauing a long time bene sicke of an incurable dis ease, was in the night time diuinely warned in a dreame, that if he did visit a Church which was neere to Brundula, he should be healed of his sickness. And because it came to passe according to the prediction, he did sumptuously repaire the same Church, and bestowed on it many rich presents.

The Duke and his sonne expelled the Citie.

Et vs returne to Obellerio, who in his absence being created Duke (as hath bene said) coming to Malamoc, hauing for a time commanded with the peoples great good liking, did affociate his brother Beato for Colleague. This man went to Constantinople to the Emperour Nicephorus, where he was nobly entertained, and honored with certaine markes of the Empire. In the meane time, Valentin his younger brother was by the people giuen to Obellerio for his Colleague. But we finde the Historians so much to varie concerning the occurrences of these times, as wee can hardly iudge which of them best deserues to be followed.

There be others which say, that Obellerio being expulsed by his brother Beato, had recourse to the Emperour Charles, whose daughter he married, promising to the King to betray his countrie, and that the French being fedde with this hope, did sodainly marche against the Venetians; that hauing in a moment seised on all the Sea-frontiers he came to Malamoc, which he found not inhabited, from whence he fought to passe ouer to Rialto by boate, whither hee had heard the Prince and people were retired, but being there beaten by a furious tempest he lost the greatest part of his Armie, and was enforced to retire without doing any thing worthe of note. Touching this and the rest which may easily be refuted, all of them almost doe affirme that Charles was not the chiefe leader of this enterprise, but his sonne Pepin. And the easier to vnderstand how it hapned, we must search the matter from farre, to the end we doe not too much straine from the Venetians. From thence we will continue our historie, where it behoues vs lightly to passe ouer that which diuers haue left in writing in a long and prolix stile more than needed.

The Lombards Kingdome being extinct (as wee haue said) and the affaires of Italie settled by Charles, or Pepin his sonne, who was afterward, installed King: & the Venetians being in the meane time freed by the agreement betwixt Charles and Nicephorus; there hapned strife betwixt the two Empires about Dalmatia. It is reported that by the same agreement (whereof we now speake) it was expressly mentioned, that Dalmatia should be a Prouince of the Grecian Empire. The Romans not well digesting that such a maritime Prouince so neere Italie, should be cut off from their Empire, after they had a long time debated thereon, both sides prepared for warre. But soone after, truce being agreed on betwixt Niceetes, who commaunded in that Prouince for the Greeke Emperour; and Pepin: this Gouvernour who led the French Army against the Venetians.

Pepin King of Italie.

The cause of the warre betwixt the two Empires.

nour returned wth his Sea-armieto Constantinople, and coming backe in time with the same Armie into Dalmatia refreshing himselfe in the same Prouince, hee refused to assaile the townes on the Sea coast (for the truce was already expired) which did obey Pepin. So soone as Pepin had notice of these preparations, he assembled all his French and Italian forces and tooke Comada, rounded on euery side with the Sea and Lakes in forme of an Island: for this place was very commodious to bridle the enemies attempts. Niceetes coming thither soone after, was with great losse of his people brauely repulsed. In this encounter diuers Venetians were slaine and hurt. But it is not knowne whether this Venetian succour which accompanied the Grecian, were sent by the generall consent, or whether the Grecian did hire them. Niceetes being disappointed of his purpose came to Venice. They say that after his arriuall, Obellerio and his brother who then gouerned the Common-wealth sought to make an agreement betwixt Pepin and Nicephorus.

The Venetians power was already so encreased, as the two mightiest Empires of the Earth, did looke vpon them as on a rocke exposed to the sundrie billowes of the Sea. Some in those dayes did thinke that Obellerio during the treaty of peace, did practise some treason against Pepin, (as witnesseth Paulus Liconius in his Historie of the Lombards) by meanes whereof Niceetes and Pepin departed malecontent from Venice, so as the French soon after assailed the Venetians. All those in a manner who haue written the Venetian Historie, doe impute the cause of this warre to Obellerio, who being driuen thence by his brother, that was allyed to France by marriage, and had married the daughter of Charles (as some say) did sollicite the Emperour, or (according to the opinion the crediblest Authors Pepin, to take away the libertie of the Venetians. Blondus who hath written more of the Historie then any of the Modernes, saith that he is of opinion according to Godfrey of Viterbo, that Pepin made warre twice vpon the Venetians, (the first, when Heraclea was ruined, of which exploit wee haue heretofore spoken) and how that at this first time the Venetians were ouercome, and then restored to libertie, vpon condition that they should neuer more haue intelligence with the Greeke Emperour. The which, they not observing, but vnder-hand practising the friend-ship of Nicephorus, by the meanes of certaine Marchants trafficking toward the Propontide on the coaste of the Ponticke Sea: Pepin was aduertised hereof, which caused him forthwith to come & assaile them once againe with the greatest forces hee could gather together, as shall bee hereafter declared, with the issue thereof. But we must first of all refute Blondus, who seemeth in some sort to contradict himselfe when he saith, that they yeelded themselves at such time time as Heraclea was destroyed. If it were so, this had not hapned in the time of Obellerio and his brother, but in that time of Giouanni and Maurizio the younger, seeing that himselfe affirmes in another place, that Heraclea was razed in their time.

Now because all those which haue written the Venetian Historie doe steadfastly denie that the Citie was euer in subiection; the matter could not thus haue come to passe, that through the Patriarch Fortunato his report made to Charles, That the Venetians, contrarie to the agreement sworne betwixt him and Nicephorus, whereby they were declared neutrals, should haue practised by their Agents the friendship of Nicephorus: Pepin was commaunded by his father to assaile them with all his forces: and because he had destroyed Heraclea and Equiline; and thereby greatly weakened their whole power, the common report was that the Venetians with their Duke were subiected. But it is certaine that the Venetians did euer retaine their ancient libertie, and that they were freed from that warre, on condition wholly to forsake the friendship of Nicephorus.

Some strife arising soone after betwixt the two Empires concerning Dalmatia, the Venetians hauing openly taken Nicephorus part (for it is reported that they succoured his Lieutenant Niceetes by Sea and Land) Pepin being then incensed against the Venetians, came and assailed them with greater forces than before.

The French take Comada. The Greeke defeated before Comada.

Obellerio practiseth treason against Pepin.

The opinion of Blondus concerning the wars of the French against the Venetians.

Why the French did assaile the Venetians.

The Venetians haue alwayes kept their ancient libertie.

All Authors morcouer doe agree, that at such time as the French made warre vpon them, Obellerio and his brother Beato were by a ciuill or domestick broile driuen forth of the Citie, and had retired themselves to the enemye, whilſt Valentin their younger brother commanded within the towne. And the better to vnderſtand the ſtate of this fearefull warre, we will in breife ſpeake ſomewhat of the ſituation of the Citie, becauſe that which hath bene ſaid in the precedent booke.

Description of the ſituation of the Citie of Venice.

The Citie of Venice (as hath bene ſaid elſewhere,) ſituate vpon Iſlands verie neere to one another, which the continuall ebbing of the Sea, doth ſeuer in a manner by equall ſpaces, and yet in ſuch manner, as her ſhoares on the South ſide betwixt the Sea & the Lakes, are diuided by the ſpace of fortie thouſand paces into ten waterie channels : and all thoſe ſhoares cut out after the manner of Iſlands, were at that time wholly inhabited. The firſt of them all on the South ſide, were the Brondolians : after them, came the Chioggians, Peleſtrians, Albiolans, thoſe of Malamoc, and of the Catle, where at this day is the Patriarke ſeat. Thoſe within being farther off from the Sea, dwelt in the middeſt of the lakes ; the cheife of whom were thoſe of Rialto, who haue in our time by the great concourſe of people, and by their owne fame, obſcured all the reſt. Pepin hauing oppoſed his Sea-armie againſt that ſide to ſtoppe the incurſions of the enemye, and thereby to take from him all hope of hauing victuals, did with his forces that he had on land, aſſaile the neereſt Iſlands to the firme land ; and hauing in part driuen awaie, and partly ſub-dued the Brondolians, Chioggians, and Peleſtrians, he marched againſt the Albiolans.

The retreats of Valentin, and all the Venetians to Rialto.

This ſiege hauing contrarie to all mens hopes ſtaied him there ſometime, gaue Duke Valentin and thoſe of Malamoc leiſure to retire themſelues to Rialto with their wiues and children, and whatſoeuer ſuch a like feare would ſuffer them to carrie awaie : not only transporting their particular wealth, but ſoueraigne Magiſtrate, and the whole maiſtie of their common wealth, where it hath euer ſince then, made hir abode, with greater felicitie and encreaſe of all things. But this place inuites vs to ſpeake ſome-what of the antiquitie of Malamoc. All thoſe (in a manner) who haue written the Venetian Hiſtorie, do affirme that this Malamoc which is ſcene at this daie, (on the left hand) going to the Citie from Chioggia, neere to the Port bearing the ſame name, is not that ancient one which the firſt Venetians did build, and from whence wee haue ſaid that the inhabitants retired themſelues to Rialto for feare of the French ; but that the ruines of this ancient one are to be ſcene in the middeſt of the Sea. Whereby may be conſidered, how much ground the Sea hath deuoured ſince that time. I dare morcouer affirme, that that place was in the beginning called Medoac, and ſince by the Modernes named Malamoc, by corruption of the language like vnto diuers others.

The Albiolans yeeld.

The Albiolans amazed at the Dukes ſight, and thoſe of Malamoc, fell forthwith to compoſition ; the like did thoſe few people which remained in Malamoc. Theſe being receiued by compoſition ; ſo ſoone as the victorious French man came to the Port of Albiola which at this day is right ouer againſt new Malamoc, and had perceiued (for he did ſee nothing but Sea on the one ſide, and lakes on the other) that he muſt either change his purpoſe, or his manner of warre : it is ſaid that he ſate a certaine time verie melancholie vpon the ſhoare, with his face turned towards the enemye, as though hee were deuiliſh ſome meane to giue end to that warre ; and that at laſt, through the counſell of an old woman (which is not credib^{le}) he made a bridge ouer the water, for his ſoldiers paſſage ouer to Rialto. But concerning the counſell of a ſimple olde woman, it is wholly ridiculous ; as, if an old dotting Crone had knowne better what did belong to a deed of ſo great importance, than ſo manie thouſands of men which followed the French : ſeeing that diuers Italians moſt expert in marine matters, and capable of greater things, were then with him. But admit that all thoſe which were with him were ignorant of that meane : thoſe of Malamoc which were taken priſoners could eaſily haue executed ſuch an enterpriſe.

For

For it is not credible (though ſome ſay it) that there were none in that place, which was in time paſt ſo populous, but one poore old woman.

There be that haue likewiſe affirmed, that they laboured firſt to ouercome them by famine, but that the beſieged hauing with certaine warre-like engins throwne loaves of bread into the enemies camp, the haucie French impatient of more delay, did forthwith ioine and make faſt together diuers hogheads or tunns, head to head, and couering them with boards, made a verie long bridge. Whereupon the Venetians perceiuing it did behooue them to fight, for their libertie, their Churches, and for their owne liues, and their childrens, and for want of ſo doing to vndergoe the yoke of the proud enemye, reſolued to fight courageouſly, intending either to die fighting, or to preſerue their libertie, & to hazard their laſt fortune by that maner of fight, wherein they were moſt exerciſed. Hauing then imbarked themſelues in ſmall light boats apt for fight and ſaile, the winde and tide ſeruing them ; after they had tarried for the ebbe, they came furiously vpon the enemye, who alreadie approached. There began on a ſodaine a bloudie battaile betwixt them, ſuſtained neuertheleſſe by verie different courages : For the French fought, incited with a deſire to ſpoile, and to maintaine their former honour ; But the Venetians, for their wiues, and children, for their publike and particular wealth, and for their libertie, which they held dearer then all the reſt. And becauſe the bridge was weakly built, and continually ſhaken by the waues of the ſea, the enemye being accuſtomed to firme footing, began forthwith to ſtagger. The Venetians on the contrarye, truſting to the lightneſſe of their veſſels, courageouſly aſſailed them behinde, and in flanke. The bridge at the laſt being broken by force, (which ſome thinke hapned by the violence of a tempeſt, which aroſe at the beginning of the fight) there was in a moment a great ſlaughter of the french : the ſword on the one ſide, and the Sea on the other, preſenting death vnto them. The multitude of ſuch as were then ſlaine and drowned, gaue the firſt ground, why that place, by the which men turne from Malamoc to the Rialto, was, for that notable victorie, called afterward Orphano.

The Venetians policie.

The Venetians reſolution.

Different intents of the combatants.

The French vanquiſhed by the Venetians.

The Venetians compared with the Romans.

We haue heard, how the Venetians fought with good ſucceſſe againſt Pepin the ſonne of Charles. We may then, vpon a iuſt ground in ſome things compare the Venetians Common-wealth with that of the Romans, as we will often hereafter doe. For diuers things are to be found, as well in the proſperitie as aduerſitie of both the Common-wealths, much like the one to the other. It is certaine that the proſperous beginnings and encreaſe of both theſe people, were wholly almoſt extinguiſhed by the Barbarians : albeit the Venetians Common-wealth was in ſome ſort more new in the time of her firſt troubles, than was that of the Romans in the time of the Senonians warre. Yet notwithstanding each of them had the French for their enemies. The Romans were aſſailed by the Senonians, a Nation altogether vnknown before the taking of the Citie ; Theſe by the Belgians, no leſſe courageous, but more mightie then the Senonians : becauſe they were, beſides the forces of the Empire, aided by the ſuccors of Italie. The Roman ſtate had incenſed the enemye, becauſe one of her Ambaſſadours had contrarie to the law of Nations iniured a French man ; The Venetian, becauſe, in contempt of the agreement made betwixt Charles and Nicephorus, it had fauoured one of the parties. The Senonians were maſters of all, ſauiug the Capitol. The Belgians left the Venetians nothing but Rialto. And both the one and other deceiued the enemye by caſting loaves of bread. Theſe men defended the Sea banks ; and the other a little hill. Each of them haue valiantly repulſed the French, puffd vp with the pride of his victories and happie ſucceſſe. But the firſt did it voluntarily ; and this by constraint. But the Roman therein deſerued high glorie : in that all her enemies were ſlaine, And the Venetians, in that they defeated ſo mightie a king, aſſiſted aſwell with his owne forces, as with thoſe of his Father and the Empire. The preſeruing of the Capitoll was cauſe of the encreaſe of the Citie, and of the perpetuall eſtabliſhment of the Empire. That of Rialto gaue not only occaſion of the Cities encreaſe, but of eſtabliſhing the Princes reſi-

dence in a more eminent and magnificent place, than either Heraclea or Malamoc. Thus farre extended the Cities infancie. Now followes her youth: during which the Venetians, after they had confirmed their forces, did mightily enlarge the limits of their citate.

Pepin retires to the firme land.

But we will returne to Pepin, who amazed (as they say) at such a losse, did forthwith raise the siege. And after the French had spoyle all the places they went through, he brought backe his Armie. Some say, that Obellerio, and his brother, being authors of so many mischiefs, did willingly banish themselves, and followed the enemy. Others, who make the Emperour Charles the authour of this warre, and not Pepin, doe affirme, that the French after this losse made peace with the Venetian, and came to Rialto; where being honourably entertained, he intreated the people to receiue Obellerio into the Countrey: which the Venetians hauing vnwillingly graunted (as the event witnessed) so soone as Charles was gone, Obellerio was cut in peeces by the people: and his bowels being rent forth of his body, were torne in peeces by some of the multitudes teeth; his wife likewise, who was reported to bee of the royall blood of France, was slaine with him. But neither was Charles the leader of this Armie, nor did this happen which they report. And the common consent of the crediblest Historians, makes me to belecue, that it was Pepin which made warre on the Venetians. But whether it were the one or the other, it is certaine that the Venetians did wholly preferue their libertie, and became open friends to either Empire.

Some report, that Obellerio being slaine, his brother Beato held the Principalltie; and others say, that Obellerio and Beato being expelled, Valentin their younger brother commanded in the Citie. But howsoeuer it was (for it is hard to iudge the right in such diuersitie of opinions) it is certaine that the Gouvernement of these three, lasted not about five yeares. Angelo Partitatio succeeded these three, who was the first that held his seate at Rialto. They gaue him two yearely Tribunes to assist him in all things. Some say he had the surname of Badoairio, from whom the Badoairians are descended. The most curious Historians haue numbred the Partitatio, among the noblest families which came from Heraclea to Rialto. And that which makes me easily easily to beleue it is; because among the most memorable matters acted in his Government, we find the reparation of Heraclea, which by reason thereof was afterward called Villa-noua. And because that in the time of the warre with the French, a great number of people ranne to Rinko, soas the place was filled with an incredible multitude of inhabitants; it came to passe, that threescore small llands next to them were ioyned together by Bridges. But all men did thinke this place; for the great multitude of people, and for the commodiousnesse thereof, worthe; that the Soueraigne Magistrate, and the whole State of the Commonwealth should reside there. And with a good and happie preface for the Duke and the whole Venetian State, it was decreed, That Rialto should euer after bee the Princes seate. According to this conclusion; to the end that the Soueraigne Magistrate should not want a house; the Duke himselfe did forthwith appoint a place, whereon to build the Dukes Pallace, which stands (as we see at this daie) neere to the goodly Church of St. Marke. But we may truly say, that it is only the olde Pallace, which Partitatio did edifie. For the other neighbour-buildings confronting the Senate-house doe represent a newer architecture. For it is not likelie, that in those daies they could tell from whence to haue gotten so manie costlie pillars, and excellent stones: their meanes being then verie small. But whether it were in Partitatio's time, or since (as it is most credible by the report almost of all Annallists) that this worke was built: the excellencie and greatnesse thereof doth deserue, that such a thing should not be buried in silence. But because it would be too tedious a matter to particularize all the singularities of that place, wee will speake onely of the admirable structure thereof.

This place then, as it is appointed to manie and sundrie purposes, hath likewise manie and diuers fronts: whereof that which lookes vpon the West and South, is vnder-propt by two ranks of columns; and that which supporteth the whole buttice of the worke, hath pillars of a strange kinde of stone, rather bigger then long. The Arches are verie sumptuous, made of the same matter and workmanship, embracing vnder the bending of a costlie vault, diuers columns set verie neere together. That ranke which is aboue, is made almost of the same stone and fashion; and because it hath a greater number of Pillars, they are the more slender, and vnderneath enuironed with a verie thicke rewe of other pillars, but farre lesse, so as they doe not onely serue for a staie, but for a meruailous adornment. But as well the vppermost ranke (whereof we now spake) as the lowest, doth make a great gallerie: the most spacious part whereof is almost wholly possessed by the market-place. The remainder of the front, euen to the toppes of the whole Masse, which is of a verie rare stone, red and white, is so high, that it troubleth, as much as it delighteth the eyes of the beholders, being verie richly couered with lead. Aboue the gallerie, there is a part of a verie great Librarie stored with manie Greeke and Latine bookes: the greatest part whereof was giuen by the last Will and Testament of Cardinal Bessarion. The residue, which lookes towards the South, is the Comitia (For I know not how otherwise to terme this place) where euerie eight daies, and sometimes oftner, all the Nobilitie are assembled about the creation of Magistrates. As also I will more freely call that part of the Palace, which lookes towards the East, The Court, whereas the Senate usually doe resort. I vnderstand by the Senate, that which they call the Councell of the Preguays; by whom are handled the most important affaires of the Common-wealth. For the ancient Fathers, the Authors of this State, haue, among other things, borrowed of the Romans, to name those Preguays which debate in the Senate, because they were intreated to deliuer their opinion, concerning that which was spoken by him that held the chieft place in the Senate. But we will speake more amply in another place. We will now retorne to the government of Partitatio, who hauing two sonnes, he sent the one named Iustiniano to Leo Emperour of Greece, by whom he was liberally entertained, and greatly honoured and praised; and in the mean time, heooke the other, named Giovanni, for Heraclea after it was repaired, was named Villa-noua.

The Dukes Pallace in Rialto.

Description of the Dukes Pallace.

A verie excellent Librarie within the Princes Palace.

wherefore they are called Preguays.

Iustiniano the Dukes sonne sent to Constantinople.

for his Collegue, whereat Iustiniano at his returne was in such sort moued, as he obstinately refused to come and see his Father: But the olde man being extremely desirous to see his sonne, after he had depofed Giuanni, who refused to obaie his Father (had not the people constrained him therunto) did associate Iustiniano, and his nephew Angelo sonne to Iustiniano: the people did confine Giuanni that was depofed, to Constantinople. Some faie that hee went of his owne accord, to Pergamus to the Emperour Leon, from whence, returning, he did, by his Fathers commandement, take his wife and children and went to Constantinople.

About the same time, the Emperour Leon gaue Partitatio the bodie of Saint Zacharie, and part of the garments of our Sauour Iesus Christ, and of the glorious Virgin: with a peece of the holie Crosse, which he religiously lockt vp in Saint Zacharies Church which he had built. He did moreover translate the Monkes of the Conuent of Saint Seruolo at the entreatie of the Abbot, into Saint Hilaries Church, which stood then in the farthest part of the Rialto. And they which now knowe those places, doe at this day shewe the ruines thereof in the firme Land. Hee built likewise at the same time two Churches in the Islands, in those daies called the Twimes, one to Saint Senerus, and the other to Saint Lawrence. Not long after, his sonne Vitus made a Monasterie of Nunnes of Saint Lawrence his Church. I finde in some Authors, that he did likewise build, to the honour of the Prince of the Apollies, the Church of Oliuolo, which stands in that part of the towne which at this day is called the Castle; and that at the dedication thereof, the relicks of Saint Sergius and Bacchus were brought thither.

About the same time likewise, diuers of the chiefest of the Citie conspired against these Princes. Giuanni Taronico, and Bono Bragadino chiefe of the conspiracie were put death. Monetario, one of the complices of this bad deligne, saved himselfe by flight; but all his goods were confiscate. Some Authors doe likewise affirme, that, vnder this Princes gouernment, Viric Bishop of Aquileia, accompanied with certaine of the chiefe of Friuli were vanquished by the Venetians in a fight at Sea. This Viric was a little before condemned for an Hereticke by Pope Alexander. This man for despight that the Church of Grada was preferred before his of Aquileia, being assailed by troopes of the Forlani, came on a sodaine, and assailed the Bishop of the Island. The Venetians Fleete came as sodainly to his reskew; who hauing drawne the enemy to fight, did easily breake and defeate him, and tooke Viric, with diuers other Gentlemen, prisoners. Then the victorious Venetian pursuing this scattered troope euen to the firme Land, did put all the Sea-coast of the Forlani (called at this day the Friuli) to fire and sword, and destroyed likewise certaine towns by their sodaine incurfions. Diuers that escaped from the battaile, not knowing the waies, after they had strayed a long time through the marishes of Caorli, fell at last into the hands of the victors. The Venetians to purchase the name of meeke and gentle, did set Viric and all the rest of the prisoners at libertie: on condition that they should send yearly to Venice, on the same day that the victorie was obtained, twelue wild Boares, (with as many loaves of one size) which, with a Bull, should be killed before the generall assemblie: And they should belide, ouerthrow with their Pikes Castles of wood. All this is yet at this day obserued with great preparation, as yearly sports, in the market place, on the sameday as the battell was fought.

This is that which hapned as well at home, as abroad, during the gouernment of Angelo Partitatio; who after that he had transported the Ducall state to Rialto, did there beginne his gouernment with better augurie, than did in times past Paulutio at Heraclea, or Theodato since that at Malamoc. For since the limits of the State were mightily enlarged, the whole honour and maiestie of the Common-wealth hath there remained, as in a settled and sure place.

¶ Iustiniano

¶ IUSTINIANO, the 11. Duke of Venice.

Iustiniano after his fathers death gouerned the Commonwealt alone. Soone after, he perswaded the State to send to Michael the Easterne Emperour (for the perpetuall conseruation of their friendship with the Grecian Empire) certaine armed shippes to aide him against the Saracens, who at that time did ouer-runne most of the Islands of Europe, and chiefly Sicilie: but not meeting the enemy, they soone returned to the Citie.

And because we haue spoken of the Saracens, it shall not be impertinent to saie somewhat of the originall of the name. For it was then verie new; and brought in according to the opinion of some, in the daies of Mohomet: who in his detestable Sermons, whereby he hath almost diuerted the whole East from the true light, folding them vp in such darkenesse as they could neuer since free themselves off, was wont to call all those Saracens, (by the name of Sara, Abrahams lawfull wife) who had embraced his sect; as if those, which followed his Doctrine, had beene by a Diuine oracle the onely lawfull successors, and heires of the Diuine promise. I will not likewise denie, but that this name may be deriued from Sarraca, a Citie in Arabia Foelix: But all Historians doe in a manner hold the first opinion for true. This Nation hath made manie and diuers Roades into Affricke and Europe, and manie likewise into Asia, but they haue bene ouerthrowne and defeated, as well by the French Armies, as by those of the Venetians. Let vs now returne to the Venetians affaires, which of themselves succeeding happily in those daies, did afterwards receiue a great encrease, by the bodie of S. Marke, brought to them from Alexandria after this manner.

The king of that Countrie caused a magnificent Palace to be built, and for the erecting thereof, had commaunded to take all the faire and rarest stones from the ancient Churches and other buildings, as wel publike as priuate; and S. Markes Church in Alexandria being built of the same matter, it was thought that it would not be spared: the which Stauracius the Monke, and Theodore the Priest, both Grecians, fearing, who did not only celebrate Diuine Service there, but as Sextens did heedfully keepe that sacred place, were in great care. But it luckily came to passe that Bono of Malamoc and Russico of Tourcelles arrived there, being driuen by tempest into that place, contrarie to the publike appointment, with ten shippes. These men comming for deuotion sake into the said Church, and perceiving the sorrowfulness of those two, enquired the occasion of their sadnesse; and vnderstanding that it proceeded from feare, least the Church should bee destroyed, they assayed to winne them by many goodly promises, assuring them that if they would deliuer vnto them the body of S. Marke, that both of them should be greatly honoured of the Venetians. At the first they reiected this demand, as holding it a sacrilegious matter to remove the holy bodie out of his place. But it came to passe by the diuine prouidence, that whilst they were talking about the matter, some of those who had comission from the king to seeke such stones, came into the Church, & caused diuers stones which were fit for the building of the new-begun Pallace to be taken thence, greatly thereby disfiguring the Church. These two Sextens being incensed hereat, and vehemently vrged by the Venetians to cōdescend to their request, seeing some likelihood of the Churches ruine, did consent to their demand. But to the end that the Town-men (who were much addicted to the name of the Saint, & to the holy place, in regard of the many miracles there wrought) should not on a sodaine perceiue any thing, they did vnrip the cloth behind, wherein the holy body was wrapped, not meddling with the scales which were on the forepart thereof, & did put the bodie of S. Claudina into the sheet, instead of that which they had taken awaie. It is reported that at the same time there came such a pleasant sweete smell forth of the Church, as euerie one ranne to taste it. And the matter had easily bene discovered, if they had not perceived the fore-part of the cloth and the scales to be whole. And because they certainly knew that they could not, without great danger, beare the stolen body to their ships, they be thought themselves of a new subtilie inuention to deceiue the people: The which I would scarce credit, were it not, that the continuall course of the storie is painted with admirable arte in the sumptuous Church of Saint Marke.

Now to eschew the brauadoes which that Nation did daily vse to strangers, to discouer matters, they did put that holie burthen into a basket, and couered it with hearbes; then they threw swines flesh vpon it, which that Nation according to their ancient custome did extremely abhorre: from whence came this prouerb spoken by Augustus, That hee had rather bee Herods swine than his sonne. Those then which were appointed to carrie it awaie, being formerly instructed what to do, cried aloud when they met any in the streetes, Ganser, which signifieth in the Barbarian language, swine, and in this manner they brought it to their shippes; and the bodie being wrapped vp in the sailes, and tied to the shroudes, they hung it on the mast, as determining precisely to depart, fearing least that pretious theft should be perceived by those who had charge to visit the shippes before the Marchants departure. At the last hoisting Ankers, they departed with great ioy: But it is reported that as they were in the maine Sea, they were tossed by an horrible tempest; and that then Saint Marke appeared to Bono of Mamaluc, and willed him presently to strike saile, lest the shippes, driuen by force of the windes vpon the rocks neere at hand, should happen to perish: which being sodainly done, they were by this Diuine oracle preferred from danger.

The matter being diuulged at Venice before their arriual, caused a meruailous ioy ouer all the whole Citie; euerie man declaring that the presence of that holie bodie, would make the name and State of Venice to be perpetuall; That the prophetic, which was deliuered from the Father to the Sonne, was accomplished: That in times past before the Foundation of the Citie, Saint Marke in his life-time going towards Aquileia, his shippe arriuing in those Islands, it was reuealed vnto him in his sleepe, that his bones should one day rest in those places which he saw so desert and vninhabited. Amidest this ioye there was nothing heard but songs and daunces, with vowes, and praiers, that in all time of neede it would please him to come and visit his Citizens, and to suffer his bodie to rest for euer in that place, which the Common-wealth would afterward dedicate vnto him. And in this manner the whole people of all sortes, sex, and age, came to meete it at the Port of the Oliuollo: the Clergie going before, singing Hymnes and praises to God; where the Citie receiued with all reuerence, in the midst of an infinite number of sweete odors, an assured pledge of her future greatnesse: Which being receiued was carried into the Chappell of the Pallace.

Duke CANDIANO was murdered by the people for his ouer-much pride, and for being suspected to haue affected Tyrannie.

IN this fort did the Citie daily encrease, and it was not onely augmented in strength, but in Religion, and by this happy successe did the gouernment of Iustiniano flourish. But by how much it was happier, by so much shorter was it. Such is the ordinarie custome of humane affaires, as they cannot long continue in happinesse. For soone after that he had laid St. Marks bodie in the Chapell of the Castle, and made himselfe the Hoste of so great a Sanctitie, he dyed. Hee was ordained by his will, that his heires should build a greater Church to Saint Marke. Hee did moreover enrich by the same will the Churches of S. Zacharie and Siluie with manie great reuenues.

¶ GIOVANNI PARTITIATIO
the twelfth Duke of Venice.

Giovanni Partitatio brother to Iustiniano (who being called home from Grece was made his Colleague) being declared Prince, began his publicke government by Diuine actions; and appointed for the same purpose the neereſt Church to the Palace into the which (being dedicated according to the ancient manner) the bodie of the holie Euangelist was brought; and from among the Clergie certaine Priests were choſen to celebrate Diuine Service there, vnto whom was giuen a chiefe Officer, at this day called the Deane. This building was at that time of a meane ſtature, nothing like to that rich and greatneſſe wherewith it is at this daie adorned. But we will ſpeake of the excellencie of this Church in a more conuenient place. The Common-wealth made a league with the Narentines, a Nation which vsed to ſcoure and robbe the neighbour Seas. But the ſame being ſoone after broken, the Barbarians ſurpriſed certaine Venetian Merchants at the Sea, and ſlue them, comming homewards from Apulia. It is ſaid that about the ſame time, Prince Obellerio, who, according to the opinion of ſome Annaliſts, did (as hath bene ſaid in the precedent Booke) voluntarily abſent and banniſh himſelfe, came into the Iſle of Curtia, vulgarly called at this day Veggia, reſolving to ſtirre vp new troubles for his reentrie into the government. Partitatio did forthwith arme a mightie Fleet, and went to meete him, before he had time to attempt any thing, and at his firſt arriuall ſurpriſed him. In the meane time diuers of Malamoc, incited by their ancient loue towards Obellerio (who being of their Citie had bene their Prince) did flie forth of the Towne. Giovanni being heereat moued did ſodainely breake vp his campe; and being with his armie returned to Venice, came in hatred of thoſe which were fled, tooke Malamoc, and burnt it. Then hauing taken new forces, he returned with all ſpeed to Veggia which being taken, he cauſed Obellerio his head to be ſtricken off.

Againſt him (thus brought in by himſelfe into the government) aroſe a companie of the chiefe Citizens, whoſe names were, Baſilio Traſimondo, Giovanni Marturio, and Dominico Orſianico. Theſe men were followed by thirtie other gentlemen, who from the beginning did miſlike of Duke Giovanni his banniſhment. They aſſailed Carroſio, tooke him, put out his eyes, and afterward banniſhed him: They ſlue moreover Theodoſto Cyni, Marini Patritio, *Dominico Alane-

The government of the Common-wealth was in the meane time committed to Vitus Biſhop of Oſiuollo, Baſilio Traſimondo, and Giovanni Marturio, vntill Giovanni were returned out of France: who being come home, they willingly reſtored it vnto him. This man hauing in proces of time much to doe to appeaſe many ſecret hatreds againſt thoſe of the familie of Machiſchi, being at that time one of the chiefeſt of Venice, was on a day ſurpriſed by the contrarie faction neere to S. Peters Church, whither he went to heare Diuine Service: and being deſpoiled of the ornaments of ſoueraigne dignitie, ſo ſoone as they had cut the haire of his beard and head, they confined him to Grada in the 108. yeare of his government; where entring into holie orders, he died ſoone after.

13. Duke of Venice.

Piero Tradonico was choſen in his place. He was borne at Pola, and being driuen out of Equiline in the time of the French-mens warres, came to Rialto. Pola is an ancient Citie in the confines of Italie, and built (as Callimachus ſaith) in a gulph of the Sea, in forme of an Hauens mouth, by the Colchians ſent to purſue Medea. Tradonico tooke his ſonne Giovanni for Colleague. He cauſed a Church to be built in the honor of Saint Paul, the Apoſtle of the Gentils, as coſtly as the Cities meanes in thoſe daies would permit, and in that place, where it is at this daie to be ſcene, with ſignes of great antiquitie. It is ſaid that he made ſome attempts on their enemies the Narentines, but not with great ſucceſſe. Others ſaie that he ſent his ſonne againſt them at times, who fought with the Sea-Pyrats with better fortune than his Father.

The Ambaſſadors of thoſe of Verona, came at the ſame time to Venice, to craue helpe againſt the inhabitants of the Lake of Benac: whom it was to bee thought they could not overcome without forraigne aide. Some write that thoſe of the Lake craued this aide. The moſt curious Authors neuertheleſſe doe affirme, that it was thoſe of Verona: who hauing by the aduice of the Venetians furniſhed the Lake with ſhippes of warre, did the more eaſily overcome their enemies: For which they did not only thank the Venetians, but ſent them rich and coſtly preſents to Venice. Others ſaie (for there is nothing wherein the Authors doe not almoſt diſagree) that after that loſſe received on the Sea of Crotona (whereof we will heereafter make mention) the Venetians did ſuccour the Veronois: the which is ſcarce credible. For there is no Nation, how warlike ſoever, but would haue bene daunted after ſo great an overthrow.

The Citie of Crotona.

In this state stood the affaires of the Venetians, beeing more prosperous within the Citie, and the places neere to the firme Land, than abroad, when Theodosius of Constantinople, Generall of the Sea-armie of Nicholas the Greeke Emperour, against the Moores, arrived at Venice, where he laboured with Tradonico, to haue the Venetians to send forth a mighty armie against the Barbarians, which spoiled the coasts of Apulia.

They freely granted his request in honour of the Emperour, and they armed threecore Gallies against the Moores. In regard whereof Theodosius intituled Tradonico, Protol-pater of the Grecian Empire, which dignitie was next to the Emperours.

Saba the Captaine of the Moores, (for it will not bee impertinent briefly to speake somewhat of the incursions of this Nation, who are reported to be descended from Mauritania) at his arrival in Italie took the Sea-port in Tuscany, now called Cittia Vecchia, others terme it Centocchie by the name of a Towne neere thereunto, which the Emperour Adrian did very sumptuously build (as witnesseth Plinie in his Epistles.) I dare affirme these men to be the ancient Pirgues, the which the name of their Citie doth seeme to shew which is called Vecchia; and I would call it the Haven of Pirgues, were it not, that hard by as yee goe to Ostia, there is a place, which the Inhabitants call Pirgues at this day. Now Saba having landed his men in that place, and left a sufficient Garrison for the Guard of his Ships, marched with his Armie to Rome: who, after hee had first of all taken the Vatican, and spoiled the most renowned Church of the world, dedicated to the Prince of the Apostles, did besiege the Citie. But having intelligence of Guido's coming, whom Pope Gregorie the fourth had called out of France for the Cities safetie, he did on a sodaine dislodge thence, and tooke his journey betwixt Via Appia, and Via Latina, putting all the Suburbs to fire and sword, not sparing the noble Church of S. Paul two miles distant from the Citie.

The Barbarian turned towards Via Latina, and being come to the Forrest of Cassina, he tooke by force the Citie which stood therein, spoyling and ruining it. The new Citie which was since then builded there, is at this day called Saint Germans. There is also hard by the same place a very famous Monasterie, renowned for the ancient Religion and wealth thereof. This did the Barbarians likewise take, and burnt the greatest part of it. Marching from thence along the Riuer Liris (called Garillano at this day) they ranne to Sea-ward, like a storme falling from the Mountains, and driven by the force of the winds, into the neighbour plaines; they put all places by which they passed to fire and sword; and after they had flust their Ships (which they had sent for to Tuscany) with rich spoiles, they departed into Mauritania. It was not long ere they returned againe: For being puffd vp with the fortunate successe of their former voyage, & promising better fortune to themselves, they left their countrie and returned into Italie: where they tumultuously assailed, at one selfe-same time in a manner, the Citie of Tarentum, and Sicilie.

Now seeing it was to be feared, that the Moores would spoile all the Sea coasts, Theodosius distrustful the forces which he brought from Greece, had recourse (as hath already beene said) to the Venetians succors, the which being easily obtained, he marched against the Barbarians. In the meane time, so soone as Saba understood the enemies coming he raised his siege from before Tarentum, & sodainly retired with his armie into the freights of the Sea neer to Crotona. It is not known whether he did it for feare, or whether it were most available for his purpose to decieve the enemy vnder colour of flight, to contraine him thereby to make some rash attempt. Crotona is situated on the Sea of Tarentum, a verie ancient Citie, builded in times past by the Greekes, following Apollos Oracle vnder Nicellus their Captaine; and in times past so mighty, as the Crotonians had an Armie of an hundred and thirtie thousand fighting men, at such time as they were vanquished by the Locrians neere to the Riuer Sagra. They were great warriors, and very expert expert in a wrassling. But Pythagoras of Samos, and Milo his disciple, were the chiefe ornaments of that Citie; the one for being a Citizen of the same, and the best wrestler of his time; and the other for his skill in Philosophie.

In this place (for the Greeke and Venetian Fleet was there arrived) after certaine vsuall light skirmishes, at last they came to strokes with the whole forces of either side. The Greekes being broken and defeated, the whole strength of the Moores lighted on the Venetians: But they being extremely busied in the fight neuer perceived the flight of their fellows, vntill they found themselves environed on euery side by the Barbarians: and by this meanes did the Venetian Gallies sustaine the force of the furious enemy. But the great multitude of the Moores preuailing they were either sunke or taken. Those Venetians which were left alive, were taken by the enemy; the rest, were either slaine in the fight, or drowned. Some write that the battaile of Crotona was before the Moores besieged Rome, (among whome is Bonitendus) The Barbarians proude of this successe, sailed into Dalmatia, where they spoiled certaine Townes, surprised by their sodaine incursions. They tooke likewise certaine Shippes laden with rich marchandise, returning from Syria, who hauing from farre espied the Moores fleet, had retired themselves into the Gulph of Trieste: But after they had taken them, in hatred of the Venetians, they slue all the prisoners.

The report of the losse of the battaile at Crotona, brought a meruailous griefe and terror to the Citie. But this latter, as least of all look't for, did in such sort grieue them, as the feare was no lesse in Venice than as the enemy had bene before it; and this feare would haue bene greater, had they not understood by their spies, that the enemies were gone to Ancona; which being taken, and spoiled by their sodaine and vnlook't for coming, they did forthwith put themselves to Sea. The Narentines ioyfull for the Venetians losse, came sodainly from Dalmatia, to steale and spoile, euen as farre as Carli. This Towne stands at the mouth of the Riuer Limenes, whither the ancient Venetians, which fled from Concorda in the troublous time of the Hunnes, had retired themselves. About the same time or soone after (as saith Bonitendus) Pope Benedict came to Venice, where at the importunate entreatie of Agnes de Morosin Abbess of the place, hee promised to send from Rome the bodies of Saint Paneratus, and Saint Sabina, by the deuotion done to which bodies, the Church might be furthered in the building. They were afterwards sent thither, and placed with great reuerence in a little Chappell of the Church.

Vnder this Princes gouernment the Emperour Lotharius (and manie Emperours likewise after him) did confirme by writing all the ancient priuiledges, and immunities of the Venetians, to the end they might be inuicibly obserued. Moreover as the Common-wealth was then not very fortunate abroad, it was much lesse at home: For the ciuill dissension of six of the noblest families in the Citie diuided into two factions, did greatly trouble it. On the one side were the Iustiniani, the Polani and the Bassii; on the other the Barbolani, the Seliani, and the Seudi, who being ioyned together, did by their quarrells, often-times present the people with verie fearefull and horrible spectacles. And after they had fought in the middelt of the Citie with different successe, euen almost to the totall ruine of one another, the Barbolani with all their adherents were drisen forth of the Citie. But soone after, at the entreatie of the Emperour Lodowicke, to whom they had retired themselves, the strife betwene the two factions being appeald, they were restored to their houses. These things hapned during the gouernment of Piero Tradonico: who after he had gouerned certaine yeares alone after his sonnes death, whome hee had associated for the gouernment of the Common-wealth, comming one daie from diuine seruice at Saint Zacharies Church, it came to passe as he returned home-ward, hee was on a sodaine and vnlook't for assailed by certaine conspiratours, and by them murdered, the ninth yeare of his gouernment. deed, his Ministers and seruants, which waited vpon him, moued with a charitable affection towards the old man, endeouored to defend him, and to repell the wrong, but being driuen away by a greater number, and stronger then themselves, they sodainly with a great noise seized on the Dukes Palace, where being besieged by the conspirators, they did thirtie daies together sustaine their furie. At the last, after they had receiued assurance of the people, that the defending of so good a Prince against the trecherous attempts of wicked conspirators, should not be imputed vnto them for a capitall crime; nor yet the seizing on the publike place for their safetie, which they had so couragiously defended: they came forth of the Palace, hauing first of all capitulated, That the Citie should not leaue such an example vnpunished, to haue wickedly and miserably slaine so vertuous a Prince, without desert at all; saying, That it was an hainous matter, to behold Citizens to walke in a Citie, where they had committed so execrable a parricide, and besprinkled the peoples face with the blood of the soueraigne Magistrate.

The people appointed three men to enquire concerning the murder, to punish the guiltie, and to take order for those who had seized on the Dukes Palace. The three which were deputed, were Piero Bishop of Equiline, Giuanni Arch-deacon of Grada, and Dominico Massoni. These men bannished the guiltie for ever; some into France, and the rest into Greecc. Diuers, who as yet were not condemned, were murdered. Vrso Gragnario one of the conspirators died miserably, being possessed by wicked spirits; to shew that the death of Tradonico did not only displease men, but God. And those who had seized on the Dukes Palace, because it was not done without great commotion in the Citie; some of them were bannished out of the limits of the Venetians, and the most part of the rest were confined into the Isle of Pouegia. This place is fīue mile distant from the Citie: whither after they had carried their wiues and children, they did in time so encrease, as the Town which they built there was afterward greatly inhabited; but such as it was, the warres of the Genouezes did wholly ruinate it.

14. Duke of Venice.

He Commonwealth being quieted by iudgment of these three men: Vrso Partitatio was declared Duke. Vnder this man the Citie was, abroad and at home, prosperously governed. At the beginning of his government, to the end that the Venetians might haue a firme peace, they were of opinion to send hostages to the Barbarians. Their Annals nails affirm this: burdiuers Historians make no mention of hostages. The Sardens loone after, who came from Alexandria about eight and twentie yeares after Saba the Moors comming into Italie, had possessed the Isle of Candie: & being come on a sodaine into Dalmatia, after they had spoiled the Sea-coasts of Histria; they came and besieged Grada. Vrso did in such fort terrible them by his sodaine arrivall, as with great fence they withdrew their vessells, and in an instant hoisted saile and put to Sea. Some Historians saie that Giuanni the Princes sonne, a courageous yong man, did beare himselfe verie valiantly in this action. If it be so, it will not be amisse to beleue, that the Barbarians were so farre from flying away vpon report of the comming of the Venetians fleet, as that on the contrarie they were so hardie as to tarrie for them, and to ioine battraile, whereby it hapned that this yong man, behauing himselfe brauely the same daie against the enemy, was therefore by the people giuen for Colleague to his Father. Bonitendius reports that Vrso did not only fight there fortunately against the Saracens, but likewise at Tarentum: That he did moreouer brauely assault the Narentines with 30. ships of war, for that they had contrarie to the agreement, robbed and spoiled certaine townes of Histria: But the Historians make no mention why he tooke Armes for the Histrians, seeing they were not as yet vnder the Venetians Dominion. It is likely, that after they had ouer-runne the Histrians, they entred vpon the Venetians frontiers. Vrso in the meane space bare a secret grudge to Pietro Bishop of Grada, till such time as he had confirmed Dominico Caloprimini, who had bene elected Bishop of Tourcelles; the which he refused to do in regard they were enemies. Now the state of the Commonwealth being peaceably governed abroad, the Duke enacted, That those who were called the Princes Squiers, should inhabit that part of the Citie, which at the beginning was called Dorist-dura, and should build houses there. And in this sort that place began to bee habitable, which before then was desert for feare of Sea-incursions. This Princes good fortune was likewise the cause, that the ancient strife betwixt the Venetians and the Forlani, occasioned by a particular affection which each of them did beare to the churches of Aquileia & Grada, was wholly extinct, vpon the promise which Vulpertio of Aquileia made, neuer more to molest the Church of Grada. All these felicities were followed by an other nothing lesse. For hauing fortunately prevailed against the Saracens, he was declared by the Ambassadors of the Emperor Basilisus, Prothospater of the Grecian Empire. But because Basilisus hold not ouercome him in bountie, he sent twelue great Bells to Constantinople to him for a present, and the Greekes by this means of the Venetians liberalitie began at that time to vse Bells.

the 15. Duke of Venice.

Now

Now Vrſo, after he had thus obtained what focuer belonged to the adornment of mans life, deceased in the seventh year of his government: and by his death Giovanni his brother began to gouerne the Common-wealth. Hee determined to send his brother Badoario to Pope Iohn: that by his authoritie Commachia might be added to their State. This is likely to haue beene plotted by the Venetians, because this place stood on the ancient confines of Venice. Marini, Earle of Commachia, being aduertised of their determination, laide waite for the Venetian on the confines of Rauenna, as he went towards Rome, he hurt and rooke him, and after hee had made him to promise to deale no more in that businesse, hee sent him home. But soone after his returne to Venice he died of his hurt. The angrie Duke, reſolving to reuenge his brothers death, came with a mightie Armie to Commachia, rooke it by force, and vsed all hostile proceedings against those who had consented to his brothers death: and after he had left a Garrison there, he did spoyle and ouer-ran the Territorie neere to Rauenna, because the y likewise had their hand in that enterprise. Her he builded the Church of Saint Cyrian and Cornelius on the banks of Malamoc, which a while after, in the dayes of Prince Vitalis Michuelli, and by his meanes, was conuerted into a Monastere of Nunnes. Then falling sick, hee left his brother Pietro (by the peoples command) for his successor: but recouering his health contrarie to all mens expectation, he rooke him for Colleague in the Government; who dying afterwards, he associated Vrſo his other brother, who was elder then Pietro deceased. Soone after, being troubled with a dangerous disease, which hindred him from intending the affaires of the Common-wealth, (Vrſo hauing in the meane space voluntarily depofed himselfe) after hee had permitted the people to elect a new Duke, hee retired to his owne house as a priuate Citizen; the sixth year of his Government being not fully expired. Some say, that both the brethren depofed themselves, because they perceiued the people to bee discontented with their Government.

Duke Giovanni doth voluntarily depose himselfe.

PIETRO CANDIANO, the first, the 16. Duke of Venice.

Giovanni being depofed, Pietro Candiano ſucceeded him; vnto whom Giovanni being called into the Senate, did freely ſurrender the titles of the Soueraigne Magistrate, and withdrew himſelfe to his owne priuate houſe. At the ſame time certaine galleys were ſent againſt the Narentines, ancient enemies to the Venetians (who robbed all the neighbour boar Seas) to preuent their incursions; but they returned without doing any thing, by reaſon they could no where meete with the enemye. Not long after, Prince Candiano went againſt the ſame enemies, with twelue Galleys (ſome ſaie but ſeuē) and met them neere to the Promontorie of Dalmatia, which the inhabitants call Micolal. The Venetians animated by their Duke, did furioſly aſſaile them. The Liburnians did bravely receive them. They fought on both ſides with more furie and courage of the enemyes ſhippes: but the great multitude of the Barbarians beginning to preuaile; and the Dukes Gallie being boarded, Prince Candiano fighting valiantly was ſlaine, after he had commanded the Common-wealth but fixe moneths. His bodie being ſecretly conueyed by the Hiſtrians to Grada, was there buried.

At the firſt report of this loſſe, the whole Citie was in an uproare: which had bene much greater, if Giovanni Partitio, who had renounced the ſoueraigne dignitie, had not ſodainely at the peoples entreatie taken vpon him againe the government of the Common-wealth, with the Ducall titles. But the tumult being appeaſed, the people with a common conſent, named Pietro, ſurnamed Tribuno, for their Prince.

PIETRO TRIBUNO, the 17. Duke of Venice.

This man was likewiſe made Prothoſpater by the Grecian Emperour: Their common enemies (the Pirats) did very much vex the places neere to the Citie: in regard whereof, Tribuno cauſed a wall to be made to defend the Citie, from the little Canall neere to the Caſtle vnto the Church of Saint Maria Zubanica, with a chaine from that wall vnto S. Georges Church, for feare leaſt the enemye ſhould enter the Citie on a ſodaine. But at this day there is no ſigne of that ancient wall to be ſcene: He gaue bounds to the Chioggians, from their Haven along the ſhoare, euen to the mouth of the R iuer Aci: which are called Foſſon, Beſba, and Conchia; and ſo back againe to the ſame Haven.

At the ſame time, the Venetian State, with that of all Italie on the Sea-coaſt was verie much troubled: For they were aſſailed on the one ſide by Pirats, and on the other by the ordinarie inuaſions of the Saracens, who as a new amazement ſet on the Venetians.

The Hunnes, who (as we haue elſe-where ſaid) were come forth of Scithia, entered tred Italie with great furie. A verie great multitude of them leauing Scithia at that time, would stae in no place, til they had first seene how their friends and kindsfolke in Hungarie fared. These men by continuall frequentation with the Italians, being accustomed to the iournies of Italie, had for the most part changed their naturall crueltie and manner of life: by means whereof waxing more quill, they were driuen from the places which they had gotten by right of warre, by those that came after them. The crueltie of this Nation is reported to be such, as after that they had been in Hungarie, they abstained not from eating humane flesh after their countrie manner; who forthwith tooke vpon them the names of those whom they had driuen thence, and were called Hungarians. Those which were expulsed, were likewise in times past called Huns, as well as the latter; And being come into Hungarie in the daies of Attila, they were afterward named Bauarians, then Huns; and certaine letters being taken awaie from both names, it was made but one.

These then after diuers warlike actions done as well in France as Germanie, after they had vanquished Lewis king of Germanie, and made him tributarie, carrying great store of bootie home with them, being proude of so good successe, resolved to make attempt on Italie; hauing perhaps vnderstood that they were at strife among themselves. By means whereof comming first into Misia, they defeated the Princes of the same in a bloudie battaile, and made them tributarie. Departing thence, vpon report that they determined to invade Italie: Berengarius, who at the same time held the Roman Empire, marched against them with fiftene thousand men, and they fought verie furiously vpon the confines of Italie, where Berengarius being overcome, fledde from the battaile with the losse of the greatest part of his forces.

The Hunnes became more haughty after this victorie, and they entred Italie the neere stwaie, putting all they met with to fire and sword; and comming to Treuifo they tooke and spoiled it. From thence determining to goe to Milan, thereport of the great wealth of the Venetians which began at the same time to be verie famous ouer all Italie was the cause, that on a sodaine they turned all their forces vpon the Venetians. They speedily made a great number of small light boates; which they couered (as it is reported) with leather, by reason that they were grossly made, and of a thicke substance. In these the Barbarians imbarqued themselves, and assailed Villa-noua (so was the ancient Heracia called, after it was reedified) which, being taken at the first assault, they burnt downe to the ground. From thence marching to Equiline and Iesulune, they destroyed them in the same manner. Then pursuing the course of their victories all along the Sea-coast, they spoiled Chioggia and Capodarger, and afterward burnt them. At the last they resolved to assaile Rialto. The feare, which then fell vpon the Venetians, was not like to that which possessed them in the time of the French-mens warres. For this terror was much greater then the other. They fought with the French for their libertie. They must fight with these men for the safetie of their liues. Those, albeit they were enemies, had in them some sparkes of pietie and Religion. The Huns did not only contemne godlinesse but all humanitie; for they did not spare the dead carcases, but like brute beasts they tare them in pieces and deuoured them. The euill disposition of this Nation had at the first report so terrified all people of each sex and age, as they did not alone bewaile the losse of their libertie; but their liues likewise. But (as it oftentimes hapneth) this despair of theirs was conuerted into furie, and this furie into a desire of reuenge; or if that could not be effected, to die valiantly. This desire gaue them hope to vanquish the Barbarians, if they should attempt to hazard the fight.

It is to be supposed (for we cannot certainly affirme it) That the Venetians were sodainly encouraged by some, by this manner of speech. That it was now time for them by their actions to shew themselves valiant men; That a mightie danger did not onely threaten their Countrie, but their liues; That they had to doe with a kinde of people, who as little vsed to spare the bodies of the dead, as their liues in battaile. But yet neuertheless they were not made of iron, but their bodies might easily be pierced. That they should call to memorie how the ancient Venetians with a few inhabitants of the Latines, made no difficultie in their Countre behalfe to expose their liues before the walles of Aquileia, against three hundred thousand men; (for Attila had many in his Armie) That the event of that battaile did manifest, how much vertue and courage is better in warre than great multitudes: But it may be that some will carme them rash and inconsiderate for their attempt, in daring to assaile the enemy with that sort of fight, wherein he was most expert: whereas on the contrary, they should rather haue fought with them at Sea, or in the Lakes, knowing better to them than to the Barbarians: (then which, he said, nothing could bee more acceptable to the Venetians, who from their youth are accustomed to the Sea) than in such a place where their valour might be most apparent. Moreover, that the enemies had neither the skill, nor shippes, fit for that purpose. That their Ancestors had in the same places, where they were now to fight, vanquished in times past King Pepin, followed with his owne forces, and with those of the Emperour his father: And that they onely fought for their libertie: whereas now, the danger of their liues did constrain them to defend themselves brauely. Now in regard that if they were overcome, they were sure to die, he could not thinke that there was any Cittizen so base or recreant but would rather choose to dye valiantly with his sword in his hand, then by yielding, to loose all he had, and to haue his throat cut, like a Sheepe, by a barbarous and cruell enemy. He said, That the strength and magnanimitie of the Cittizens were such, as they were not onely sufficient to rebate the edges of the Hunnes swords who threatened them; but to free their Countrie likewise from so wretsome a siege.

Being animated by these, or such like exhortations, they became courageous. For it were folle to imagine that a multitude of people, being amazed with the feare of their enemies, could be encouraged without some vehement Oration, full of perswasive speeches. All men, after that, ran to arme themselves, not onely to defend their libertie, but likewise, or rather, to preferre the safetie of their liues. The enemies in the meane space hasted towards Rialto. The Venetians imbarqued in their well-armed vessels, and fit for the fight, met with them neere to Albiola: The fight at the beginning was verie cruell.

The attempts of the Hunnes were diuers; who relying on their great numbers, assailed them in sundrie places at once. The Venetians cuerie where oppoling themselves against them, did brauely resist their assaults: They fought sundrie daies without any likely-hood of victorie to either side. But at the last, both partes ioyning their whole forces, the Barbarians were broken and defeated, and dispersing their troopes, fledde farre from thence, leauing to the Venetians a most famous victorie. The enemies (as some report) being soone after wonne by the reuards of Berengarius, departed out of Italie.

The Venetians grew famous, by gaining this victorie neere to Albiola. All men said that the Venetians had abated the furie of the Hunnes, vnto whom Berengarius (a valiant and mightie Prince, by reason of the Empire of Italie) had giuen place. Hee did likewise greatly praise the absent Duke, by whose means and vnder whom all was done. It is to be supposed, that the Duke Tribuno did at that time fortifie the Citie with a wall and chaine; and not for feare of the Pirates: the which certaine Historians doe likewise affirme.

Ow the Common wealth being thus happily governed at home and abroad, the Duke Tribuno dyed; the nineteenth yeare of his government, as some saie: and according to others, the three and twentieth. Vrso Badoairio was chosen in his stead. This man sent his sonne Pietro to Constantinople to the Greeke Emperour, of whom being made Protospater, he receaued diuers great and riche presents: But this young man returning home to Venice, was surprised by a meane Prince of the Dalmatians called Michael, who spoiled him of his treasure; and confined him into Misia; from whence escaping he returned secretly to Venice. Vrso would haue examined the bounds of the Chioggians; but vnderstanding that Prince Pietro, his predecessor, had limited them, he changed his purpose. He is reported to haue bin a verie good & religious Prince. For the eleuenth yeare of his government, hee did willingly depose himselfe, and went to the monasterie of Saint Felix d' Amiana, where he spent the remainder of his dayes in the Monastick life. The ruines of this place are to be seene yet at this day, (the Church almost fallen downe) as men goe from the Citie towards the Hauen of the Gruarij. This Towne belongs to the Forlani; and may be seene by those which saile on the left hand, neere to the Tower, called La Lia-maiore.

Pietro

He government of Pietro Candiano or Sanuto, (for they report this surname to remaine euer after to the familie of the Candiani) succeeded this voluntarie dimission. This man was sonne to the same Pietro who was slaine in the Dalmatian warre. Hee had a sonne of the same name, who being sent by his father to Greece, was by the Emperour created Prothospater. Some Authors refer the rauishment of the Maidens to these times; of whome albeit we haue sufficiently spoken in the first Booke, yet because the Historians doe likewise varie herein, it shall not be amisse here to saie somewhat of it. The Histrrians, who were at the same time enemies to the Venetians, did on a sodaine take away certaine Maidens by force, with their dowrie, out of Saint Peters Church, which stands in that part of the Citie, called the Castell, at such time as they celebrated their marriage. Whereat the Citie being in an vp-roare: the Duke, after he had in hast gathered together certaine forces, marched sodainly after them, and ouertaking them in the marshes of Caorli, as they were deuiding the spoile, he did furiously assaile them, and (as some say) did easily breake them. Others affirme that they fought furiously on either side, and that the battaile was verie bloudie; but that at last the enemies were all slaine, and their bodies flung into the Sea. And that in remembrance of this victorie, the yearely Games, called (of the married) were ordained. At a certaine day euerie yeare they carried twelue Virgins with great pompe round about the Citie. But this order being brought in by deuotion, was afterward changed into a meruailous abuse. This custome continued till the warres with the Genowaies, That twelue Virgins, adorned with gold and pretious stones, were yearely on a certaine day carried round about the Citie, in memorie of what had beene done: But the Genoways imploying those of Chioggia and the Venetians in more important busineses; this custome was wholly abolished. Diuers of the most authentike Historians doe affirme, that this hapned not vnder Pietro Candiano, but vnder Badoairio his government.

I finde that about the same time they made warre on those of Commachia with prosperous successe: who being summoned to restore what they had iniuriously taken from the wronged Venetians, refused so to doe, till at the last they were enforced; For they did not then only surrender the prisoners, but promised on their faith to doe whatsoeuer the Venetians would command them.

ans vanquished.

It is reported, that at the same time: those of the Cape of Histria did yeeld themselves

belues to the Venetians. But it is likely, that they did it more by constraint, than of free will. For being assailed by the Venetians, for prophaning their ceremonies and rauishing the Virgins, they were constrained to make satisfaction, and to send yearly to Venice, for a tribute, an hundred peeces of wine. Pietro Bishop of Oliuolo sonneto Duke Pietro surnamed Tribuno, placed the bodies of Saint Saturnine, and Saint Nichodemus, in the Church of Saint Maria Formosa. And this is all we finde to haue beene done, during the gouernment of Candiano; who dyed in the second year of his regiment, or (as some others say) the latter end of the seuenth.

20. Duke of Venice.*

Pietro Bodoario succeeded him (who as hath beene said) was taken prisoner in Sclauonia as hee returned out of Greece: This man did likewise gouerne the Common-wealth two years. Others say three; and affirme, that it was hee that ouercame the Histrians in the marches of Caorli, and restored the Virgins of whome wee lately spake. More then this, I finde not anie memorable matter done by him.

the 21. Duke of Venice.*

Candiano

Candiano sonneto Pietro succeeded him; who being by his father associated to the gouernment, was for his great pride banished. But waxing by yeares more wife and modest, hee was by the common consent of the people restored to his lost dignitie.

The Narentines in the meane time did by their thefts vexe all the neighbour Seas, so as the Venetians condition was, in a manner, to bee compared to theirs, who are streightly besieged. The shame and anger stirred vp euery one to reuenge, saying; It was a dishonour to the Venetians, who had in times past obtained so many goodly victories on the bosome of the waters, patiently to endure that a fewe base theenes who had no hope but in flight, should so much presume, as to leaue the Venetians nothing in safetie. That diuers euen till then had beene by them vndone euen in the Cities sight, and that there remained nothing for them now to doe, but to come into the middelt of the Citie, and knocke downe the wretched Citizens like heartlesse beasts. Being moued with these complaints; they forthwith prepared a new Voyage against the Narentines. And for the same purpose thirtie three Sips (called for the maner of their building Gombaries) were set forth. Vfso Bodoario, and Pietro Rossolo commanded the Armie. The Narentines being amazed, at the reporte of this Nauie, had not the spirits to attend them, but by Ambassadors they sued for peace; which was graunted them vpon these conditions, That they should pay vnto the Venetians the iust value of the hurt which they had till then done. Some say that the Fleet returned, as at other former times, without doing any thing at all.

The League at the same time was renewed, with the Bishop of Aquileia. Dominico Bishop of Oliuolo caused certaine reliques of Saint Iohn Baptist to be reuerently placed in the Church, builded in times past by his Ancestors, in that part of the Citie which is called Embragola. Duke Candiano in the meane time hauing three sonnes, did elect for his Colleague, neither the eldest, nor the youngest, but the second, called Pietro: who soone after became so insolent, as hee durst, in contempt of his fathers whole some Counsels, stirre vp certaine dissolute persons to raise a sodaine sedition in the Citie. The whole Senate, in manner, fauoured the old father. The animated seditious people followed the foolish young man; and the fundrie affections of either party preuailed so farre, as the Citizens were like to haue assailed one another in the middelt of the Citie. Candianos authoritie appeased those tumultuous parties readie to fight, and on a sodaine by the peoples commandement (the greatest number of whom were actors in this conspiracie) the sonne was deposed and banished. And at the same instant the Clergie and the chiefe of the Citie sware jointly, neuer to suffer neither in the fathers life time, nor afterward, that seditious person Pietro Candiano to be restored againe to his place, from the which he had iustly bin deposed. Some say that he was by the people committed to prison, and condemned to dye, but at his fathers request they saued his life, and banished him. In his exile he went to Rauenna to Guido sonneto Berengarius, (some say Albert for Guido) and obtained meanes at Berengarius pursute, to make warre on the Venetians, whose enemy hee had beene proclaimed. Some thincke that Guido furnished him with six Gallies to this purpose: For no one particular man had beene able to enterprise so great a matter, in a deiect fortune like his. This rash young man did in short time take certaine Venetian shippes, not farre from Rauenna, wherewith the old Duke was so grieved, as within fewe daies after he departed out of this life, after he had gouerned seauen yeares or (as some say) eleauen.

Pietro

THe Citie being busied about the election of a new Duke: (the peoples affections being euer inconstant) the whole multitude possessed with a wonderfull desire to see this absent yong man, did on a sodaine by a publike decree repeale Candiano from bannishment; and contrarie to the oath, made a swell by the Clergie as the Principall Citizens, installed him in his dead Fathers place. But soon after, the Citie, and Pietro himselfe receiued the punishment of their rashnesse. The one, for contemning her oath, endured a tyrannicall government, with a publike losse, by meanes of fier; And the other, for inuring his Father and his Countrie. It is reported, that the more to honor him, they sent three hundred barkes to Rauenta to accompanie him home. For it were a madnesse to thinke that they were so manie shippes, as some do write.

Now in this Princes daies, Pietro Marturio Bishop of Oliuolo did with a sumptuous preparation builde the Church of the Augustines. Ambassadors likewise at the same time were sent to Rome to Pope Leo, and to the emperour Otho, to entreat them, that the Church of Grada might be declared by the generall Councell, then held at Rome, Metropolitane of the Venetians dominions, and of Histria. The which they did not onely obtaine, but brought home other priuiledges graunted to the Venetians.

The Duke in the meane time did repudiate Isone his wife, because (as he said) she was old. He had a sonne by her named Vitalis: who taking holie orders vpon him, was by his Father disinherited, vnder colour of entering into Religion: But it occasioned his future good; for he became afterwards Bishop of Grada. Now his wife being put away, and sent to Saint Zacharies Nunnerie, he married Vualderta daughter to Guido, with whom he receiued for her dowrie, great inheritances, manie slaues, and other riches. By meanes whereof, being pufft vp with his great wealth, and new alliance, he vomited out his bad inclination, which till then hee had hidden, and gaue himselfe to all manner of vices; beginning openly to prazize tirannie in sted of a iust government. He became proude, and full of menaces. He had rather be feared than loued of the people. He did moreouer leuie a mightie Armie, and marched against the inhabitants of Vderza, saying that they did wrongfully hold from him certaine lands belonging to his wife. Hee did first spoile the Countrie round about, then he assailed the Citie; which, beeing taken, hee burned downe to the ground.

Some

Some Authors affirme, that vpon the same occasion he assailed likewise those of Ferrara: and that he tooke by force a Citie of their confines. These warlike actions made him more insolent. For he placed a companie of soldiours in the Dukes Palace for his guard: and all his speech and actions fauoured of tirannie. The people calling to minde their ancient libertie, fel on a sodaine vpon him, the seuenteenth yeare of his government, as some saie, or the eighteenth, according to others. For the Historians doe much disagree concerning the times of euerie Princes government. But with his Guard defending himselfe valiantly from the top of his house, they set fier on the houses next to the Palace on this side the Canall, on the same side the winde did blow, which being kindled, the flame did not onely burne the Dukes Palace but Saint Markes Church. Pietro seeing himselfe inuironed with so manie miseries, and that he must bee constrained either to giue place to the peoples furie, or else to die there, he tooke his yonge son which he had by this last wife in his armes, and went into that part of the Church which the fier had not yet touched, and comming forth by a priuie way, he endeouored to saue himself and his sonne by flight, whom he meant to carrie into Exile with him. But when he perceiued all the waies stoped with Armed men, he then fell to intreaties, That they would not fall vpon him as on a cruell beast; that they would abstaine from hurting him, till he had excused himselfe to the people: and then it should be at their choice, either to put him to a cruell death, if they thought it fit, or else to saue his life, as by their bountie they had done in times past, whilst his Father liued, at such time as they accounted him guiltie of Treason. He did moreouer confesse, that the people might be iustly moued against him, but yet, the yonge child in his armes was innocent; that they should doe a most vnworthie deede, If, for the hatred they did beare to the Father, they should murder the innocent creature, who neuer yet had offended anie one. All these entreaties were vaine; and those who assailed him cried out a loud, That it was lawfull for them (being an holie and iust matter) to take awaie a Tirant from the Common-wealth, whose excuses could not be but wicked: And so rushing vpon him, he did in a moment fall downe dead to the ground, wounded in diuers places, with his yong sonne likewise.

Some saie, that they did cut the childes throat in the trembling nurses armes, and that the bodies were by the peoples command throwne vpon the dunghill, and there left to bee eaten with dogges, but that at the intreatie of Giovanni Grazonico, that lamentable spectacle was removed from the sight of the multitude, and the bodies honorably buried in St. Hilaries Church. Some thinke that through the counsell of Pietro Vrsolo, who was Duke after him, the people fired the houses next to the Palace, and that it was done onely to hurt the Duke: But it fell out otherwise. For the force of the winde, and the houses neere to the Palace did in such sort feede this fier, as, besides the Palace, the most magnificent Cathedrall Church of the Citie, and those of Saint Theodore the Martir, and Saint Marie Iubenica, with three hundred priuate houses were the same daie burnt.

THE FOUVRTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD
OF THE HISTORIE
Of Venice.

- 20 H He Dukes Palace, burnt in the last popular sedition, is repaired at V R S E O L O's cost, who succeeded CANDIANO. He gives a most rich Table to lye upon Saint MARKES Altar. VITALIS Patriarch of Grada, sonne to the deceased Duke CANDIANO, flies to the Emperour OTHO. ADHELETA a most renowned Ladie, and her manie crosses. The league renewed with those of the Cape of Histria. V R S E O L O, moved with a Religious desire, doth secretly leaue the Citie. The Common-wealth endangered by ciuile discorde. OTHO the second makes secret warre on the Venetians, whom he first seekes to ouercome by famine. Saint GEORGES Church built right opposite to the great market-place. The description of the Countrie of Illiria. All Histria, and Dalmatia, brought vnder the subiection of V R S E O L O. The Emperour OTHO the third comes to Venice in disguise, and remaines secretly for a time with the Duke. The Phledrimi build Saint BENETS Church. The Venetians ouercomes the Hadrians neere to the mouthes of the Riuer Po, and Adgie. They fight likewise afterward with good successe in Dalmatia, with Hierosimus, King of Croatia. Prince OTHO banished. DOMINICO V R S E O L O flies to Rauchna the morrow after he had seized on the Dukes Palace, being driuen thence by the people. Those of ZARA revolt, after they had first yeelded to the Venetians. PEPIN, Patriarch of Aquileia, troubleth the quiet of the Common-wealth. From whence the Normans are descended, who haue a long time reigned in Italie and Sicilie. GISCARD their Captaine. The Venetians vanquish the Normans at Sea, neere to Durazzo.

- 40 T HE Common-wealth hauing by the Dukes death preferred her ancient libertie, it was an hard matter to declare whether of these two were the greatest; either their ioye for being freed from tyrannie, or their sorrow to see so many publique and priuate buildings consumed to ashes by the late fire, which did maruelously deface the Cities beautie. But fearing least such an astonishment might breed some greater mischeife in the Citie (as it is often seene, that one new sorrow followeth another at the heeles) they forthwith created a new Duke. But yet they sought out one, differing in humour and qualitie from him that last deceased. But they needed not make any farre search, being so well furnished neere at hand.

He refuseth to take the charge upon him.

His vertuous wisdom of Pietro Vrscolo, being at the same time knowne to all men, was the cause, that at the generall assembly held at Saint Peters Church for the same purpose (which is at this day the Patriarks seat) he was with a generall applause declared Prince: who refusing this charge, tooke it vpon him at the peoples entreatie, who told him that he ought not to forsake the Commonwealt in so dangerous a season. Yet it is most certaine that hee vnwillingly embraced it. For being from his youth brought vp and trained in the loue of Iustice, hee was afraid of popular government, which seldome or neuer respects the innocent. But the affection which hee did beare to his Countrey, for the which we are chiefly borne (as saith diuine Plato) made him not to abandon his fellow-citizens in so great a danger. So soone therefore as hee was chosen Prince, because there was some likelihood, that the state of the Common-wealth could not bee on a sodaine established, but that greater troubles were to be expected in a Citie newly mutinied for her Princes massacre; to the end to make the people more obedient, he bound them vnto him by oath: and protested, that hee would in no sort endure any enterprize to bee vndertaken against himselfe, nor the State, whilst hee should manage the soueraigne dignitie. And because the Pallace had bene burnt, he transported the ensignes and Ducall dignitie into his owne priuate house: meaning neuerthelesse to returne to the Pallace so soone as it should be reedified,

The people sweare to the Prince.

The Pallace and Saint Markes Church repaired

Vrscolo overcomes the Saracens before Barri.

His government began by repairing these two places, which hee did at his owne costs, more magnificently than they were before. Now the Church being thus beautified, hee caused the bodie of the Euangelist, which few people thought had escaped the fire, to be brought againe into it. He gaue besides to the same Church a table of gold, richly wrought at Constantinople, which hee caused to be dedicated with great solemnitie on the high Altar.

About the same time, or a little before, the Saracens, being entred in two companies into Italie, after they had taken Capua, they besieged Barri by land and Sea, a towne seated betwixt Brundisium, and the mouth of the River Ausida: the poore inhabitants whereof enduring all miseries through want of foode, were succored with victuals by the Venetians fleet vnder the conduct of Vrscolo. But because the Barbarians did notwithstanding our straightly presse those of the towne, Vrscolo accompanied with the aide of Greece, came and fought with the enemy on the Sea, and hauing defeated the greatest part of them, and put the residue to flight, he purchased great glorie to the Venetians. He had but one sonne by his wife Felicita, and as soone he was borne, they both vowed chastitie. He gouerned the State in the meane space with such wisdom and integritie, as men did easily perceiue by his carriage, that he had not accepted the charge thereof for any desire that he had to command, but for the good onely of the Common-wealth; in such sort as a peaceable government had succeeded the tumults of the deceased Duke, if certaine Authors and Ministers of the late Duke *Candiano*s furie had not resolved to trouble the publike peace.

The husband & wife were chastitie.

At these mens perswasions, Vitalis Bishop of Grada (who was as hath bene said, reiect by his father vnder colour of entring into religion,) fled into Lombardie to the Emperour Otho the second; where after hee had greatly complained of the miserable death of his father Pietro, hee besought him with great instance to reuenge it, in regard he had bene some time his friend and guest. Happily some would say, that hee was iustly slaine: but they could not say so of the young infant his brother, whom they had cruelly murdered in his fathers armes. He did moreover manifest his owne banishment (which his very enemies lamented,) wherein he was likely to wax old and to die farre from his natieue Countrey, if he were not by some forraigne aide reestablished in the Citie, from whence he had bene so vniustly driuen by his fellowe Citizens.

His complaint and teares did greatly moue the Emperour Otho, who seemed priuately to be greatly displeased at this guests miserie, whereupon, after hee had giuen him some hope of returning into his Countrey, hee willed him to be of good courage, and to be merrie in his companie, till a fit occasion were presented to send him home, which he promised shortly to effect with all his power.

Vanderta in the meane season, Vitalis his mother in law, being come along with him, went to Adheleta, Othos mother, who then laie at Placentia, and by her meanes she was soone after, with the consent both of the Prince and people, admitted into the Citie. It is not vnneccessarie (in regard it belongs to our Historie) briefly to rehearse, by what meanes Adheleta returned to the Imperiall dignitie, from whence she fell by the deccale of her first husband.

She married first of all the Emperour Lotharius; a great friend to the Venetians. He being dead, Berengarius his successor confined her for euer into the Castle of La Garda, (whereof the goodliest Lake of Italie doth at this day beare the name) where she was brought to such pouertie, as begging her bread by letters and messages, she led a miserable life. Whereby wee may learne, that there is no man so great (did not the foolish admiration of wordly riches make men forget their weakenesse) but may confesse, that there is nothing in this world so firme and certaine, which a man may promise to himselfe long to enioy, Adheleta escaping secretly from this place, came to Verona, to Alard, who (as I thinke) was Bishop of the Citie: for it is certaine that the familie of the Alardi, are at this day of great account there. This man, because hee had no place where he might hide such a Ladie, sent her to Accioni his vnkle, who was in times past a good friend to Lotharius, who hid her a long time in a countrey-house, tenne miles distant from the Citie, vntill such time, as (knowne to himselfe alone) she married for her second husband Otho the first, who carried her into Germanie; by whom he had a sonne, which was the Emperour Otho the second, of whom wee euen now spake: Who after hee had not onely defeated Berengarius, and Albert his sonne, but wholly overthrowne them, and by their ruines confirmed the Empire to himselfe: hee made peace with the Venetians, at the request of his mother Adheleta, against whom he was incensed for the murder of Prince Candiano.

Berengarius & his sonne Albert defeated.

About the same time there arose a new strife with those of the Cape of Histria, which was soone appeased by the meanes of a new League; wherein it was expressely couenanted, That they should paie vnto the Venetians euerie yeare an hundred Hogtheades of wine. The Bishops of Grada haue for a certaine time gathered this tribute in the peoples name.

The Histrians tributaries to the Venetians.

Thus stood the State of the Common-wealth, which was sodainly deprived of the presence of this good Prince, by an vnheard-of accident.

A certaine man, named Guerin, comming from Aquitaine in pilgrimage to Venice, to visit Saint Markes bodie, was brought before the Prince according to his appointment, which was, that all those who should come to the Citie for anie deuotion should be bountifully entertained in his Pallace. This man hauing a great while discoursed of religion and of Pennance (for this stranger was by profession a Moncke) brought the Prince by little and little to this passe, (who of himselfe was sufficiently addicted thereunto,) as he forthwith thought vpon meanes how he might giue ouer the gouernment. And to put it in practise, hee craued but so much time of the stranger, as was sufficient for the quiet setting of the Common-wealth, and hauing prayed him to returne within a yeare, he dismissed him. Vsesolo in the meane time gaue himselfe to all exercises of pietie, and taking vpon himselfe the cause of the poore, he did comfort their pouertie with a meruallous affection. He built, besides, a deuout Hospitall which is yet to be seene at this day right ouer against the great market-place. He did moreover take into his owne protection, and maintained with an incredible charite, the Colledges, the Clergie, and all Religious sorts of people. He did patiently beare whatsoeuer Vitalis, (who was absent) and his adherents did daily practise against him, whose wicked designs were likewise (as some say) diuinely reuealed vnto him. At the last, after hee had spent the yeare in these good exercises, vpon a night, (for Guerin failed not to returne at the prefixed time) he left the Citie in disguised habite, vnknown to his wife, his sonne, and all his kinne-folkes, and went on his iourney. When he forooke his charge and Countrie, he was followed and accompanied by Giovanni Gradonico, Giovanni Morosini, Remoaldo, and Marini of Rauenna: they all being partakers of his enterprife. He led in proceffe of time so holie and religious a life, as after his death in Aquitaine, where he passed the remainder of his daies, hee was (as hath bene said) honoured for many miracles.

24. Duke of Venice.

He Citie being deprived of such a Prince was possessed with a meruallous sorrow, but their desire to haue him againe was much greater. Yet neuerthelesse remembering the Common-wealth, they made halt the next day to elect another in his sted that was so much bewailed. Vitalis Candiano, sonne to Pietro Candiano the third, was by the generall consent declared Prince. At this mans entreatie; Vitalis, Patriarch of Grada, who till then for feare of the people had absented himselfe; was called home into his Countrie: And was soone after, by the Princes meanes, sent in companie of the Ambassadors into Germanie vnto Otho, who extremely hated the Venetians for the cruell death of Pietro Candiano. This Ambassade was to much purpose, for it did appease the wrath of Otho; wherein, the presence of Vitalis, sonne to the murdered Duke, did greatly auaille them, of whom he had a verie great care, taking order for his safetie; which he could not haue done, if he had dismissed the Ambassadors vnfinished.

In the meane space Duke Candiano fell grievously sicke, a yeare and certaine moneths after his election; and imagining hee could not liue long, deposing himselfe from his charge, and vowing all the remainder of his daies to a monastike life, he caused himselfe to bee carried to Saint Hillaries Monasterie, where within few daies after he dyed; and lies buried.

Duke of Venice.

Tribuno Memio, a great wise man, but of few words, was elected in his sted. This man although he was very wife (as we haue said) was not verie fortunate in his gouernment. For he was at times cruelly assailed by the conspiracies of his fellow-Citizens. And moreover, in his time the Morosini and Caloprini two verie noble families, fighting one with the other, with greater hatred than force, caused the people manie times to behold verie vile and bloudie spectacles: of the which I know not whether I may reckon that for chiefe and most cruell, which in likelihood, though not in effect, was done by Stephano Caloprini; who came with his children, allies, and diuers others of his faction, well armed, to assaile the house of Morosini, with an intent not onely to kill all the men, but wholly to extinguishe (if it had bene possible) the name of the familie. This armed troupe marched through the Citie, readie to fight, with as great boldnesse and hatred, as if it had bene against the publike enemy; wherat the people, being amazed, silently attended to see the issue thereof; when as the Morosini surprised perhaps, or else fearing their enemies, came not in fight.

The cruel intent of the Caloprini.

I know not whether they defended themselves in their own houses, or whether dispersed through the Citie (which some doe affirme) they hid themselves in this tumult among their friends and kindsfolkes; and did not shew themselves. But the Citie could not escape that daie from being coloured with the blood of her Citizens. For the mischief was, that albeit they fought not, yet nevertheless by chance there was a miserable murder committed. Dominico Morosino being met neere to the Castle was unluckily slaine by the Caloprini: They being afterwards called in question for this murder, (for they were sure that those of the contrarie faction, aided by Tribuna, did Arme themselves to revenge this iniurie) fledde with thier Capitaine Stephano, to Verona, to the Emperour Otho the second; vnto whom, for hatred of the Prince, and the familie of the Morosini, they promised that state of Venice.

Otho did willingly lend an eare to this offer, because hee perceived the practisers to be of the chiefe of the Citie: But before hee would assaile them by open warre, he would triue whether he could winne them by famine. He forthwith forbad, ouer all Italie, any traffike with the Venetians. He caused to be signified vnto them, that they should not enter into any of the Cities of the Empire, neither vpon trafficke, nor any other pretence: If they did any thing rashly, hee would holde them afterwards for open enemies. By these menaces they soone knew whereunto Otho tended. Hor shutting all manner of victuals from them, he meant to bring them to the last and most intolerable point of all miserie, which is hunger. But howsoeuer the Citie might be affrighted thereby, yet would not the Venetians seeme to be amazed, nor make shew to vnderstand whereunto Otho his desseignes tended; dissembling their griefe and feare; and resolving rather to endure all extreames, than to lose their libertie. The want of all necessaries grew already verie great in the Citie, when those of Capodarger, enioying the same priuiledges with them (as oftentimes one mischief follows another) reuolted against them. The inhabitants obtained of the Emperour for their reuolt, certaine inheritances of the Lauretans; to the end it might serue for a baite for others to doe the like.

But these things being done abroad, and the Citie in the meane time pressed with want of all necessaries, they began to laie all the fault on those of the faction of the Caloprini, which were neere to Otho, accusing them for that by their means and pursuite, the enemy laied all these trappes for them. Whereupon by a publick decree the houses of the Caloprini were wholly razed to the ground; their wiues and children committed to safe keeping; and the remainder of their goods confiscate. Otho in the meane space perseuering in his selfe-will, not to make open war vpon the Venetians, nor yet to haue peace with them, went to Rome; where being stricken with a sodaine disease he within few daies died. The Venetians were by his death (as at sundrie other times) deliuered from a great danger.

Adhelet, after Otho his decease, not willing to abandon the Caloprini obtained of the Venetians, that Stephano, and those who had followed him, should be repealed from banishment: which the Prince and people granting at Adhelet's request, and the Caloprini being returned into their Countie: it hapned that foure of the Morosini, remembering fore-past wrongs, did assaile and kill three brethren of the Caloprini, sonnes to Stephano, as they returned to the Palace, entering into a boate to goe home to their houses. The Duke was suspected, and the people beleued it, that this murder was committed by his consent; but hee cleared himselfe in open Assembly.

The same Prince gaue to Gionanni Morosino at his returne from Aquitain, whether he had accompanied Viscolo, Saint Georges Church which stands right ouer against the Market-place, with the Marshes adjoining, which were dependencies of the Dukes Chappell, vpon condition to build thereupon a Monasterie for the Religious of the order of Saint Bennet. appeare more notable among his fellow-Citizens. All these things thus executed, he was surprized with a grievous disease: by means whereof he voluntarily deposited himselfe: or (as some say) he was constrained so to doe by the people, the fourteenth year of his government, for that in the ciuill dissensions he had carried himselfe not like a iust Prince, but had euer fauoured one side more than another. He liued not long after: for so soone as he had made himselfe a Monke, he died forthwith.

Pietro Vrscolo was by the people declared his successor. This dignity was foretold him a long time before, as by a Diuine preface, by his Father who was a man of an holie life. During his government, the Venetians State did meruailously encrease both at home and abroad. First of all hee obtained of Bassius and Alexis (who at the same time did jointly command the Grecian Empire) that through all their Dominions, the Venetian Marchants should be free by Sea and land from all customes and tributes. He did moreover by his Ambassadors, purchase the friendship of the Kings of Egypt and Siria. Then did he win by bounty, and good offices, the greatest Lords of Italie. So soone as hee perceived a convenient time to reuenge all the wronges which the Venetians had receiued of the Narentines; hee forbad to paie them any more the accustomed yearly tribute, for the free commerce and Navigation of the coast of Dalmatia. The Narentines being thereby incensed against the Venetians, did sodainly rob and spoile: And not satisfied with their thefts at Sea, they came on shoare & spoiled the Countie neere to Zara: For that Citie alone, of all the rest of Dalmatia, was at the same time subiect to the Venetians. But the Venetians were not onely molested by these incursions, but all the neighbour-Nations Likewise: who after they had endured it with much discontentment for a while, perceiving the furie of these robbers, who abused their patience, daily to encrease, and foreseeing that those insolent people, would neuer giue ouer, vnlesse their attempts were assisted: Diuers Dalmatians, not finding themselves alone strong enough for such an enterprize, had recourse to the Venetians. The Ambassadors of Liburnia, and Histria, came thither likewise, being all of them sent for this purpose, to treat with the Prince in the name of their Common-wealths; That if he would send a mightie fleet into Dalmatia against the Narentines, to defend the Sea-coastes, and the neere neigh-neighbours thereof, from the thefes of these Pirats; that it would come to passe (which they in the name of their fellow-citizens did promise) that all Dalmatia along the Sea-coast, Liburnia, and Histria, would submit themselves under the Venetians dominion. The offers which the Ambassadors made, did puff up the Princes minde, and filled the whole Citie with great hope one day to be Lords of Dalmatia. Whereupon, fearing to loose such an occasion, they resolved to send forth a mightie Fleet. But before wee speake of the setting out thereof, wee must briefly make mention of the situation of that Prouince, fetching it from farre.

The Grecians called these Illirians, which inhabited the vpper parts of Macedonia and Thrace, from the Cahonians and Thesproti, vnto the River of Hister, 10 encreasing in breadth from the hills of Macedon and Thrace, euen to the Peonians, and the Ionian Sea, containing in all five daies iourney, and in length thrice as much. The which being measured by the Roman Authors, was found to containe 6000. stadij in length, and 1200. in breadth. Whereby it is apparent, that the Ancients haue called all that Illiria, which is contained within these limits euen to the Adriatick Sea: comprehending therein Dalmatia and Liburnia.

They five besides, that the Prouince, and the Nation, were so named by Illirius, sonne to Poliphemus and Galathea, sometimes Lords of that Countrey; that Dardanus, Taulanus, with others, were his children, from whom the Dardanians and Taulanians, people of Dalmatia, are descended. This Prouince, such as it is, did in times 20 past containe, according to the ancient diuision of the Cosmographers, Liburnia and Dalmatia. At this present all that Countrey which lieth from Histria, verie neere to Liburnia, which stretcheth it selfe towards the Adriatick Sea, and almost to the riuier Drillon, is called Dalmatia. Those who inhabited vpon this riuier, were the Dalmatians in times past. Since then, the Epirots being driuen forth of their Countrey, possessed this Prouince euen to Macedon: and all the Region is by the Moderns called Albania. In this sort Dalmatia extends it selfe more from the North to the South than from the East to the West.

Now the armie being in a readinesse, and the Soldiours shipt, after that Vrsolo had receiued the publicke ensignes in the Church of Oliuollo from the hands of 30 the Bishop, he sailed into Dalmatia. It was then the spring-time, and sailing pleasantly, he arriued first at Aquileia, after at Grada. Vitalis Bishop of the Citie accompanied with the whole Clergie and the people, went out to meete him, and after he had welcomed him: I take (saith he) Vrsolo this banner of Saint Hermagoras, which I will may be fortunate to thy selfe and to the Commonwealth: cause thy Soldiours to follow it, among the ensignes of their Countrey, and let them fight valiantly vnder it: I hope that thou wilt one day confesse, that this banner which wee giue thee hath no lesse aided thee in the obtaining of the victorie, than the strength and courage of thy people. We are not ignorant how that by valour all Commonweales are well gouerned; but they are much better, when they haue God for their guide. I doe accept (saith the Duke) this thy Prefage, and I pray thee, when we are departed hence, to beseech that good God to graunt vs a prosperous voiage, and victorie ouer our enemies. Then bidding him farewell, hee came with a faire winde 40 sodainly into Histria.

Histria is at this day the farthest Countrey of Italie, a neighbour in times past to Liburnia, and consisteth wholly almost of Islands: The Venetians first landing was at Parenza, but he was fearfully come to the Island next to the Citie, when as Andres Bishop thereof, accompanied with all the inhabitants, came forth to meete him, and committed his owne person his Citizens, and all their meanes, as well publicke as priuate, into the Venetians hands. The Prince beeing enuironed with troopes of Soldiours made his entrie into the Citie, where he did not faile to visit the bodie of Saint Maura.

The flecte being gone from Parenza, came to the Island neere to Pola, which is a verie ancient Citie of Histria, builded (as hath been said elsewhere) by the Colchitians ans. At his arriual, the Polani following the example of the Parentines, came with one accord, with Bercaldo their Bishop, to receiue the Venetians. Sundrie other people, who had beene a long time desirous to yeeld vnto them, ran to meet vnder their obedience.

Vrsolo, after hee had made some stay there, as well to giue audience to the Ambassadors, and to receiue their othes and homage; as to leaue new soldiours whom he imbarqued; he held his course towards Zara. That Citie was not long before yeelded to the Venetians, in regard whereof all the people went out to meet and receiue them with great ioy, calling them their Lords, and deliuerers. The Bishops of Coricta and Arba came thither soone after, with the Commissioners of their Cities, to sue for peace, and to receiue his command; swearing and protesting, inuolubly to performe whatsoever he should command them; adding thereunto, that they would in their praies make mention of the Duke of Venice, as they did of the Emperour. All things falling out thus luckily for the Venetians on the coast of Dalmatia, Murcemirus, who, after hee had banished his elder brother, did possesse the kingdome of Croatia (namely that Croatia the red, which the Modernes haue termed to be a part of Illiria, which extends it selfe from the desert plaines, which lie almost in the middelt of the Prouince, euen to Durazzo) fearing lest the Venetians, spurred forward by the happie fortune which accompanied him, would enter too farre into Dalmatia, made hatt by his Ambassadors to insinuate himselfe into the Dukes fauour, promising the Venetians all aide and succour.

The Duke in the meane time sent ten Gallies from Zara to spoile the Narentines Countrey: These Gallies surprised neere to the Island next to Belgrade, called by the inhabitants Chama, fortie Narentine marchants, who were returned from Apulia. Some saie that their comming was discouered by spies, and that therefore the Gallies were sent to meete them. The Duke, after he had refreshed himselfe, did forthwith follow them; but he found, that, before his arriual, those whom he had first sent had taken the Island, neere to the which wee haue said the Narentines were surprised. Whereby it came passe that vpon Vrsolo his arriual, the Ambassadors of Belgrade & Trahu, came thither likewise to receiue the Venetians government. These men did promise and sweare in the name of their Common-wealth, to remaine for euer obedient to the Venetians hauing of their own accord requested that it might be so. Trahu is an Island of Dalmatia ioining almost to the firme Land, with a Citie of the same name builded by the Issetes, Suringa of Croatia, brother to Murcemirus, was in this Island, who after the yeelding vp thereof gaue his sonne Stephen for hostage to the Duke, whom the Venetian did afterwards marrie to his daughter Hicela.

The flecte afterward departed to other places of Dalmatia. Spalatra, a verie rich towne in those daies, following the example of her neighbours, receiued the Venetians into her walls. After that, he went to Corcira the black, now called Cuscula, the which refusing to obey his commandements was taken by force: That being done, the Venetian Gallies came neere to the Ile of Pharos, (called likewise by the Modernes Lefina in sted of Pharos, by corruption of the language) where they espied a fort builded on great Rockes in the middelt of the Sea, which a farre off seemed impregnable to the beholders. The nature of the place had till then caused the Narentines to commit infinite robberies at Sea, who in case of necessitie had that place alwaies for an assured retreat.

There was likewise in the same Island a towne, stronge both by Art and Nature: not farre from whence the Venetian Marchants were wont to bee rob'd and taken. The Gallies at their arriual tooke the Hauon of the Island. Then they summoned the inhabitants to yeeld, willing them, by the examples of others, not to trie the furie of the Venetian armes: telling them that it was a follie for them to saie, that they had rather endure all shamefull extremities with the hazard of their liues, than to preferue their children, and their goods, by receiuing the Venetian quietly into their Citie. This was sundrie times told them, that they should beware, least by their obstinacie they did incense the Venetians against them: that after the assault should be begun, there would be no hope of composition. There was somelikelihood that they would willingly haue receiued a Garrison, and obeyed forthwith, if they had beene certaine to haue beene receiued on the same conditions as others were; but fearing (that which was true) that if the Venetians were masters of the Towne they would raze it downe to the ground, the loue to their Countrie, (which is that we chiefly loue) made them resolute to defend themselves and to beate backe the enimie. The Duke on the contrarie, so soone as hee had vnderstood the meaning of the townsmen, commanded to begin the assault. The Islanders did brauely defend themselves. There was a Castle (as hath beene said) inaccessible by reason of the steepnesse of the place: but the Venetians from the foote of the hill shot at once such a number of arrowes vpon the besieged, as being couered therewith like a cloud, they were constrained to abandon their places of defence. Then they which were in the shippes, with the hired Soldiours, did goe vp by the broken and pathlesse places of the mountaine euen to the toppe: Those within the Town being amazed to see them there, beganne to defend themselves, and the Venetians did furiously assaile them, and hauing set vp scaling ladders in diuers places, they beganne a cruell fight on either side. The hope to winne the Towne if they would a little striue to doe valiantly, encreased the Venetians strength; and despaiie possessed the other. A Tower in the meane time was taken by a few, who expelled the enimie from that side, and made themselves masters of the wall: Then those within being amazed flung downe their weapons, and vpon their knees cried for mercie. At this noise the gentle and mercifull Prince commanded to pardon those that were disarmed; and the Towne being razed downe to the earth by his commandement, he departed sodainly from thence, and came to Saint Marcus. The Commissioners of Ragusa with their Bishop came and met him, and submitted themselves to him and to the Venetian people.

The Duke after that, entering their Countrie in hostile manner, did put all to fire and sword. The enemies being amazed at this spoile sent their Ambassadors to sue for peace, which was graunted them on these conditions; To paye vnto the Venetians the iust value of all the losse they had sustained from the beginning of the warres, neuer after, to exact any more tribute; and not to suffer any Lord of their owne nation, or a stranger for them, and in their name, to spoile and robbe at Sea. The Narentines, who had made warre on the Venetians for the soueraignetie at Sea the space of one hundred three score and tenne yeares, with different successe many times, embracing peace, which was more necessarie, than honorable for them, did willingly accept these conditions. All the prisoners being set at libertie, the victorious Armie was embarked.

The Duke re-
turnes to Venice

The Duke, after hee had freed the Sea from Pirats, and brought all the Sea-coasts of Dalmatia, Liburnia, & Hiltiria, vnder the Venetians subiection, he returned with a prosperous winde to Venice: where hee entred, almost in a manner triumphantly (the true ancient triumphes being no more in vse) being emironed by the people, who highly praised him for his great victories vnto; whom after hee had related what he had done, and how by the grace of Almighty God, and his owne conduct, he had subiected to the Venetians all the Sea-coasts from Hiltiria, euen to the farthest parts of Dalmatia, with all the Islands neere adiacent, he was greatly extolled in an Oration: And it was decreed, that euer after, both he and his successors, should carrie the title of the Duke of Venice, and Dalmatia; beseeching God that the same might be prosperous to him, and to the Venetian Nation likewise. It was moreover thought fit to send new Magistrates to all the Cities of this new Prouince. It is thought, that Orso was sent to Ragusa; his sonne to Spalatraz; Dominico Polano to Trahu; Giovanni Cornaro to Sicore; (called Sibinica by the Modernes dernes) Vitalis Michaelis to Belgrade; and others to other townes, whose names the length of time hath worne out.

Vrscolo repaired the Citie of Grada; and with great cost caused diuers Palaces to be builded. He caused the holie bodies of Fortunatus, and Hermagoras, with those of Dionise, Largius, and Hermogenes, to be new-inshred. He caused likewise a goodly Pallace to be built at Heraclea, with a Church, according to those times; the town being then small inhabited.

He did in such sort terrifie Giovanni Bishop of Belluna, who troubled the Venetians, by a sodaine prohibition to his subiects not to trafficke in any fort with them, as hee did forthwith surrender whatsoeuer had beene taken (vnto which the commandement of the Emperor Orso could neuer induce him) withall & humbly sued for peace: which because it should last the longer, he would haue confirmed by a new alliance. He sent his young sonne afterwards to Verona to the Emperour Orso, who had sent for him by letters, whom at the holie Sacrament of Confirmation he named Orso, who was called before then Peter. He did moreover obtaine of the same Emperour diuers new immunities and priuiledges of Faies, & Ports. Concerning likewise the limits of Heraclea, which extended in time past to the Riuer of Piau, Giovanni Diacono (whom the Prince had sent to Verona to acquaint the Emperour with the conquest of Dalmatia) had commandement to treat with him about it, who easily obtained, that they should stand at the same stay, as they had done in ancient time.

Orso went to Rome, from whence resolving to returne into Lombardie, hee commanded Giovanni (who went along with him) to write to Vrscolo, that hee would be shortly at Rauenna, & from thence would secretly come to Venice, to performe a vow that he had made, and that therefore he desired to haue his coming kept secret, because his determination was to come thither in disguise and with a small traine. The Duke, meruailous ioyfull at these newes, did with a wonderfull affection attend the coming of such a guest. The Emperour in the meane space came to Rauenna, and from thence to Pomposia, a place verie neere Gloria at the mouth of the Riuer Po. Then in the night entering into a boat with fise of his household seruants, and Giovanni Diacono, he came with a faire wind to Venice. Hee went rather to the Monasterie of Saint Servula, than to anie Inne or Citizen house, to the end that his coming might be the better concealed. The Prince came to him by night in the same place, where after a reciprocall gratulation, for the arrival of the one in health and with a prosperous winde to Venice, and for the others happie exploits in Dalmatia, they came about mid-night into St. Marks Church, from whence, so soone as Orso had made his prayers and accomplished his vow, they went to the Pallace. And because each of them were verie desirous to haue the arrival of this new guest kept secret; so long as the Emperour staid in Venice, the Duke euerie day dined in publike, but hee suped in priuate with him. And to the end they might be alledged together not only by the law of friendship & hospitalitie, but by another more strict and holie band, Orso held a daughter of the Dukes, then new borne, at the Font, the same day he was baptized: He did for euer remit to the Venetians the Cloake of clooth of gold, which the Common-wealth by accord solemnly sworne to, were yeerely bound to giue vnto the Emperours. Being honored likewise by the Duke with diuers great and rich presents hee went back againe to Rauenna.

wisdome.

Three dayes after Orso was departed, the Duke commanded a generall assembly, where hee publicly declared how that the Emperour Orso had beene in Venice, in what manner he had beene at home with him for certaine dayes; and what he had obtained of him. It was verie pleasing to the people, and they greatly praised Vrscolo's wisdome for concealing the presence of so great a Prince. And because he had so well deferred of the Common-wealth, they permitted him soone after by a decree to associate Giovanni his sonne into the Principallitie; whom hee sent thus honoured honoured with the soueraigne dignitie, with his wife, and Otho his brother, to Constantinople, to the Emperours Constantine and Basilius; from whence they returned soone after to Venice laden with diuers rich presents.

Plague and famine in the City.

But because neuer anie humane prosperitie was seene to bee exempt from one troublefome accident or other of Fortune; it hapned thus, that before this old man, (otherwise most fortunate,) dyed, he saw by two extreame miseries, Plague and Famine, and by the decease of his sonne and daughter in law, hapned almost on one day, the course of his happie fortune altered. He was after that constrained to enter into controuersie with those of Cap-darger, and with the Sacceans, with the one for refusing to pay the tribute called Ripetta, and with the other about the Marques of the Lauretans: But he ended them both as he wished, to the profit and honour of the Common-wealth.

The Duke's last will.

At the same time the Phaledrini, a noble familie, caused the Church and Monasterie of St. Benedick to be builded, which they enriched with diuers great and goodlie inheritances neere adioyning. It is reported that the Duke was verie careful to end the reparations of the Palace, and the Church neere adiacent. Then by his last will he diuided his wealth into three partes. The first and greatest, hee bequeathed to his children; the second he would haue to be employed for the succouring of poore people and repairing of Churches: and the third to bee spent in his life time in publicke shewes, gifts, and liberalitie to the people. Those things being accomplished at home and abroad, hee deceased the eighteenth year of his government. His bodie, bewailed of all men, was carried to Saint Zacharies Church and there honorably buried.

His sonne, a young man of great hope, and worthie of such a father and grand-fire, men of great deuotion, did with the generall consent of all the Citizens succede him. Hee beganne his government with the same wisdom which all men expected, at what time Geica King of Hungarie being moued by the reporte of his great reputation, gaue him his daughter in marriage. Hee defeated the Hadrians neere to Lauretta, betwixt the mouthes of the Riuers Po and Adice: for that they had spoiled the Venetian frontiers; and hauing vanquished them, he made peace with them, vpon condition they should surrender both to the Lauretans that which they had lost lost, and should make no more incursions afterward. But it is reported that the Hadrians, who before that time had beene very mightie, did so sodainly decaille by the losse of Lauretta, as since then waxing daily worke and worse, they could neuer afterward reconer themselves.

About the same time Murcimirus (I finde in some Authours Herefimus for Murcimire) Lord of Croatia, did very much molest those of Zara contrarie to the agreement lately made, and did incessantly over-runne the whole Countrie. And the neighbour Cities likewise had already felt the furie of the Croatian Armies, when Otho resolving to reuenge it, marched against the Barbarians who daring to tarrie for him and to offer battaile, was by him verie easily broken and defeated. But those Authours whom we follow, doe not set downe, whether it were by Sea or Land. Otho pursuing this happie victorie, after he had scoured with his Armie all the Sea, coasts of Dalmatia, Liburnia, and Histria, which his Father had subdued to the Venetians, he entred vnder colour of taking notice of the State of the Prouince into all their Cities, and assemblies; he caused the inhabitants to make new oaths of fidelitie, that they should euer after continue faithfull to the Venetians, in the same manner as they had voluntarily submitted themselves, and not to permit any whatsoeuer to practise ought against their State. At his returne from Dalmatia, he was vnfortunatly surprisid by the conspiracie of Dominico Flabencio, who after he had shauen his beard, draue him into Greece, the fifth yeare after hee had taken the government alone vpon himselfe: where soone after he dyed.

Pietro Centranico or Barbolano (for both these surnames are found in this family) succeeded Otho thus banished. This man entring into the Gouvernement of his Countrie, which was full of troubles at home, and abroad, tooke great care which businesse to take in hand first. Yet neuertheless he thought it best to reduce the Citie into her former peaceable estate, being yet in an uproare, by meanes of this cruell conspiracie, and the banishment of this good Prince. In the meane time Pepin Patriarch of Aquila, presuming on the assurance of these troubles, and on the flight of the Bishop of Grada (for some write that Vrsus Bishop of that place after his brother's banishment fearing to be treacherously surprisid by those of the contrary faction, fled) seized on Grada, as though he ment to keepe it for Vrsus in his absence. Others affirme that it was taken by force, in the behalfe of Vrsus, from the Venetian Garrison which kept it, the which is altogether vntue. For if they had beene then friends, they would not both of them at the same time haue pleaded the controuersie of their Churches at the Councell held at Rome, not without great suspition of enuie and hatred; where it is reported that the Pope and the whole assembly declared the Church of Grada to be the Metropolitan of the whole Venetian Territorie. But it is certaine, that the Emperour Conrade was at the sametime in the behalfe of Pepin greatly incited against the Venetians, declaring himselfe in some matters their open enemy.

dignitie by the

In this state stood the affaires of the Venetians, when as Centranico after hee had commanded foure yeares, was (as some say) at the pursuite of Vrsus Bishop of Grada, taken by the people, hauing his head and beard shauen, and in the habit of a Monke was banished. He thus exiled, the people commanded Vrsus to take vpon him the publike Government, and to command as Duke, till such time as Otho his brother should be called home from banishment: Those which were sent for that purpose, brought backe word that at their comming into Greece they found Otho dead, a little before their arriual, as though it had so hapned by the diuine permission, to the end that this ingratefull Citie might not bee so happie as once againe to enioy such a Noble man, Sonne to so good a Prince, and himselfe so well deseruing of the Commonwealt, whom it had suffered to bee so ignominiously handled by the conspiracie of a fewe, against whom being able to haue opposed her selfe, yet would not. Vrsus hauing notice of his brothers death, did voluntarily depose himselfe, and went to his owne house, after he had commanded one yeare.

elo, usurpes the Dukes Pallace.*

Vrsus hauing retired himselfe, Dominico Vrselo moued rather by the reputation of his Ancesters (for he was neere kinsman to Otho) than by the fauour and consent of the people, seized indiscreetly on the Dukes Pallace. But the people mindfull of their libertie, foreseeing how vnlesse they did oppose themselves against the attempts of that insolent Citizen, that on a sodaine the euill disposed persons induced by that pernicious example, would without any respect vsurpe the Government, came the morrow after his entrance and assailed him, and had vndoubtedly slaine him, had he not secretly fled away to Rauenna, where soone after he died.

Dominico

Dominico Flabemico created by the generall consent of all men succeeded the short government of Vrselo. This man (as hath beene said) was the Authour of Otho his banishment; and therefore during the government of Vrselo Bishop of Grada, hee was banished the Citie as an enemy, but not long after, hee was repealed at the peoples request. So soone as he had received the government, hee propounded to the people, that he thought it fit and most profitable for the Common-wealth, to driue the familie of the Vrselos out of the Citie, as pernicious enemies to the publique quiet. He willed them then to assemble themselves, and to declare the Vrselos li vnworthy euer after to execute the soueraigne dignitie, or any other Office whatsoever: or to haue any authoritie to be present at the suffrages, and that they should adiudge them common enemies, and, as such, banish them. The people being ill aduised, hauing already forgotten the sundrie deserts and benefits of this familie, making themselves the ministers of an other mans hatred, did sodainly consent thereto. After this sort, this familie, till then famous, and which had afforded so many worthie men to the Common-wealth, was by this ignominie so dejected, as it could neuer after rise againe. He did likewise abolish the custome of associating a Colleague in the Principalltie, the which as most profitable is carefully obserued vnto this day. I find no memorable matter done by him abroad, but being oppressed with yeares he departed this life.

Dominico Contareno was by the generall consent of all men established in his place. Pepin in the meane time had molished all the places round about Grada, and for that time there was nothing decreed against him, in regard the City was then busied in affaires of more importance. Those of Zara had yeelded to the Lord of Croatia, or (as some write) to Salomon King of Hungarie. At the report hereof, (for it was to bee supposed, that vnlesse the Venetian Armie did speedily passe into Dalmatia, the other Countries which were now readie to rebell would soone after revolt from the Venetians) the Duke with a great fleet sodainly hasted to Dalmatia, besieged Zara; and tooke it by force. The report of the reprisall of Zara auailed much to containe the other Cities in their dutie and fidelitie.

ment.*

Pepin in the meane space tooke Grada the second time by assault, and did more harme at this entrie, than at the former. The Venetians iustly moued by this iniurie, determined before they would reuenge it, to aduētise Pope Benedict of the wrong which Pepin had done them, resolving that if he did not obey the Pope, who they thought would redresse it, to reuenge the losse of Grada by Armes. Pepin so dainely obeyed the Popes commandment; but being of an obstinate and turbulent spirit, he dyed (as some say) soone after miserably.

to Venice.*

Some write that Pope Leo came at the same time to Venice. But if they sent to Pope Benedict concerning the businesse of Grada (as hath beene said) following the opinion of diuers, I cannot imagine how the Popes name should bee so sodainly changed; which makes me to thinke that it hapned by the negligence of some writers, who haue set downe Benedict for Leo, or on the contrarie, Leo for Benedict, or that (which is most likely) that these things were done at sundrie times. They say the occasion of his iourne was to visite the body of Saint Marke: and they affirme that hee gaue diuers great priuiledges to his Church, and to diuers others in the Citie.

VVe finde also that about the same time, those of Apulia fought diuers times with Robert surnamed Guisard, a Norman by Nation, whose power at the same time was very great in Italie: The which neuerthelesse I dare not altogether affirme, because of all those Authours, whom wee follow, there is but one which makes mention thereof.

*Too great nicenes

His is all which hapned vnder the gouernment of Prince Contarino, who the fix and twentieth yeare of his Principalltie dyed: he was buried in Saint Nicholas Church, his funerall being followed by great multitudes of people. Domenico Silvio was by sodaine acclamation of the people; as hee followed the bodie, saluted Duke. He is reported to haue married a wife from Constantinople, so full of arrogancie and greekish pride, who (as saith Damian) was so nice and delicate in her manner of life, as shee would neuer wash with ordinarie water, shee neuer touched her meate but with a forke of gold, her Chamber was perfumed with such rare odours, as the senses of those which came into it were overcome with the sweetnesse thereof. luteneffe, which is so much the more dangerous as it is most excelliue. This most proude and curious manner of life procured her a very loathsome and stinking disease, so as she, who by her insolent pride would not vse the most necessarie element of water, because it was common to euery one, could not bee holpen or comforted by the same, nor yet by any other meanes, to cleanse the filth and infection of her bodie.

About the same time Dominico Bishop of Oliuollo decaased. Henrie sonne to the last Duke succeeded him, who altered the ancient name of Oliuollo, and would be called Bishop of the Castle, as they are now at this day.

mans were, and their Originall.*

It is reported that vnder this Princes gouernment the Normans were driuen out of the confines of Dalmatia. And because the Venetians haue had diuers warlike encounters with this Nation, we must speake something of them. They were then (as some Authors affirme) neere neighbours to the Sea-coasts of Guyenne, who after they had a certaine time scoured the Neighbour Seas, entred in tract of time vnder their Captaine Raoul by the Riuer of Loire into France. They ouerranne Lorraine and a part of Germanie with fier and sword; afterwards returning into France, Raoul made a league with king Charles the third surnamed the Simple, and being by him perswaded to become a Christian, of an Enemie hee became his Guest; and being named Robert, he married the kings daughter. By means of which marriage Charles gaue vnto him that Province lying vpon the Riuer of Seine, which hath beene since called Normandie, by the name of the inhabitants. This man, of whom I speake, was great Grandfather to that Robert, who came with an Armie into Italie, of whom we must say somewhat, to the end we may the more easily vnderstand, that which they haue done there.

*By what meanes
grew rich.*

Now at what time this yong Robert began to wax great on the confines of Lucania, and Sicill, the affaires of Italie were then in meane estate, as well by the new receiued losses, as by the incursions of the Saracens, who ouerranne that whole Province, and Sicill in like manner. But it is vncertaine whether this man or some other of that Nation, did bring the Normans out of France into Italie. For it is certaine that the same great Robert, who from the shoares of the Ocean Sea did enter by the riuer of Loire so farre into France, was great Grandfather to this man: So as perhaps some other of the Royall bloud might conduct the Normans into Trans-Alpine Gaule, which at this day, is a part of Italie, before his time. From thence it comes that diuers doe affirme, that this yong Robert marched first against the Saracens. Neuerthelesse howsoever it is, herein all doe agree, that at the same time almost, the Normans did driue the Barbarians out of Italie, and Sicillie, with manie throwlands of men slain on either side, and the Greekes likewise out of Calabria and Apulia. But after that the Norman forces, after manie and sundrie exploits, became suspicious to the Popes for that they were increased in Sicillie, and in a great part of Italie; more than was thought needfull for the safetie of the Lands of the Church and others; the common rumor was, that the Normans, after they had possessed Lucania, would seize on Campania. It is reported, that Pope Leor resolved at the same time, if he could not stay them by entreaties, and threats, to vse force. And hauing leuiued a mightie Armie for the same purpose, he fought with them with bad successe neere to Beneuentum: where after he had receiued a notable losse, he fledde forth of the battaile into the nearest Citie. Neuerthelesse hee was not discouraged at this losse, but being a man stout and couragious, he found new meanes and forces to driue them forth of Italie; but all his attempts proued vaine. He being dead, Pope Nicholas his successeur, not daring to contend with them, thought it much auailable for the safetie of the Churches Lands; if paying them a yerely tribute, he might oblige Robert to aide the holie Sea, when need should be making him by that means to acknowledge, that he did depend on another man. This is in a maner all that which some Authors haue set downe of the stirres of this Nation.

salpine Gaule, not making any mention of France; and they say that Tancred Lord of that Prouince had twelue children, among whom they highly esteeme two, that is to say, William surnamed Ferrabach, and Robert Guiscard. They doe moreouer denie that which we haue spoken of the Normans, to bee done vnder the conduct of Robert, but vnder his brother William. And besides, they do not set downe the matter like those whom we follow, but quite contrarie; That Campania and Lucania were neuer possessed by them, and that the Saracens were neuer driuen thence: but how that William jointly with the Princes of Campania and Salerno, marched against the Barbarians, who had already possessed Sicilie, and tooke into their fellow-ship Molloc, Gouvernour of Apulia and Calabria for the Greeke Emperour: by whose means being ioined altogether, the Barbarians were easily driuen forth of Sicilie. And that Molloc after the Island was taken againe, did seize on it, placing strong Garrisons in the Emperours name, vnto whom he said the Island did belong, and not to his fellowes: whereat the Norman beeing incensed did sodainly leaue the Island, & came the neerest way into the firme Land, & laid sege to Melphi in Apulia. For the relieuing whereof, Molloc leauing the Island, the victorie remained to the Norman, & Molloc being defeated with the losse of all his Armie fled into Greece: so that in the end the Normans beeing conducted by William made themselves masters of the greatest part of Apulia. But after they had a long time debated the possession of this Prouince, with diuers euents, it came to passe that the Emperour Michael with three of his children were driuen from Constantinople by Nicephorus. The Emperour delt with Robert Guiscard, who at the same time beseged Tarentum (for it is certain that vnder his conduct the Normans did in those daies flourish in Italy) to come to his aide into Greece, assuring him, that Nicephorus being vanquished (the which by his means he presumed easily to do) he should afterward haue the command of Greece. Whereunto Robert being likewise perswaded by Pope Gregorie did agree, and raising his sege on a sodaine, came to Otranto, where assembling and imbarcking such forces as he needed, he did put to Sea, and with a faire winde he landed first at Auellona, and from thence comming to Durazzo, hee beseged it by Sea and Land. Nicephorus sent Alexis with an Armie by Land, against Robert and the Emperour Michael, to enforce him to raise the sege of Durazzo. This man obtained of Prince Silvio in the name of Nicephorus, that the Venetians should send a mightie Armie against the Normans. Some saie that Nicephorus obtained it by his Ambassadors before Alexis comming, by means whereof the Venetian Prince, came with a mightie Armie against the Normans: and being come before Durazzo in the view of the enemy, he put his people in battaile, and without any long stay, came furiously against them. The enemies in like manner being put vp with their former victories, did courageously and without feare receiue the Venetian Gallies. The Enemies fought with such furie, as they seemed not alone to fight for the imperiall dignitie of one of their confederates, but likewise for their Countrie. The victorie was for a long time doubtfull: At the last the Norman Armie being broken, part of their ships taken, or sunck, and the rest fled, the victorious Venetian opened to those of Durazzo, the passage to Sea, which was before shut from them.

L He raising of the siege of Durazzo on that side where the battaile was fought, brought no great commoditie to the Venetians: For Nicephorus being wholly vndone by the sodaine rebellion of his people; the Norman after hee had repaired his flecte returning to besedge Durazzo by Sea and Land, Michael and Alexis (jointly possessing the Empire by means of Nicephorus ouerthrow) determined in the Venetians absence to succour the Citie, so that it is reported there was a cruell fight neere to the walles, and that the Greekes beeing vanquished, and one of the companions of the Empire beeing slaine, Alexis saved himselfe by flight, by means whereof the Durassians being constrained to yeeld, became subiect to the enemies power. And not long afterwards the Venetians in the behalfe of Alexis came against the Normans, almost in the verie same place where the first battaile was fought but the euent did much differ from the former. For the Venetians being vanquished, receiued so notable a losse, as of all that great flecte which Silvio had brought with him a small number was saved: part being drowned, and the residue taken. This purchased the Prince great hatred and enuie: For, at his return to Venice, the people deposed him in the thirteenth year of his government. Diuers do confesse, that the Venetians and the Greekes were vanquished before the Port of Durazzo, but that the losse was not so great as wee haue said it was; but only that the battaile was very bloody on either-side and that so sone as the Norman began to haue the better, Alexis fled on the left hand towards Peloponessus, and Siluis on the right hand towards Venice. Theydoe besides denie that hee was deposed from his government; but that the two and twentieth, or as others say the three and twentieth year of his Principalltie, hee fortunately deaced and was honourably buried in Saint Marks Church.

Silvia being dead, Vitalis Phalerio was with the generall consent chosen in his stead. His first propozition was no lesse honorable than profitable for the Common-wealth. For so soone as hee was declared Prince, he propounded to the People to send Ambassadours to Constantinople, to the Emperour Alexis, to obtaine of him, that Dalmatia and Croatia, which they had taken from the vltipers and purchased by right of warre, might for ever remaine to the Venetians. It was likely that the Emperour would easily grant their request, in regard of the kindeffne which he had lately received from them. The Ambassadours were Dominico Danulio, Andrea Michaeli, and Iacomo Auro. But in sted of these, I finde in some Authors, Ciani Vitalis and Antonio Alexis did freely graunt their requests, whereby the Venetians haue ever since by iust title possessed Dalmatia and Croatia. And Phalerio was the first (according to some Annalists) who in his titles did beare these Prouinces. I finde likewise that about the same time the Greekes and the Venetians fought vnder Phalerio before Durazzo with Guiscard, but the issue thereof was as successlesse as vnder Silvia.

The Emperour Henric came from Treviso to Venice to visit Saint Markes Church, whose miraculous apparition was a little before divulged euery where. His reported that for a tyme it was not known in what part of the Church his bones did rest, so as the comon people cryed out, that he had retired himselfe into some secret place, as though he meant to concale himselfe from the peoples sight: whereupon the whole Citie being desirous to know his resting place, prayers and fasts were appointed euery where; then diuers Bishops, being followed by the Clergie and people, came in procession to his Church, where it is reported, that after diuers prayers, he did miraculously show himselfe to his Citizens, by putting out of his armes forth of the earth : and that then to the peoples great contentment, his body was taken vp, and carried to a more honorable place : and it was decreed that none but the Prince and the Procurators of the Church, should know his resting place; and it is thought that at the same time they dedicated a new Church vnto him, more rich and sumptuous than the former.

Phalerio did afterward repair the Burrough of Lauretta decayed by antiquitie; and reducing it into the forme of a little Citie, he did enrich it with diuers liberties and priuileges, to make it thereby the more to be inhabited. After he had made this reparation (we finde no other matter done by him abroad nor at home) hee departed this life, the twelfth, or (according to some) the thirteenth year of his Principalltie.

V Italis Michæli was chosen in his place. In his time and vnder his government, a mighty Armie was sent into Siria for to recover the Cities and places of the Holie land. But because wee know that the Venetians haue had share in diuers great exploits executed by the Christians in Asia: I haue thought it not impertinent to touch briefly in order what was done there, to the end that by that which shall be set downe, it may be easily knowne what the Venetians did in that iourney.

The Author then of this warre (as some write) was a French Hermit, named Peter, who going on pilgrimage to the Sepulcher of our Lord Iesus Christ, did vnderstand of Simcon Bishop of Ierusalem, and of other Christians who were there in small number, in what dittres and miserable seruitude this holie Land, where the Saviour of the world did redeeme vs, was held by the cruell Mahometits: That there was no place in the fame, how holie or religious soeuer it were, which that abominable Nation had not till then, defiled and contaminated, by thefts, murders, & adulteries, adding therewithall the scourges, torments, and wrongs, which those who professed Christianitie did endure, who were of necessitie either to goe 50 from thence, or resolute to dye there miserably. To this was ioyned a great miracle: How that vpon Easter euen about mid-night, it seemed vnto Peter in his sleep, that Iesus Christ did call vnto him, inioyning him so soone as he should arrive in Italie, he should tell the Pope, and afterwards, all the other Princes of France and Germanie, that it would be pleasing vnto him, and that he did commaund them tered Italie with great furie. A verie great multitude of them leauing Scithia at that time, would staie in no place, til they had first seene how their friends and kindsfolke in Hungarie fared. These men by continuall frequentation with the Italians, being accustomed to the iournies of Italie, had for the most part changed their naturall crueltie and manner of life: by meanes whereof waxing more ciuill, they were driuen from the places which they had gotten by right of warre, by those that came after them. The crueltie of this Nation is reported to be such, as after that they had been in Hungarie, they abstained not from eating humane flesh after their countrie manner; who forthwith tooke vpon them the names of those whom they had driuen thence, and were called Hungarians. Those which were expulsed, were like-10 wife in times past called Huns, as well as the latter; And being come into Hungarie in the daies of Attila, they were afterward named Bauarians, then Huns; and certaine letters being taken awaie from both names, it was made but one.

These then after diuers warlike actions done as well in France as Germanie, after they had vanquished Lewis king of Germanie, and made him tributarie, carrying great store of bootie home with them, being proude of so good successe, resolved to make attempts on Italie; hauing perhaps vnderstood that they were at strife among themselves. By meanes whereof coming first into Misia, they defeated the Princes of the same in a bloudie battaile, and made them tributarie. Departing thence, vpon report that they determined to inuade Italie, Berengarius, who at the 20 same time held the Roman Empire, marched against them with fiftene thousand men, and they fought verie furiously vpon the confines of Italie, where Berengarius being ouercome, fledde from the battaile with the losse of the greatest part of his forces.

The Hunnes became more haughty after this victorie, and they entred Italie the neerest waie, putting all they met with to fire and sword; and coming to Treuise they tooke and spoiled it. From thence determining to goe to Milan, the report of the great wealth of the Venetians which began at the same time to be verie famous ouer all Italie was the cause, that on a sodaine they turned all their forces vpon the Venetians. They speedily made a great number of small light boates; which they covered (as it is reported) with leather, by reason that they were grossely made, and of a thicke substance. In these the Barbarians imbarqued themselves, and assailed Villa-noua (so was the ancient Heraclia called, after it was reedified) which, being taken at the first assault, they burnt downe to the ground. From thence marching to Equiline and Iesulunc, they destroyed them in the same manner. Then pursuing the course of their victories all along the Sea-coast, they spoiled Chioggia and Capodarger, and afterward burnt them. At the last they resolved to 30 assaile Rialto. The feare, which then fell vpon the Venetians, was not like to that which possessed them in the time of the French-mens warres. For this terror was much greater then the other. They fought with the French for their libertie. They must fight with these men for the safetie of their liues. Those albeith they were enemies, had in them some sparkes of pietie and Religion. The Huns did not only contemne godlinesse but all humanitie; for they did not spare the dead carcases, but like brute beasts they tare them in pieces and deuoured them. The euill disposition of this Nation had at the first report so terrified all people of each sex and age, as they did not alone bewaile the losse of their libertie; but their liues likewise. But (as it oftentimes hapneth) this despaire of theirs was conuerted into furie, and this furie into a desire of reuenge; or if that could not be effected, to die valiantly. This desire gaue them hope to vanquish the Barbarians, if they should attempt to hazard the fight.

It is to be supposed (for we cannot certainly affirme it) That the Venetians were 40 sodainly encouraged by some, by this manner of speech. That it was now time for them by their actions to shew themselves valiant men; That a mightie danger did not onely threaten their Countie, but their liues; That they had to doe with a kinde of people, who as little used to spare the bodies of the dead, as their liues in battaile. But yet neuertheless they were not made of iron, but their bodies might easily be pierced. That they should call to memorie how the ancient Venetians with a few inhabitants of the Latines, made no difficultie in their Countie behalfe to expose their liues before the walls of Aquileia, against three hundred thousand men; (for Attila had so many in his Armie) That the euert of that battaile did manifest, how much vertue and courage is better in warre than great multitudes: But it may be that some will tearme them rash and inconsiderate for their attempt, in daring to assaile the enemy with that sort of fight, wherein he was most expert: whereas on the contrary, they should rather haue fought with them at Sea, or in the Lakes, knowne better to them

10 than to the Barbarians: (then which, he said, nothing could be more acceptable to the Venetians, who from their youth are accustomed to the Sea) than in such a place where their valour might be most apparent. Moreover, that the enemies had neither the skill, nor shippes, fit for that purpose. That their Ancestors had in the same places, where they were now to fight, vanquished in times past King Pepin, followed with his owne forces, and with those of the Emperour his father: And that they onely fought for their libertie: whereas now, the danger of their liues did constrain them to defend themselves brauely. Now in regard that if they were ouercome, they were sure to die, he could not thinke that there was anie Cittizen so base or recreant but would rather choose to dye valiantly with his sword in his hand, then by yielding, to loose all he had, and to haue his throte cut, like a Sheepe, by a barbarous and 20 cruell enemy. He said, That the strength and magnanimitie of the Cittizens were such, as they were not onely sufficient to rebate the edges of the Hunnes swords who threatened them; but to free their Countie likewise from so wearisome a siege.

Being animated by these, or such like exhortations, they became courageous. For it were folle to imagine that a multitude of people, being amazed with the feare of their enemies, could be encouraged without some vehement Oration, full of perswasive speeches. All men, after that, ran to arme themselves, not onely to defend their libertie, but likewise, or rather; to preserve the safetie of their liues. The enemies in the meane space hastied towards Rialto. The Venetians imbarqued in their well-armed vessels, and fit for the fight, met with them neere to Albiola:
30 The fight at the beginning was verie cruell.

The attempts of the Hunnes were diuers; who relying on their great numbers, assailed them in sundrie places at once. The Venetians cuerie where opposing themselves against them, did brauely resist their assaults: They fought sundrie daies without any likely-hood of victorie to either side. But at the last, both partes ioyning their whole forces, the Barbarians were broken and defeated, and dispersing their troopes, fledde farre from thence, leauing to the Venetians a most famous victorie. The enemies (as some report) being loone after wonne by the rewards of Berengarius, departed out of Italie.

The Venetians grew famous, by gaining this victorie neere to Albiola. All 40 men said that the Venetians had abated the furie of the Hunnes, vnto whom Berengarius (a valiant and mightie Prince, by reason of the Empire of Italie) had giuen place. Hee did likewise greatly praise the absent Duke, by whose meanes and vnder whom all was done. It is to be supposed, that the Duke Tribune did at that time fortifie the Citie with a wall and chaine; and not for feare of the Pirates: the which certaine Historians doe likewise affirme.

to take by force that Countre out of the Infidels hands, wherein for the Saluation of mankinde it was his pleasure to be borne, and to die, where diuers and great tokens of his humanitie were yet to be seen: witness the little house wherein he was borne, the Temple, where being a childe he wept, and growne bigger had disputed, and at last being become a man had taught; The mounts of Tabor and Oliuet; this a place of praier; and that of his transfiguration; Pilats Pretorium; mount Caluarie, where his crosse was set vp; and his Sepulcher not farre from thence.

Peter being returned into Italie, had no other thought but to goe to Pope Vrban, vnto whom hauing deliuered his message, hee passed the mounts, and went to the other Christian Princes. In the meane space that hee in a manner ranne ouer all Europe, he forgot not by the way to exhort all men in his sermons to vndertake this holie voiage. But Pope Vrban comming soon after to the Councell of Clermont in Auergne treated of this matter with a verie vehement Oracion: the substance whereof was thus.

Pope Vrban his Oration.

That he was not departed from Rome, and come to that holy assemble for the affaires of the Church of Rome only, albeit it greatly needed to be reformed, but was stirred up by an other occasion, the which, as more holie, was likewise more notable: That he did not doubt, but that those there assembled had heard tell of what had befallen long since in Siria, and chiefly in the confines of that Region which is commonly called the Holy Land: The vniuersal usurpation of the Sepulcher of our Soveraigne Lord Iesus Christ (the which he could not utter without teares) by those cruell barbarous Saracens; that there was no Church, Altar, or any other sacred place, but was either razed downe to the ground by those cursed Mahometans, or converted to their prophane uses: that the Religious people dwelling there at such time as those enemies made themselves masters thereof, were constrained, some for feare of horrible punishment, to renounce the faith of Iesus Christ, and others that would persecute therein, were by sword and fire, and other sorts of torments miserably consumed: That deuout Matrons going thither on pilgrimage from all parts almost of Europe, had not beene onely forced by them to satiate their brutish lust, but likewise in contempt and derision of vs, tormented by monstrous embraces: That if that which he had related was not in their opinions sufficient to cause them to take Armes, and to prosecute reuenge, He besought them at least to consider, and call to remembrance, how that in a short time through the negligence of their Ancestors, the forces of Asia were encreased, and besides, how farre the Mahometans had in length and breadth extended their Dominions: How manie Countries they possessed, which did in times past belong to the Roman Empire. But would to God (said he) that the affaires of Christendome were brought to that passe, that we were but to complaine and bewaile other mens miseries. We haue (alas) scene in our daies Italie, wholly destroyed by their spoiles and iniuries; Castles, Cities and Churches beaten downe, and burnt by those Sacrilegious persons. But wherefore doe I relate the murders, imprisonments, rapes, and so manie other matters neuer almost heard of, which this Land hath endured a long time: seeing that Spaine likewise, and her neighbour Aquitaine, and all the Occidentall Prouinces, haue not only felt the like losse, but hauing at this day scarce dried vp their teares, doe stand in feare of the like. And ye ô Frenchmen (said he) albeit that this wound is not yet entered into your bowels; no doubt, but in regard of your neighbour-hood, you haue heard and seen likewise some-what of that, whereof I haue now spoken. And the Germans, and other Westerne Nations, who haue not as yet felt these losses, ought often to forethinke what dangers menace them from the East, nay rather, how nere they are to them already. I know not (said he) if the Venetians were not, (who with strong Garrisons defend the Sea-coasts, and who haue often repulsed this cruell enemy from Hellria and Dalmatia) whether this storme would (ere this) haue bene blowne euer into Hungarie and Germanie. The power of the Greeke Empire, which whilst her strength and vigour lasted, was wont to be the Bulwarke of Europe on the East and West side, is in such sort ruined, as the Emperour dreames on nothing but on meanes and forces whereby he may conserue his Citie of Constantinople; which place if we had lost (as God forbid) we may easily coniecture how great (such a losse would be, as well to Europe as to him. Tremble with horror, when I doe but thinke what will happen, if this fire be not quickly quenched, which daily doth more and more kinde. All the miseries, which those haue felt whom we beuaile, hang ouer our heads. Men and women shall be referred to satisfy the luxurie of those barbarous people: and ye will hereafter lament, when it will be too late, that hauing had me mee, you haue not opposed your selues against these miseries. It may be you thinke, that this cannot come to passe. Now more did they who haue since felt it. And would to God wee did not so often feede our selues with vaine hope. But it were better (ô courageous spirits) whilst we haue strength, counsell, aide, power, and monie readie, and generally what soeuer may giue hope of a victorie, to diuert this euident perill from vs. Nor is our enterprise aboue humane strength. That Charles, surnamed the Great, in a manner your Countirman, (ô ye Germans) in regard of the descent of his Ancestors, and your king (ô Frenchmen) and the glorie of your name, did driue the Saracens forth of Spaine and Aquitaine: The same Charles constrained them to leaue Italie. The same Charles (of whom yee so much vaunt) did recouer Ierusalem which yet erre Holie, and driue thence the enemies: And by how much his glorie and reputation is great: by so much the more ought it to incite you which are descended from him, to attempt some new exploit which may augment this your ancient renowne. If ye do not thus; but giue your selues to rest and idlenesse, yee shall not only hazard what your Ancestors haue left you, but you shall suffer the native Countre of our Soveraigne king, to your great shame and contempt, with that of all Christendome likewise, to be trodden downe by these cruell enemies; and his Sepulcher, Temple, and other holie places to be polluted by murders, rapes, and sacriledges. Arme your selues then in time rather, and desace this common infamie: Purchase to your selues and to all Europe assured safetie. I thinke you may easily doe it. For by how much your forces surpass those of Charles (if ye all iointly vndertake this voiage) by so much more shall the victorie be certaine and easie for you. The victors profit shall be great & inestimable by the spoiles of so opulent a Nation, and such rich kingdomes: But the Celestiall reward shall be much greater; the which in the name of Almighty God, we promise to as many as shall fight valiantly.

It is reported that when the Pope had ended his speech, the whole assembly cried out, that it was Gods will to haue it so: Then the Pope hauing commended silence, replied. Goe then (quoth hee) yee generous spirits, and let that which ye haue all, with one accord, now spoken, be your watch-word in this warre, and let as many as meane to vndertake this iourney, few a Crosse of red cloath on the right side of their garments. They reported a very admirable matter, the which I should hardly set downe, were it not for the assurance that we haue, that God doth euer assist holie enterprises; Which is, that the same day that the warre was resolved vpon at Clermont, it was knowne and diuulged to the farthest Regions of the earth.

But whilst Pope Vrban and the rest did labour about the choice of a Captaine in the assembly, the which besides other matters had giuen great hope to all men, and that this businesse had kept them there certaine dayes: it is reported, that diuers thousand of men affecting this new warre came thither: And that soone after, three hundred thousand armed men were in a readinesse to march.

The leaders to these great numbers of Christians, were Godfrey of Bouillon, Eustace, and Baldwin his brethren, Raymond Earle of Saint Giles, and Robert Earle of Flanders, Hugh, surnamed the great, brother to Phillip the French King, Stephen Earle of Chartres, the Bishop of Puy, and Peter the Hermit the Author of this enterprize.

This man, because hee would bee scene to haue some cheife command in this warre, came with Baldwin and his brethren, through Germanie, Hungarie, and Thrace, to Constantinople, accompanied with troops of souldiers. The Bishop of Puy, Raymond, Hugh the great, passed into Italie with greater forces; and came to Rome to visit the Pope. From whence they departed in three troopes. The one marched directly to Brundisium, the other to Barri, and the third to Otranto. But Beaumont sonne to Guiscard a valiant Prince, being incited before by the report of this gallant enterprize, did ioyn his forces with those which passed through Apulia.

Peter the Her-mite, ignorant of Martiall discipline.

Whilest the troopes which were in Italie made themselves ready to march, Peter the Hermit, who was arrived at Constantinople with the three brethren of Bouillon, so soone as he had crossed the Bosphorus of Thrace, the next and shortest way, he passed over his troopes into Asia; which the Emperor Alexis (as it is reported) did soone enforce him to doe, in regard his souldiers observed no martiall discipline, but gaue themselves licentiously to all manner of euill. The which, Alexis with others did impute wholly to the Hermit, being altogether ignorant of martiall discipline and vnworthie to haue any command; by meanes whereof diuers did report that the Emperour caused Peter, whether he would or no, to depart formost into Asia, where his Army soone after marched towards Nicomedia and Nicaea.

Raymond a German chosen in the Hermits first

But because it did manifestly appeare, that vnlesse some other besides the Hermit, (who was more religious than martiall) did take charge of the Armie, it was likely at the verie first encounter to fall into great danger: they chose Raymond a German by nation, and a verie warlike person, for their Generall. By the which election we may easily coniecture, that the brethren of Bouillon came not with Peter to Constantinople: or if they did come, after the Hermit was gone into Asia, they remained with the the Emperour Alexis, till the rest of the forces were arrived.

The Infidels aduertised of the Christians en-
terprize.

The Sarracens, who had bene aduertised of the resolution of the Councell held in France, and of whatfoeuer the Christian Princes had since then enterprised in this warre; did determine by Ambush to surprize those who should first come into Asia; to kill them; and then to resist the passage of the rest ouer the Bosphorus of Thrace: Raymond hauing marched on the Territorie of Nicaea, without sending forth his discoverers, fell into Ambuscado, and retired with great losse of his people to the Citie of Exgora. This place had bene of set purpose abandoned by the enemy: who so soone as they perceived the Germaine to be within the Towne, came sodainly and besieged it on euery side. Raymond being wearied with that long siege, of a Captaine became a fugitiue, and with certaine others went to the enemies side. The Citie after that was valiantly defended for a time, but at the last the enemy tooke it; and the most of those who were within it hauing bene tormented with hunger, thirst, and infinite other miseries, were put to death, either by the sword, or by some other accident of warre; all those which yielded, were likewise put to the edge of the sword. The Hermit in the meane time seized on the Citie of Cynita, which was forsaken by the inhabitants; and hauing fortified it with those few forces which hee had, hee ioyned himselfe with the troopes, at such time as his Countreimen arrived.

The French ar-
antinople.

Whilest these things were done in Bythinia, Hugo the Norman, the Earles of Flaunders and of Chartres, departed from Barri, and with a faire wind arrived at Durazzo. Then at the intreatie of the Gouernour of Dalmatia in the name of the Emperour Alexis, they marched in bands, and at sundrie times, to Constantinople, for feare least so great an Armie marching all together should spoile the Countrey: whither being come, as into a place of safetie, it is reported that Alexis did lay snares for them; as one who from the beginning had greatly suspected their enterprize. But being reconciled to Baldwin, Godfrey and the rest, The Bishop of Puy and Raymond did arrive, who had conducted their troopes through Dalmatia, Albania, Macedon and Thrace.

Alexis practiseth
treachery.

Beaumont, who for his fathers and his owne particular enmitie with Alexis, thought not himselfe safe if he should come into Greece, sailed with a direct course from Brundisium into Morea; and from thence marching in battaile (as if he had bene beene to fights, through the higher Misia and Thrace, to auoide the trappes of Alexis, and came into Asia sooner than hee was expected; where after he had taken a Citie of the Heretics; spoiled and ouerthrowne it; and being come to the banks of the riuer Barbara, he caused part of his forces to passe ouer at a foord, and kept the residue with himselfe. But the morrow after by breake of day, Alexis forces amaze them at the first; and had vndoubtedly much endangered them, if Beaumont had not speedily come to their rescue with two thousand horse, which he had ready for the same purpose; at whose coming, the Greekes retired themselves. And by this means Beaumont perceiuing that there was no place free from the ambushes of Alexis, he resolved still to march in order of battaile. But the Emperour, after he had in vaine made all these attempts, thought it his best course to make an atonement with him, and to that end sent his Ambassadors to him, laying all that was past vpon the malice of certaine people desirous of spoile.

Alexis and Bea-
mond reconciled

It is reported that Alexis did afterward more esteeme of Beaumont than of all the rest of the Princes and Captaines of the Armie, whereunto the meekenesse and courtesie of the Norman did incite him, so as after his coming to Constantinople, he did so farre insinuate himselfe into the Emperours fauour, as he freely promised him to furnish the Armie with new succours, horses, garments; weapons and all other necessaries. But yet neuertheless, because he would seeme to haue care of his owne affaires, he said, that his meaning was to performe his promise; provided, that the Captaines would promise and sweare, not to attempt any thing against himselfe, his State, and subiects; and that all the Cities which they should take in Asia (Hierusalem excepted) should be reduced vnder the gouernment of the Grecian Empire. This thus concluded: the whole troopes were forthwith transported into Asia; Beaumont only with certaine others remained with Alexis, to further the dispatch of victuals and other necessaries. The Captaines in the meane time being come to Nicomedia, so soone as they had vnitied their forces, resolved first of all to assaile Nicaea. Wherefore dislodging thence, they came through Forrests, and by-ways before the Citie; and the siege was planted before Beaumonts arrival at the Campe, by reason of his long staie about the sending away of victuals and other necessaries.

A new agree-
Alexis and the Christiā victors.

At his arrival, Nicaea, the cheife Citie of Bithynia, (called at first Antigonā, by Antigonus her founder, and since then, Nicaea by Lysimachus, in fauour of his wife) was assailed in three severall places. This Citie was reasonably strong by situation, and much more by arte, being compassed about with verie high and thicke walles, the towers builded four-square: the fourth part whereof towards the South is wated with the lake Ascania. They forthwith erected engines of batterie, and wooden Castles of the iust height of the Citie walles. Then they brought thither the ramme, and other warlike engines. They did likewise vnder the mine. The Citie, besides a great number of inhabitants, had likewise store of armed souldiers in garison, and euery day new supplies came to them by the lake in their steeades that had bene slaine or hurt: So as they were sure that whilest the passage of the lake should remaine open, Nicaea could neuer bee taken. Wherefore it was concluded, for the hindering of the enemies passage, to send to the Emperour Alexis, and to entreate him, that with a certaine number of shippes hee would shut vp the lake from the enemies. Alexis fulfilled their request, but not sodainly. For whilest he made readie his shippes, threecore thousand Turkes, with certaine troopes of Sarracens, came and camped on the hilles next to the Citie, whereof they sodainly aduertised the besieged by the lake, which was not yet shut from them, to the end that on a day prefixed they should make a sallie on the Christians, on the same side as they should on a sodaine assaile their Campe. The alarm began in the Bishop of Puy his quarter, who was encamped on the East-side, where the French did not onely with great valour receiue the enemies forces, but running all the rest, they seized on the towne of Soccor, by means of certaine Christians that were within it, where they remained till such a time as the souldiers had made prouision of victualls for fise dayes. But being departed from thence, so soone as they had surprisid the Citie of Sura, and the Forte of the Imposts, with certaine other small townes in the Territorie of Sura, they laboured by a very straight path to ascend the top of Mount Taurus.

This way, which was but a dayes iournie, was no lesse dangerous than painfull. It was verie narrow by reason of the flint-stones, and sharpe rockes which hem'd it in on the one side, and with a very deepe vally on the other, which was off so fearefull a depth, as it did amaze the beholders: the troopes were a whole day passing this way not without the great care and heede of the Captaines, and the greatest part thereof they went on foote. There was none so hardie in the whole Armie as durst ascend those steepe places on horsebacke, but they threw their cloakes and baggage on their horsebacks for to make themselves more apt and disposed, to overcome the danger of the way. It is reported that the same day diuers sumpter-horses, which were laden, fell head-long downe into the valley; some of them by chance; and some likewise were throwne downe of purpose, by those, who saw no possibilitie to bring them vp to the top of the hill.

Having passed these mountainous freights, they came to the Citie of Murafis which forthwith yielded vnto them. From thence they discouered such huge and spacious plaines, as their sight was dazeled with beholding them. In the midst of that plaine they espied Antioch, whither all the Captaines ment to march, and to besiege it. Being come downe into the valley they descried the enemies a farre off vpon a Riuer side, which runnes ouerthwart the plaine. These men were sent by the King of Antioch, to conuey the victualls, which was to come to the Citie from the mountaines. Against these were certaine light horse sent, who at the first charge brake and defeated them, part of whome being slaine, the rest fled to the Citie. There were taken the same day, a great number of sumpter-horses, and great quantitie of victualls, which as most necessarie were brought to the Armie to the great content of the victorious. They came afterwards to the riuer neare to Antioch, the which by the inhabitants is (as they say) named Farfar, as it will easily bring vs forth of the Historians darknesse. For there is an Antioch in Pamphilia, neighbour to Seleucia; and an other more excellent than that in Phenicia, builded by Seleucus Nicanor, sonne to Antiochus surnamed Ephiphanes, through the which runs the riuer Orontes. Towards this then marched Beasmond, Hugo, and the rest, and understood by certaine prisoners that Caspius was King of this Citie, and Tributarie to the King of Babilon: who vpon this occasion had sent diuers thousands of men to guard the Citie, who were esteemed so strong and valiant, as none in a manner durst fight with them; much lesse attend them.

The commaunders were not amazed at these speeches. Chiefly Beasmond who conducted fise legions, did the next morrow by breake of day march directly towards the Citie, where he did fiercely assaile the enemies, who were vnder the walls in order of battaile. But the necresse of the walles and their other munitions, which constrained the assailants to retire, was the cause that both sides did not fight with all their forces; by reason whereof this fight was made rather in hast, than otherwise. But how light soeuer it was, it lasted euen till night, at which time Beasmond retired to his fellows. After that, they made a bridge vpon the riuer, which was directly betwene the Citie and their Campe; and they incamped in such sort, as it was besieged on all sides, sauing on the part next to the mountaines, from whence they perceived no possibilitie to free themselves from the enemies incursions.

the other of great square stone, with foure hundred and threescore towers, with a Citadell on the East side thereof so strongly fortified, as it did not feare the assaults of the enemies. There was besides not farre off a lake abounding in fish, and meruailous fruitfull plaines, watred with riuers and fountaines, twelue miles distant from the Sea of Cilicia. It is reported that Saint Peter in the Churchs infancie did there establish his See, which did afterward greatly illustrate the Citie.

The Campe at the first wanted no victualls: for ripe grapes hung on the vines: and the whole Armie was along time fed with great store of corne, found in wells where the Countreimen did vse to hide their graine, and besides they brought at times great store of cattell to the Campe, taken stragling in the neighbour vallyes by means of certaine Armenians, Christians by profession, inhabiting the tops of the neighbour-mountaines, who for that they had constantly persecuted in Christian religion, after Hierusalem was taken by the Saracens in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, could neuer since obtaine of the cursed enemy a dwelling place, vntill at the last Carphar the Egyptian, permitted the Bishop and a few with him to inhabit the fourth part of the Citie, neare to the holy sepulcher; paying a certaine yearly tribute. But being driuen forth of Hierusalem, vpon the report of the Christians comming into Asia, they retired themselves into the mountaines neare to Antioch.

Now whilest the French-men and Germans performed these warlike exploits in Asia, the Venetians (I know not whether of their owne proper motion, or incited at the intreatie of the Pope and the Emperour Alexius,) sent a greater Armie than euer yet they had done, into Ionia: the which I finde to be of two hundred vessels of all sorts, and vnder the conduct of Hieronimus Contareni Bilhop of the Castle, and Michael Vitalis the Dukes sonne.

Some neuerthelss doe affirme, that the Venetians came not into Asia, till Hierusalem was taken. But I cannot beleuee, that a Nation so mightie at Sea as were the Venetians, would be idle during these great sturres in Asia and Europe; especially at such a time when as they might perceiue all the Sea-coasts from Hellepont vnto Pelusium, at the mouth of Nilus, to be exposed for a prey: the which in a short time, with neuer so little labour, they might easily take from the Mahometans. The Venetians being come to Rhodes: it is reported that they fell at words with the Pisans, who were likewise arriued in the Hauen with a great Fleet; and falling from words to blowes, they fought on either side like enemies. But the Venetians getting the vpper hand tooke eightene Gallies from the Pisans wherein were foure thousand men. It is not knowne wherefore, nor vpon what occasion the Pisans durst buckle with the Venetians, seeing they were mightier than they: but hauing taken them, because they perceiued them to weare redde Crosses, they sent them and their vessells away, detaining thirtie of the chiefeest Gentlemen among them for hostages. From thence they sailed with a faire wind into Ionia; where at their first arriual they tooke Smyrna vnprouided of a Garrison. From whence it is said, that the bodie of Saint Nicholas was brought to Venice, and laid in the Church, dedicated vnto him, on the shoare.

This is all which some report the Venetians did in their first iourney. But others doe set downe, after the taking of Smyrna, all that which they did in Syria, which is not impertinent. For whilest their Fleet was preparing at Venice, they tooke in fish supplies in Dalmatia, and came first to Rhodes; then to Ionia where they tooke Smyrna; and afterwards they scoured the Seas of Pamphilia, Cilicia, and Syria. The Citie of Antioch being taken, the French Captaines did not onely besiege Hierusalem, but tooke it with ease. For it is certaine, that the Venetians, departing from the Hauen of Ioppa, from whence they had driuen the enemies Armie, at the Princes first arriual in Syria, came to Hierusalem, and then besieged the places round about. But wee will hereafter make mention of that which they did in Syria.

The first day that the Armie dislodged, it came to Bethlem; from thence to Zabbarim, where they were in some want of water; the third day they camped on the Riuer of Braim; departing thence they came diuided in five troopes ouer steepie mountaines, and rocks, not without feare of ambushes, to Berithon a Sea-town; and from thence to Sagitta: At the last they came on the tenth day to Cesarea: where after they had rested two daies, they marched in battaile to Ramolles, which the enemies had forsaken for feare. The 3. day after, about sun-rising, those which were in the Vantgard, descried not farre from thence the Walls of Ierusalem: At 10 this first discouerie they made a great shout in signe of ioy; some honouring the name of Christ our soueraigne king with great reuerence; others vpon their knees weeping for ioy, did salute the holie Citie and the holie Sepulcher. He Citie of Ierusalem which we may properly terme holy, is (as wee haue learned,) seated on a high place enuironed almost on euery side with very high mountaines, hauing neither fountaines nor Riuers neare to it, but only Siloe, which Iosephus calleth a fountaine, and others a riuer. This which we cannot call a riuer for the small quantitie of water which is in it, running from mount Sion, passeth through the vale of Iosaphat. The Territorie neare to the Citie is very drie and barren, and is full of Cisternes to receiue raine water. The Solymi which were sometime called Lycians according to Herodotus, were the founders of this Citie, as the verie name it selfe doth witnesse, and Cornelius Tacitus doth affirme it, in that place where he speakes of the antiquitie of the Iewes. Homer neuerthelesse singing the praises of the Lycians, doth seeme to make a difference betwixt them and the Solymi. His verse is thus;

This man againe warr'd on the Solymi,

50 Meaning Bellerophon, who was descended from Lycia. Concerning the Religion, and ancient manner of life, which this Nation vsed, it shal not be amiss to set down what Strabo a man verie much addicted to Paganisme hath written thereof. For there is no man almost, but hath either read or heard what the Authours of the holie Scrip-

Scripture haue set downe concerning the antiquitie of this place. It is good then, and (I say) lawfull, to know how neere some, who were stifled with Paganish superstitions, haue approached to the knowledge of the truth.

The common report (saith he) of matters beleued concerning the temple of the Ierosolimitans doth affirme, That those, who are now called Iewes, are descended from the Egyptians: For Moses, a Priest of Egypt, being possessed with a certain Idea of Religion, detesting the vaine institutions of his owne Countrey, came from thence into Palestine, followed by great numbers of people highly deuoted to Diuine matters. He taught them how greatly the Egyptians did erre, to attribute the name of God to brute beasts; and the Grecians likewise, to represent their Gods vnder humane pictures and figures: And that the same thing was God which had created vs and the whole world beside, which we call Nature; the figure of whom, no man how wise soeuer, durst vnderstand to present; That it behoued them then to reiect all those Images and Idolls, and to build a Temple to the only God, wherein to worship him without any superstition: And that those who should liue chastly in all integritie and righteousness, might hope for happinesse; otherwife not. Strabo did not know all. But it is altogether necessarie to vnderstand, how an Ethnick, brought vp in superstition, doth approue that which is directly contrarie to his law. For he doth sufficiently approue that which he doth not reprove, and chiefly that, which hee knoweth to be openly repugnant to the dreames of his Religion. But (as I said) he knew not all. For, concerning the portraits of the Diuinitie, hee seemeth as much to reiect our custome as theirs. And to speake truth, as much as they did it foolishly, we do it wisely, with an other kinde of consideration. Now Moses, after he had thus perswaded a great multitude of people, brought them in to the same place where the Citie of Ierusalem now stands, the which hee possessed, with so much the more ease, as for the barrenesse thereof it was desired of none; being no such place as was worth the contending for by Armes. For the place, whereon the Citie is seated, is verie stonie, and ill-provided of water. Strabo would heereby inferre, That Moses, and those which followed him out of Egypt, were the founders of this Citie, and not the Solymi. He sets downe besides, That there was a Quarrie of stone found in the Citie, two hundred and fiftie foote in length, and threecore in breadth, wherewith that most magnificent Temple was builded in the Citie, from the foundation, euen to the toppe thereof: whereof diuers haue so largely written; and principally Iosephus in his Historie of the Iewes.

But so soone as straying forth of the right way, they gaue themselves ouer; first to tyrannic; then to couetousnesse; and vnto all other vices: it came to passe, that by a iust iudgement of God, the Citie hath not bene only once, but many and sundrie times, and in diuers manner, taken and afflicted. For omitting that which went before the time of Alexander the great, it is written, That the first Ptolomee, king of Egypt, did wholly destroy it: Then in succession of time, vnder the happie gouernment of Titus sonne to Vespasian, it received so much the greater losse, by how much before then it had offended: Soone after that, in the daies of the Emperour Adrian, and then after him, these losses following one an other, it had no leasure almost to breath in the midst of so manie miseries, which haue continued euen to the time of this iourne. In this manner the Holie Land, otherwife happie, hath been a long time tormented vnder the cursed Empire of Mahomet, who cruelly possessed it, at such time as the Christian troopes did arriue.

Now after the Princes had viewed the situation of the Citie, they resolved to assault it in three seuerall places. The Earles of Flanders and Chartres encamped on the North-side, neere to Saint Stephens gate; (for neere therunto is a Chappell of his name, because it is thought, that he being throwne out of the Citie, was stoned in the same place) Godfrey and Tancred on the West-side; and Raymond neere to mount Sion, toward the South. So soone as the campe arriued, certaine skirmishes were were made on both sides, as occasion serued. And the Armie in the meane time wanted no victualls, as it did before Antioch, by reason of the Sea which was not far off; as also for that they possessed diuers strong townes in Palestine. They attempted at times, during the siege, to take the Citie by Scalado, but it was in vaine. At the last, bringing wooden Castles, and other warlike engins, before the walls, the batterie was somewhat more furious than before; and a breach being made they marched to the assault, which lasted from the day-broke till noone, with a great slaughter of our men, the which did howlerly encrease, without anie likelihood of waxing better, had not Baldwin, followed by a troope of Soldiers, mounted the wall on boards, 10 which the enemies had there placed to catch our engins, which were brought before the walls. For a while it was doubtfull what would become of them. But the Citie-gate in the meane time being broken open, and the wall neere therunto beaten downe by the Ramme, the victors entring on euerie side, the enemy retired, where at their first entrance they made in all places a meruailous slaughter, without exception of sex or age. Dauids tower, fortified in manner of a Cittadell, was forthwith yielded vp. All the furie of the fight was neere to the Temple, whither great multitudes of people were retired. They fought there with great losse on either side. Despaire encouraged the one, and shame the other; because the Citie being taken, the Temple was possessed, and kept from them by a few. Yet neuertheless 20 they entred it by force, and ranne so courageously vpon the enemy, as being thrust forward in front by those which followed them, they which first entred were constrained to fight hand to hand, with the whole Squadron of the Armed enemy, and were besides thrust forward, by those which were behinde them, vpon the points of their swords. The enemies in the meane time did valiantly defend themselves, whom the imminent danger did constrain to fight with hazard of all things. Therefore the fight was verie bloudie, not onely at the entrie of the Temple, but in the midst thereof. And so great was the slaughter as well of the victors, as the vanquished, as the blood, which was spilt on the pavement of the Temple, was a foot deep. In the end, the vppermost part of the Temple being not yet taken, the retreat was 30 founded a little before night. The next morrow, after commandement was giuen not to hurt those that were disarmed, they which defended the higher part of the Temple did sodainly yeeld.

In this manner was the Citie of Ierusalem taken in the yeare of our Salvation 1099. and foure hundred fourecore and ten yeares after it was taken by the Infidels, and the thirtieth day after the Christians had besieged it. Godfrey of Bouillon was by the consent of all men saluted king: who after he had receiued all the Roiall ornaments, (except the Crowne) would by no means be crowned; saying, That it did not become a Christian to weare a Crowne of gold in the same place, where Christ, the soveraigne king, had wore a Crowne of thornes.

40 Whilst these things were done in Ierusalem, fearefull newes was brought, that great multitudes of enemies did approach. To meete whom, Godfrey, after he had left a good Garrison in the Citie, marched almost as fast as Asdona. There they fought a bloudie battaile, which for diuers howers space inclined to neither part. In the end the enemies were broken, and put to flight, with great losse. Some saie that there died the same daie an hundred thousand men. The prisoners that were taken did report, That the number of their Armie was fise hundred thousand fighting men.

During this happie successe in Syria; the Venetians, departing from Smyrna, after they had coasted the Seas of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, they arriued in Syria, 50 and kept the Hauen of Ioppa, taken before by the Christians. But I dare not affirme, that the Venetians being departed from Smyrna, did arriue in Syria, before that the holie Citie was taken. Neuertheless it is certaine, that the French, being encamped before Ierusalem, were releiued with victualls comming from the Sea. The which I can not see how it should be done by any other, but by them, at that time;

seeing that all the coast of Syria was as yet in the enemies power. After the Venetians had left a sufficient garrison for the defence of their vessels, they departed from Ioppa, and marched in order of battaile towards Ierusalem: from whence returning they took by force the Citie of Ascalon vpon the Sea, which the French had a little before attempted in vaine; and leaving French-men there in garrison, they laid siege to Caypha, which is likewise called Porphiria, neere to Ptolomais: the which siege lasted longer than it was suspected. From whence, because they would not liue idly, they went to besiege Tiberias: the which being yielded by the inhabitants, those of Caypha did loone after the like.

Some Authours attribute these exploits to Godfrey, and not to the Venetians. 10 But I thinke them to haue bene done by a mutuall consent; namely by Godfrey, with his Armie by Land, after the taking of Ierusalem; and by the Venetians, by Sea, keeping way with him still all along the coast. And from thence it commeth that the Venetian Chroniclers attribute the whole to the Venetians; and the French to Godfrey. It is certaine, that so soone as the Venetians arriued in Syria, they ioyned with the French, and that the affaires of the Christians were, for the space of a whole year, gouerned in the Prouince vnder the happie fortune of either of them. These things being done, the Venetian Armie returned to Venice. And Godfrey of Bouillon loone after died.

It is reported, that, about the same time, the bodies of Saint Nicholas and Saint 20 Theodore, were brought to Venice; the one being laid in Saint Saviours Church, and the other in that which of a long time had bene dedicated vnto him on the banks of the Sea. The Normans vnder the conduct of Roger, brother to Beamon, made incursions on Grecia and Dalmatia. The Venetians, after they had made a league with Caloman, sonne to Geica King of Hungarie, marched against the Normans. But I know not vpon what ground the Normans at the same time made warre on the Venetians, and Alexia. The Venetian fleet being strengthened by the succours of the Barbarian passed into Apulia. For Caloman had not only made a league with the Venetians, but ioyned his forces to theirs. I know not vpon what occasion this was done, vnlesse it were that the Hungarians did at the same time 30 hold some places in Dalmatia; and that it grieved them to bee molested by the Normans. It may be likewise that they had couenanted so to doe in the articles of their agreement.

Now the Venetians hauing, in a manner, at their first arriual taken Brundisium, left a garrison there, and scattering their forces on euery side ouer the firmeland, filled all the Sea-coasts with spoile and terrour. And afterwards the fleet being stuf with booties returned to Venice. It is said, that it was expressly mentioned in the treatie of peace with Caloman, that neither he, nor any of his successors should pretend any right to Dalmatia.

About the same time Matilda, a noble Ladie of the illustrious family of the Sige- 40 fretti, being by meanes of the Venetians repossessed of the Citie of Ferrara, granted vnto them, as to her friends by whose meanes she had obtained the victorie, freedom and exemption for euer from all matters within the same Citie. Orde- 50

the 34. Duke of Venice.

Ordelapho Phalerio was chosen in his place. In the first, or certainly 10 in the second year of his gouernment, a very great fleet was sent againe into Syria. The Venetian Chroniclers say, That they were one hundred Gallies; Blondus mentioneth but fourescore. The Genouesels likewise about the same time, a little before the Venetians, had sent their fleet thither. Baldwin, called King of Ierusalem after his brothers death, was at the same time incamped before Ptolomais a Sea-towne. This man being discouraged with the losse of a great battaile in Syria, soone after the death of 30 Godfrey, durst neuer after attempt any thing, vntill that he vnderstood that Beamon was deliuered and returned to Antioch, by the industrie and liberalitie of his nephew Tancred, his brothers sonne, who to free him, paid a great waight of gold for his ransom: For being then confirmed by the presence of so notable a man, he came (as hath bene said) and besieged Ptolomais, called Acon by the modernes, and at last Acre by corrupted speech.

Baldwin, being incamped in this place, receiued two mightie fleets called out of 40 Europe vpon faire promises, and being strengthened by these succours he shut in the Citie more strictly by Sea and Land by meanes whereof it was taken the twentieth day after. Blondus saith that after Ptolomais was taken, there was no warlike exploit done vntill that Beamon (who was then gone into Italie) was returned into Asia. Whereby it is apparent that Baldwin made more account of Beamon alone, than of all the other Christian Captaines in the Armie. But that which Blondus writes of Beamon; comming into Italie, seemeth to be verie true: Because diuers Annals make mention, That whilest Beamon tarried in Italie, the Venetians, in fauour of Alexia, armed themselves against the Normans, who were incamped before Durazzo: and that, remembering perhaps the losse which they had in times past receiued, they durst not assaile the enemy who was in the Hauen, but held their course towards Apulia, where after they had greatly molested and indangered the enemy, they returned to Venice, leaving their enterprise imperfect. If it bee 50 so, we must thinke that the Venetian fleet, after the taking of Ptolomais, returned into Italie, as well because it was Ordelapho (as they affirme) which marched against the Normans, as also in regard, so many vessels being busied in Syria, they must of necessity prouide newe to goe against to mightie a King; the which could hardly haue bene done.

What accounts Blondus made of Beamon.

The occasion of the Warre betwixt Alexia
and Beamond.

It is reported, that the occasion which moued Beamond to make warre on Alexis, was because that after Tancred had seized on Laodicia, the Greekes inuaded and molested the Sea-townes of the Principallitie of Antioch. Others say, that Beamond was so terrified at the only fight of the Armies of Alexis and the Venetians, as he sodainly fell to composition, and that by that meanes the siege of Durazzo was raised.

Sydon.

The Venetian Annalls affirme, that after the taking of Ptolomais, their fleet failed to Sydon, whither Baldwins forces marched by Land, which in few dayes they tooke. Sydon stood in times past betwene Berithon and Tyre, the three most famous Cities of Phanicia, the most renowned for antiquitie and riches. 10 Some set downe the taking of Berithon before that of Sydon, because it was the first that was besieged, before which they were incamped two whole moneths: and being taken with great losse, it caused the Christians at their entrance, not only to kill those which were armed, but such likewise who for age were not able to defend themselves. A Christian Colonie was sent thither by reason of the fruitfulness of the Countrey. And this is all we finde to be done by the Venetians in Syria in the dayes of Ordalapho. Some Authours say, that the Venetians, after the taking of Sydon, tooke Faronia by assault, which is a Sea-towne neare to the mouth of Nilus, and how likewise in that journey they sunke diuers ships of the enemies, which did vie to scoure the Seas. In recompence whereof Baldwin gaue the Ve- 20 netians in the Citie of Acre, a Church, and a part of the towne, with a place where they might doe iustice one to another, with like power and authoritie as the French had, with diuers goodly priuiledges; and that not only in the same place, but ouer all the Kingdome of Ierusalem. They say besides, that Baldwin being puffed vp with the happie successe of his affaires desired farther to extend the bounds of his Kingdome; and to the same purpose he caused to bee built on the other side of the Riuer Iordan (famous for the baptisme of Christ our Lord) the Castle of Soball in a very high place: but that, soone after the Venetians were returned into Italy, ha- 30 uing lost certaine battailes against the enemy, and fortified some places neare to Ptolomais, plotting higher matters in his minde, he died, euen as these warlike preparations were in readinesse. Baldwin turnamed Burgensis, who was his neare kinsman, was declared King of Ierusalem in his stead; and for the stronger assurance thereof he was confirmed by Pope Gelasius. Others write, that vpon the returne of the Venetian Armie from Syria, Ordalapho soone after led it against the Norman; but they set not downe vpon what occasion, nor to what place. And I thinke they did vnderstand it to be the iourne against Beamond (alreadie mentioned) notwithstanding that they affirme, how the same enterprize was not against Beamond, but against Liemond his sonne.

Great priuileges granted to
the Venetians
by the Emperour
Henry the fourth

The Venetians at the same time did obtaine sundrie great priuiledges of the Emperour Henrie the fourth; and they say, that for the same purpose Vitalis Phalerio, 40 Stephano Morosini, and Vrso Iustiniano were sent to Rome, who in acknowledgment of that grant, promised him in the name of the people, a yearly cloake of cloath of gold, and a pension of monie, which was not verie great. Some say they obtained these priuiledges at Verona, and that the Emperour willed them to send commissioners to him to treat of the controuersie betwixt them and the Paduans. For it fell out at the same time, that the Paduans, ioyned with those of the Marches of Treuifo, and of Rauenna, were in Armes against the Venetians. And, notwithstanding that the occasion of this warre is vnkowne, yet may we perceiue by the Emperour Henries declaration, which followed soone after, that these two people then, as at other times, were at variance concerning their bounds. The Venetians 50 marched against the enemies who were come as farre as the Tower of Bebia, betwixt the Riuers Brenta and Adice: where at the first they made certaine light skirmishes, and afterward fought with their whole forces, where the Paduans being overcome, six hundred of their people were taken prisoners. The Paduans being

terrified with this losse, had recourse to the Emperour Henrie, demanding aide of him against the Venetians. Henrie, for that he would not seeme to contemne their request, concluded with the Ambassadors sent for that end (as hath beene said) to Verona, That, all strife and contention laid aside, The Venetians and the Paduans should louingly treat together concerning their greefes, Declaring to the Venetians, that they ought to remember how they were sprung from the Pa- 10 duans; That they should greatly erre vnlesse they did honour the Citie from whence they were descended; and respect the inhabitants thereof in the same manner, as well-bred children doe their ancient parents: That the Paduans on the other side, in stead of enuying the Venetians glorie, ought rather to reioyce to see those, that were descended from them, to haue purchased, euen till then, so great fame and reputation both by land and Sea; That his opinion was, in regard of their kinred, that their bounds should be common to either of them, and that they should neuer afterwards contend about any matter whatsoeuer. The Emperours authoritie preuailed much for the appealing of this strife, but most of all by his gentle exhortation, whereby the Ambassadors there present were moued at the same in- 20 stant to forget all former hatred, according to his desire. And it is thought that the Venetians at the same time obtained of the Emperour Henrie that which hath beene already mentioned. Other Historians haue thought, that those priuiledges were granted to the Venetians at his first arriual, nor making mention of the golden cloake, nor of any other tribute.

At the same time a great part of the Citie was consumed by fire; which begin- 30 ning in the house of Henrico Zeno, tooke holde on Saint Peters Church; and in an instant, after it had consumed a whole street by reason of the wind and of the matter apt to burne, it flew on the farther side of the canall, where in a moment it consumed the Isle of Cassian to ashes; and so scattering it selfe here and there, burnt our Ladies Church, and the streets of Saint Agatha, Saint Austen, and Saint Stephen all on a row. Two moneths after or there about: (for Authours doe not set 40 downe the certaine time) the Citie being yet terrified with the first fire, was presently frighted with another more terrible than the former, which beginning at the houses of the Zanbares flew into Saint Laurence his Island, and being sodainly scattered abroad did in a moment burne sixteene Islands of the Citie, and that part of the Dukes Palace, which looketh vpon Saint Bassus Church. Some say like- 50 wise that Malamoc was at the same time, in a manner, wholly burnt, and nor long after drowned. Whereupon by the aduice of Ordalapho, those of Chioggia were suffered to take stones, columnes, and what other things they would carrie with them to Chioggia, to build Churches, and other publicke buildings, with the ruines of Malamoc. And by that means this citie, which till then was but of a meane structure, was in an instant greatly bewitched with costly buildings. The religious brethren of Saint Hilaries order of Malamoc remooued themselves to the Monasterie of Saint Seruulo. The Gradonici likewise builded at Muriana a goodly Church to Saint Ciprian, for the religious sisters of the order of St. Ciprian of Mala- 60 mo. The Badoarij moued with that selfe-same zeale to Religion, did, at their owne costs, build the Church of Holie Croisse, with the Monasterie thereunto adioyning.

The Common-wealth had scarce time to breath after those two terrible accidents of fire, when as on a sodaine newes was brought, that those of Zara, hauing driuen away their Gouvernour, were revolted from the Venetians, and had yielded themselves to Csolan King of Hungarie. For the Barbarian, after the warre with 70 the Normans wherein he was accompanied by the Venetians, being puffed vp with pride for his good successe, (in contempt of the alliance which the Venetians till then had friendly obserued) seized vpon Dalmatia, and tooke Zara first of all, and the residue of the Prouince in a manner by a voluntarie submiffion. And wholly to alienate that Nation from the Venetians obedience, hee proclaimed forthwith,

The rebeldom of
Zara.

That

That he came to set the Dalmatians at libertie. And after he had giuen great gifts to the Churches of the Cities, hee went backe into Hungarie, where he dyed suddenly. It was thought that it fell iustly vpon him for breaking the league which he so religiously had sworne vnto.

Caloman King of Hungarie dyed suddenly.

Ordalapho, taking occasion by the death of Caloman to recouer that Prouince, did in the thirteenth yeere of his gouernment passe ouer into Dalmatia. He besieged Zara and in short time tooke it. The Barbarians in the meane time who were left in garrison in the citie, or (as I thinke rather) were sent out of Hungarie to raise the siege, comming to fight with the Venetians, were by them broken and put to rout, and by that meanes did wholly abandon Dalmatia; Thus by the happie successe of this victorie, Zara was recouered. Then the troupes marched to Sicqua, which was likewise reuolted, constraining the inhabitants to yeeld. The towne was soone after dismantled. Other places consequently submitted themselves to the Venetians obedience, who not satisfied with this victorie, trauesing the mountaynes of Croatia, subdued in a short space whatsoever lay in the midst of the countrie. By meanes whereof some say, that the Venetians beganne then to vse the title of Croatia.

Zara recouered by the Venetians

Croatia brought vnder the Venetians obedience.

Now after Ordalapho had quieted the Prouince, and enlarged the boundes of the State, he returned to Venice, whither he brought diuers great Lords of Illiria, with other men of note, prisoners; the which made his returne home more magnificent, setting it forth to the people almost after the manner of an ancient triumph. But this Prouince did not long remaine quiet. For so soone as the newes of that which the Venetians had done in Dalmatia and Croatia was reported in Hungarie: a fresh Armie of Hungarians marched into Dalmatia. Which being vnderstood at Venice did greatly busie them, by plotting meanes how they might keepe that Prouince vnder their obedience. For there was likely-hood, that vnlesse the Sea-townes were strongly kept with good Garrisons, the Dalmatians (being naturally inclined to change and nouelty) would deliuer their countrie to the enemy. Ordalapho, knowing that in such dangerous businesse speed was to be vsed, passed into Dalmatia with a greater Armie than before, and ouertaking the enemy before the walles of Zara, drew him forthwith to battaile. At the beginning they fought furiously on either side, fortune enclining to neither part, vntill that Ordalapho, encouraging his Soldiours, and thrusting himselfe into the foremost ranks, fighting hand to hand with the enemy, was stricken with a dart, of which wound he suddenly dyed.

A new Armie of Hungarians marched into Dalmatia.

Ordalapho comes againe into Dalmatia.

Ordalapho dyes and the Venetians are defeated

The Venetians being amazed at their Princes death did for a time sustaine the enemies forces; but being disordered, they fell to flight; diuers were slaine in the fight, and many taken prisoners. The report of this losse brought great heauinesse to the Citie. The common people thought, that their Prince being dead, and their Armie defeated, there was no more hope for them to be able to keepe the Prouince. Therefore they resolu'd to send Ambassadors to the king of Hungarie, to obtaine a peace if it might be, or else truce for a certaine time. Vitalis Phaedria, Viso Maliniano, and Marino Morosino the Secretarie, were sent thither, who obtained truce of the king for five yeares. Ordalapho's bodie, being brought to Venice, was honorably buried in Saint Markes Church, who fighting valiantly for his Countrie was slaine in the nineteenth yeare of his Principallitie. Dominico Michaeli was chosen in his sted.

Dominico

DOMINICO MICHAELI, the
35. Duke of Venice.

Baldwin, the second of that name, sent to this Prince for aide. For the affaires of the Christians in Syria, were brought to such a passe, that they spake no more of making themselves greater, but only how to keepe that which they had gotten. For albeit in the two first yeares of his raigne he had obtained certaine victories of the enemy, yet there was some likelihood, that they daily waxing stronger (as indeede they did) they should hardly be able to keepe those places which they held in Syria, without fresh supplies. He requested the Venetians by his Ambassadors, to passe with a mightie fleet into Asia; and the more easily to obtaine it, his Ambassadors in his name promised a verie great recompence. But Baldwin, expecting supplies from Italie, being taken prisoner by Dalochius king of the Parthians, with whom hee had fought, was carried away captiue to Cayro. Then those that remained in Ierusalem, did speedily certifie Pope Calixtus of the state of the affaires of Syria, assuring him, that if they were not forthwith succoured with supplies from Italie, and Europe, that their dominion in Asia would not only be soone brought to nothing, but the name of Christians would be extinct, and all reduced vnder the power of the Turkes.

Baldwin taken prisoner by Dalochius king of the Parthians.

The Pope being moued by this great danger, began forthwith to examine which were the chiefe forces of Italie, and found that there were none but the Venetians, which were able in those miserable times to preferue the affaires and state of the Christians in Syria. Therefore he sent his Nuncio to entreate Prince Dominico speedily to passe into Asia with a mightie fleet, to aid the Christians. The people then being called before the Assemblie, after due Praiers made vnto God, the Patriarch of the Citie by the Princes commaundement spake to them after this manner.

The Popes resolution for the succour of the holie Land.

The Oration of the Patriarch of Grada to the people of Venice.

Thinke (O people of Venice) that you are not ignorant, what our owne forces in part, and partly those of the rest of Europe have done these precedent yeares, for the recouerie of Palestine, which ye call the holie Land. For this is the six and twentieth yeare (if I mislake not) since that great voyage, which so many Christian Princes, taking the badge of the crosse vpon them, vnderooke for the same purpose into Asia, where by the Divine bountie and their valour, all that which stretcheth from Bithynia euen to Syria, was in a short space taken by force out of the hands of the cruell enemies. And our people likewise after they had taken Smyrna in Ionia, and executed many martiall exploits all along the Sea-coasts of Syria, did not only purchase great commendation, but had their share in the Cities that were taken. The which if we well observe, ye shall finde, that they laid a sure foundation at that instant whereon to enlarge in time to come your Dominion in Syria. But it hath hapned in a short time, that by the decease of Godfrey, Baldwin, and Beaumont, with other excellent Captaines, who died according to the necessitie of nature, our affaires in Syria have been so altered, as in stead of their wonted prosperous successfe, they are on a sodaine fallen to the ground, and doe daily waxe weake, so as being more and more exposed to the violent assaults of the enemies, wee haue left vs small hope of abilitie to defend that Province. The which Baldwin, the second, fearing, did not long since send his Ambassadors vnto vs, to intreat vs, with great promises, to prepare forthwith a mightie Armie, and therewith to passe speedily into Asia. The intreaties of so great a person did moue vs. But being at the point to open the matter vnto you, and desiring meanes how to provide such an Armie, we haue with great terror receiued newes, how Baldwin is taken by Dalochus king of the Parthians, and carried prisoner to Cayro. Whereupon Varimond Bishop of Ierusalem (ye Christian people) being amazed, with all those which lie in garison in the Citie, haue speedily sent for aide and succour to Pope Calixtus, saying, that vlesse they be speedily releiued, themselves with whatsoeuer they possesse in that Province, are in danger to be lost. The Pope being troubled with these newes, hath thought the Venetians alone to be worthe of such an enterprise. He hath written to your Prince, and to you, (ye people of Venice) whom hee intreateth, exhorteth and aduise, not to abandon Christian Religion in so great a daunger. Wherewith your Princes pleasure is you should be acquainted, to the end ye might will and command a great Armie to be provided for that purpose: whereunto, pittie alone, and the affection which we beare to the Apostolike See, and to all Christians in general, should not only prouoke vs, (which hauing receiued from our Ancestors as hereditarie, we ought to preserve and increase with all our power) but likewise the desire which wee haue to enlarge the bounds of our Dominions. Who is it but seeth that it will chiefly be an holy and iust warre, the which wee ought principally to consider in all things; and secondarily, highly worthe of the charitie and Religion for which ye are euery where famous, to defend by Armes, and to preserve from the enemies wrong, this land where Christ, our king, was borne, did hide himselfe, wept, was betrayed, taken and crucified, and his most holie bodie laid in the graue, and who (according as holie Writ doth witnesse to vs) shall come the soueraine Iudge, one daie, to enquire of the deedes of all mankind. What Churches? what monasteries? what Altars doe ye thinke can be so agreeable unto him, as this holy voyage? Whereby ye shall free from base and cruell seruitude, the place of his birth, his Sepulchre, and generally all the signes and tokens of his humanitie. But because humane affaires are of such nature, as there is almost no publicke charitie exempted from ambition: And your selues likewise, perhaps since I began to speake of this subiect, haue closely demanded of your selues, what honour, what glorie, what recompence may be expected thereby? Certainly it is, and neuer shall bee well becoming, and greatly profitable for our reputation, that the Venetians only, of all Europe, haue bene thought fit at this time to oppose themselves with all boldnesse against all Asia in a manner. The fairest parts of the East shall feele the worth of the Venetians power. Affricke shall talke of it; but Europe shall greatly admire it. All men shall speake of you: The whole honour of the warre shall be attributed to you. That which we haue done heretofore in Asia, seemeth to be effected rather by strangers than by vs. But that which we shall henceforth do there, shall be ascribed to vs alone. The glorie of strangers hath greatly hurt vs, who by their lustre haue (in a manner) darkened all our great actions: the which in time to come they shall not doe. Their trauaile and danger in breaking the enemies forces shall bee our praise and glorie, to haue thus brauely broken and beaten them back. Moreover I doubt not, but that all of ye are willing and desirous to enlarge your estate as far as may be. But how? by what meanes will you effect it? In liuing idly? or rowing up and downe those Lakes in your little boates? Hee that thinketh so, doth greatly deceiue himselfe.

The

The ancient Romans of whom ye vaunt ye are descended, and whom ye desire to imitate, did not purchase the Empire of the World by liuing idly, and at their ease, but by making one warre to grow from off another: By warre they did subdue all Nations: And finally, by warre their power and greatnesse did increase beyond all thought. Heereunto wee may yett adde that which is most to bee desired, That wee are to take Armes against enemies, whom to kill is not onely lawfull, but likewise iust and holie. Besides, those whom wee relieue, haue already, and will still giue vs a share in those Townes and Cities conquered from the enemy: But happily, some will thinke this a small matter, and wholly unworthy for the recompence of so great an enterprise. I confesse that it is small in shew. But who soeuer will thinke vpon the time to come, will finde it to be an assured foundation whereon to builde and encrease our Dominion in the Lewant. For great and admirable matters are often-times seeneto spring from meane beginnings. But if they neither the honour, recompence, nor the mutual loue we all beare to the Christians name can not moue you: This, undoubtedly, ought to prouoke you therunto, That by freeing this holie Land from the bondage of the enemies, appearing one day before the Throne of this incomprehensible Iudge we shall stand upright, acknowledged by this great King and by all the rest, for Souldiours of his guard, receiuing an holie guerdon for so holy a war. Depart then in Gods name, and prepare a mightie Armie, which may be for the profit and honor of the Common-wealth. It behoueth you to vse speed, least (as it often times hapneth) some vnluckie for accident doe foresew so great an enterprise:

This speech being ended, a sodaine noise was heard ouer all the Church, intermingled with sighs and teares, all the people crauing that the Armie might quickly be in readinesse; saying, That there was no man in the whole citie, but had rather enroll his name for so holie a warre, than to liue idly at home. Hereupon they armed fortie Gallies; (as they say which speak sparingly of the matter) but according to their opinions who speake more indifferently thereof one hundred, and according to others who amplify the matter) two hundred: which opinion neuertheless I hold to be the truest. For if it were so as they say, I know not vpon what occasion Prince Michaeli (as shall bee hereafter mentioned) should haue so often the enemies Fleete before Ioppa, which consisted of seauen hundred Shippes of warre. But some say that the enemy, in stead of seauen hundred, had but three score and ten. If it were so, all the Historians should haue small cause so highly to praise this victorie obtained by Prince Michaeli; and chiefly Blondus, who hath more curiously, than any other, set downe that which was done at the same time in Syria. Besides, Giacomo of Genoa, who came to Hierusalem by and by after the battaile, doth write that the Venetians had two hundred vessels, whereof three score and tenne were Shippes of burthen.

The Prince, being come to Dalmatia, tooke in fresh supplies. Then he failed with a faire wind to Cyprus, where hauing certaine notice of the great multitude of enemies incamped before Ioppa, he marched furiously against them: The Barbarians at the same time held those of Ioppa, which were become Christians, streightly besieged; and hauing shut vp their Hauen, and taken from them all hope of succour on that side, from whence they most expected it, they attempted to make them yeeld. The Bishop, so soone as he vnderstood that the Venetian Fleet did approach, came to Ioppa with victualles, and with the greatest forces that hee could, to the end to relieue the citie vntill the arriual of the Venetian succours. But whilest he made these preparations, Prince Michaeli, who (as hath bene said) was come somewhat neere to the enemy, did a sodaine assaulte him, not giuing him time to order his Ships in battell, vanquished him, and enforced him to dis campe, after he had slaine some, and taken the rest. Some Authors affirme, That they fought in the maine Sea, and that the enemies Fleete was but an hundred vessels, where the battell being very bloodie on both sides lasted for certaine houres space; and that in the end, the enemies being overcome, and their Admirall Galley taken, with diuers others, the Venetians opened the passage of the Sea to those of Ioppa; That our men, certaine dayes after, tooke in the maine Sea ten of the enemies

Some Authours doe affirme, That Prince Michaeli, after this victorie came to Ierusalem, where being kindly welcomed by Bishop Varimond and the rest, hee was by them gratified, for his opportune arrival, and for his happie defeating of the enemy. It was debated there among the Capitaines, after what manner they should prosecute the Warres. Wherein hauing spent certaine dayes, without any resolution what Citie they should first attempt: It is reported, that by the aduice of Prince Michaeli they fell to cast lots, and that the same falling on the Citie of Tyre, it was the first that was besieged. The manner of casting these Lots was thus. The names of all the Cities, which they would besiege, were written in little scrowles of Paper; and being laide together confusedly on a heape vpon the next Altar, they were mingled by a yong boy: then after the celebration of Diuine Service, the same boy drew forth all those scrowles one after another, in the presence of the Princes; and in this sort they concluded to begin the warre by the siege of Tyre.

This Citie was in time past an Island in the maine Sea, seven hundred paces distant from the firme land. Alexander, sonne to Philip, being incamped before it, caused that space or distance from the Sea to bee filled vp to ioyn it to the land. It is very famous in respect of such excellent Cities as haue descended from thence; namely, Lepta, Vtica, and Carthage enuius of the Romane greatnesse, with Gades situate in the farthest parts of the earth. This Island is in circuite nineteene thousand paces. When Alexander besieged it, it was taken by warlike engines the seuenth Moneth of the siege. The excellencie and riches thereof consisteth in Purples and Scarlets; in regard whereof, foraine Kings, and the Romanes likewise, haue euer enfranchized the Inhabitants of that place. The Citie it selfe is in circuit two and twentie Stadij. It is thought, that Agenor, sonne to that ancient Belus, was the founder thereof, and that it was in times past called Sarra. From whence it camo (as I thinke) that we find in the Venetian Annals, Surra for Tyre. The Phoenicians (among whom, next to the Citie of Sydon, Tyre hath euer held the chiefe place, as well for greatnesse as antiquitie) haue bene highly praised and esteemed by all ancient Authours, for inuening Arithmetickes and the Letters of the Alphabet, and for being the first that gazed vpon the Starres in the night.

It was then concluded to besiege this Citie by Sea and Land; where at the beginning of the siege it was agreed vpon betwixt Varimond and the Venetians, That whatsoever Baldwin the first had in the last warres giuen to the Venetians in Syria, should remaine firme to them. Blondus saith, that hee had scene the Coppie of the Priuledge, which did expressely containe, That the Venetians should in all places of the Kingdome of Ierusalem, and Principallitie of Antioch, haue a particular place and streete apart, and a place for them to pleade in before their Magistrate. They obtained, besides, many other matters necessarie for the publike vse, That the Venetian Merchants should be free in Syria, from tolles and impositions; And that if any Venetian should suffer shipwrack, or dye in those places without making a will or heire, all his wealth should be put into the hands of the Venetian Magistrate, vnto whom the Treasurer generall of the kingdome should paye euerie yeare three hundred Crownes, out of the Kings reuenues. This is it which Bishop Varimond, and those who did then manage the affaires of Syria, did graunt to the Venetians, and much more than this, which Baldwin at his returne from prison did willingly ratifie.

In this treatie with Varimond, it was expressely said, That if the Cities of Tyre and Afulon were taken, the Venetians should partake the thirdes thereof. This Citie had in times past bene besieged by Baldwin by the space of foure moneths, who could not take it, by reason it was so enuironed with the Sea. This new siege likewise was much longer than was suspected: But whilst it was besieged by Land and Sea, those of the Land-Campe began to murmur against the Venetians, saying, That they alone were out of danger in their ships, and that if the enemy (whom they continually expected) should arrive, who would assaile them by Land, the Venetians in the meane time would put forth to Sea, and get to some place of safetie, and therefore they would either dis campe, or share equally the labour and danger betwixt them. This flaunder being reported to Michaeli, he was greatly troubled therewith: and after hee had continued a certaine time pensiuely, ruminating to himselfe by what meanes he might roote out this suspicion which his fellows had vnjustly conceiued: hee commaunded on a foddaine to plucke vp all the bords from the bottome of the vessels, or (as others say) all the nailes and oares, with other matters belonging to navigation. And causing them to be brought into the presence of Varimond and the rest of the Capitaines, hee vied this speech vnto them.

The Princes Oration to Varimond and the rest.

Understand, (quoth he) companions in Armes, that ye doe in some sort doubt of the faith and loyaltye of the Venetians; & that instead of holding vs for faithfull companions, Ye repute vs cowards and traitours. But our fidelitie is not of so small continuance, that we will suffer yee long to suspect it, for which we are resolu'd to hazard all dangers. Take (saith hee) this certaine pledge of our fidelitie. (and in so saying, he caused all the furniture of his vessels to be throwne downe before them) Then he added, Tee haue now (as I take it) O Varimond, and the rest, matter enough to repose trust in vs, albeit that it is a common saying, that, before all things, we should consider the nature and inclinations of people. But to the end to take away from euerie one occasion of euill speaking, it hath pleased vs to doe thus; to let ye understand, that the Venetians haue the same courage like you. It remaineth now, that with a like affection wee goe for ward with the Cities siege; which being taken, I hope so that in short time, we shall become masters of all Syria.

The fidelitie of the Prince and the Venetians, was highly esteemed; all men with a loud voice, did greatly praise them, and accounted them for faithfull companions and good Souldiers. Thus being confirmed, and continuing the siege with greater care than before, they report an accident newly hapned in the Campe; which the ignorant multitude may hold for a miracle. Those which kept the guard (experienced belike in such matters) reported that they had descried a Doue, executing the office of a Post, coming from the Campe of Dachines King of Damascus; who made great preparations to relieue the Tyrians; and at such time, as it should flie ouer the Campe, they tooke speciall care at the very instant to make a great noyse, so as the Doue loosing her strength, fell downe all amazed. Being taken vp, they knew by the letters which were tied to her feete: That King Dachines did intreate the Tyrians to be of good cheare; That within few dayes he would be neare them with great forces, and by the death of their enemies free them from the siege. The Princes were greatly moued at these newes: For there was some likelihood that the Tyrians vpon this hope would haue more obtinately held out this siege, and that which was most dangerous, they feared to come to strokes with so mightie an enemy. Whereupon they bethought themselves of a subtille stratagem; to ric counterfeit letters to the Doves feete, instead of those which Dachines had sent to the Tyrians: which imported, Not to expect any succour from the King. And therefore they should doe wisely, seeing their affaires stood so as they must needs yeeld, to giue place to the time, which they were chiefly to thinke on, and by a timely yeelding to prouide for themselves and their meanes.

These Letters being publicly read, (for the Pigeon being let loose flew directly into the Citie) the Tyrians being wholly discouraged did yeeld themselves the fifth moneth of the siege. I know of a certaine, that many will hold this, which wee haue reported of the Pigeon, for a fable, thinking it to be against nature, and consequently vnworthie of beliefe, that a bird transported into a farre Region, should at a flight returne to her former nest. But it is vndoubtedly true that it was so: The which hath bene oftentimes knowne by experience. For diuers doe witness, that the ancient Romans made vse sometimes of birds for the same purpose. Plinie makes mention of a Pigeon, which brought letters to the Campe before Modena. I finde that Fabius the Roman Historian, and Cecynna Volaterran, haue sometimes vsed swallows in such like businesse. But let it be granted that it may be so; it is no lesse strange, that these birds, flying in the ayre, should fall to the ground by a suddaine noyfe. For some doe affirme the same to haue hapned in the assembly of the Ilesmenians (as oftentimes in other places) at such time as by the meanes of Titus Flaminius, all Grecia did recouer her ancient libertie. Plutarch, a man of singular learning, hath taught the same to come to passe by the clearing of the aire, because that by a suddaine crie ascending vpwards, the aire is forcibly cleft, leaving no support for the birds; for waxing more soft and slipperie, the birds fall, as though they were come into an emptie place, without any stay at all, whereby they fall downe, being stricken with the noyfe, as if it were with an arrow; It may be likewise according to the same Authour, that this noyfe engendred in the aire a violent byrning like to the tempest of the Sea, wherewith birds, being touched, fall downe amazed.

Now the Tyrians hauing yeelded; there were set vp on the Towers and highest places of the Citie, the ensignes of Varimand, and of the Venetians, vnto whom were given the third part of the Citie, according to the agreement, the prowesse and valour of whom (according to the saying of Chroniclers) was greatly admired in that siege: The like was given to them in the Citie of Ascalon. Baldwin, returning from his imprisonment at the same time, did not only approve all these things, but did likewise at theratifying thereof highly honour the Venetian Prince.

It is to be scene in some Authours, that he vsed this preface. Dominicus Michaeli, Duke of Venice and Dalmatia, Prince of the Kingdome of Ierusalem, who after he had defeated a great Armie of the enemies on the inaccessible shoare of Ascalon; slaine and taken many thousands of those Barbarians: and delivered those of Ioppa from the siege, wherewith they were shut in, did enter victorious into Ierusalem. Some others, adding greater matters than these, say, That, besides these things graunted at the same time to the Venetians in Syria, it was confirmed vnto them ouer and aboue all the rest, that whilst the Duke of Venice should make his aboad in Ierusalem, hee should enioy the same honours and prerogatiues as the King did. Whereas there is mention made, that the enemies were defeated before Ascalon, and not before Ioppa; the same proceedeth from the varietie of Historians.

During the Venetians prosperous successe in Syria, Caloianes sonne to Alexis (some set downe Emanuel for Caloianes) enuying that the Christians had obtained so notable a victorie; and chiefly the Venetians, vnto whom was ascribed all the glorie of whatsoeuer had beene then done in Syria; resolved to make open warre against them. In regard whereof, there was some likelihood, that the Venetians, if they respected their owne priuate affaires, would wholly leaue Syria, as indeed it happened. For the Prince being speedily called home, vpon the first commotion of the Greekes, did depart out of the Prouince: who being come to Rhodes; and the Townesmen refusing to furnish him with victualls: he tooke and spoiled the Citie. I beleeeue hee had some other cause so to doe, For that had bene to haue drawne a kindnesse from them perforce. But it is most likely, that it was done in hatred to Caloianes, who had already declared himselfe their open enemy; (which some Authours affirme) or else certainly, because the Venetians had in times past receiued some notable iniurie of the Pedians, they would then at the instant call it in question, hauing so fit an occasio.

Prince Michaeli, from thence commg to the Isle of Chyos, waisted it likewise, and carried from thence the bodie of int Isidore to Venice, which was laid in Saint Marks Church, in the Chappell, hich we haue elsewhere said was builded by Narses with the spoiles of the enemies. The fleet made some staie there, in regard of the great sharpnesse of the wjter. From whence (finding that place fit for the affaires of warre) they would nois lodge, vntill they had taken all the neighbour Ilands from the Greekes. Whereupon departing thence on a sodaine, they first tooke Samos, then Lesbos, Adros, and all the other Ilands of the Greeke Empire. Hauing performed these exploits neare to the Ilands Ciclades, they layed into Peloponessus, where he seed on Methon, at this day called Modona, and left a garrison there. Then commg into Dalmatia, he recouered Zara (as some write) which had, before, driuen thence the Venetian Magistrate; and being thus recouered (to the end that her destruction might serue for example to the neighbour Cities how in time to come to flisfie their faith so religiously sworne vnto) they did for the most part ruine it. Ten they recouered Spalatra and Trahu by force.

But other Authours haue pased ouer in silence that which we haue now mentioned to haue bene done by him in Dalmatia. All these great atchieuements luckily finished, after that he hadamed one part by Armes, and protected the other from al wrongs, from the Sea-coast of Syria euen to Dalmatia, he brought backe his Armie entire to Venice, where hee was receiued with generall ioy. And so soone as he had related what he had done in that voyage, the whole Citie did highly praise him. The affaires of the Christians in Syria still declining by litle and litle, did euery day wax worse, vntill the time of Baldwin the fifth. From whom Saladine, King of Egypt, recouered Ierusalem, the fourescore and eighth year after the Christians had taken it. There were diuers and fundrie warlike preparations made aswell in Italie as in other parts of Europe, for the conseruation of Syria. But all those attempts proued vaine and fruitlesse; of which wee determine briefly to speake as occasion shall serue, not interrupting the course of our Historie.

During the aboad of Prince Michaeli in Asia, or soone after his returne, the Hospitall of the publike charitie was builded, with all that which stands neere to it. The bodie of Saint Domato, brought from Pera to Venice, was laid in a Church newly built, by the diligence and cost (as some Authours say) of one called Marco Iuliano. Michaeli, after hee had gouerned the Common-wealth eleuen yeares, did fortunately de cease. His funeralls were followed by great multitudes of people. His tombe is to be scene at this day in the porch of Saint Georges Church, right ouer against the Comcell-Hall on the left hand as ye enter into the Church.

Pietro Pollani succeeded his deceased Father-in-law Michael. At his entrance into the government, the Fanels submitted themselves to the Venetians authority, promising to aide them when neede should be; to giue yearlye the quantitie of a thousand pound weight of oile, for the vse of S. Marke Church, and to pay them, besides, a yearly pension of moncy, in manner of Tribute. It seemeth vnto mee that this tribute proceeded from some aide which they had received from the Venetians in their warres, the which some Historians haue noted, albeit they set not downe against whom it was. Bonifio Michaeli, Administrator at that time of the Church of S. Saluatori, and all those which accompanied him, tooke a Religious habit vpon them, instituting a new order, which was afterward authorised by Pope Innocent; and after him, Pope Alexander the fourth consecrated their Church. Pietro Gathulso caused the Church of S. Clement to be builded on the Canal Orphago. It is reported besides, that at the same time a great strife arose betwixt the Venetians and the Pisans, occasioned by a brauado, rashly made vpon them in the Hauens of Rhodes by Michaeli Vitalis, the Princes sonne, Generall of the Venetian Armie: where the Pisans being ouer-come, and loosing the greatest part of their Armie, did receiue a great disgrace: which afterward caused diuers and sundrie murders on either side. And these two States would haue become more sharply bent one against the other, had not the Pope by his wise mediation, sodainly pacified their strife.

Diuers cities of Dalmatia, insinuating themselves into the Venetians fauour, promised each of them in her owne name to waite on the Prince with one armed Gallie, as often as he should put to Sea with fiftene Gallies. The Polani likewise, a people of Histria, offered them all aide, with all necessaries for the furniture of the Gallies, at any time when the Prince, marching against the enemies, should arriue in their Countrey.

but the enemies being overcome and put to flight, three hundred and fiftie of them were brought prisoners to Venice: who neuertheless at the entreatie of the chiefe of their Citie, laying all the blame on some audacious persons among the Common people, and not on the Nobilitie, were all freely sent home againe. Vtso Badoario left to Giovanni Throno of Mayorbū diuers goodly Lands seated neere to Muriana and Maiorba, to build an Hospitall in the name of Saint James; which being since much augmented and enriched, was given to the Religious sisters of the order of the Cistercians. But whilst the Citie was thus at quiet: the Venetians, because they would not liue idely did set forth an Armie, at the request of the Emperour Emmanuel against Rogero, sonne to Guiscard King of Sicilie. This Prince, departing 10 from Otranto with a great Fleete, came to the Isle of Corfu, bordering vpon the Adriaticke and Ionian Seas: And hauing seized thereon, hee sailed into Morea, where betwixt the Promontorie of Mailla, and the Gulphe of Argiers, and Laconia, he executed diuers hostile actions. Returning thence towards the Sea of Sarona, neere to the Hauens of Cenchrea and Corinth, hee put all the Countrie adioyning to fire and sword: Then passing forward without any resistance at all, and being come to Istmos (vulgarly called at this day Heximilia) he filled all Achaia with feare and terror. He tooke likewise the Citie of Thebes; where it is reported he shewed himselfe ouer-couetous, in his curious seeking for gold. In the end, he neither spared the Countrie of Nigrepont, nor Beotia called Phocides. And being 20 put vp by this happie successe, he sent one of his Lieutenants with three-score Gallies to crosse the Hellepont, called at this day the streight of Gallipolis, euen to the Bosphorus of Thrace, at this present called Saint Georges Arme, who with great boldnesse vsed such speed, as being arriued on the sodaine before Constantinople, he set fire on diuers houses neere to the Citie with fire arrowes, which hee thotte from his Gallies.

The affaires of the Empire being thus troubled; Emmanuel by his Ambassadors had recourse vnto the Venetians, of whom, in respect of their ancient friendship, he freely craved helpe in his great need: or if he asked it too late, that they would yet reuenge the wrongs done vnto him. Therefore they prepared a mightie Fleete, 30 which being in readinesse in the Hauens, after that certaine Gallies which were abroad were by a decree called home, the Prince set forward against the enemies. But Historians make no mention at what time these Gallies, which were called home, departed from Venice. We must beleue they were those which the Venetians did entertaine for the defence of the coaste of Syria, according to their promise made to Baldwin: as some Authors doe affirme. The Fleet being departed from the Citie, sayling on the maine, and grieuously tossed with a mightie tempest, did put it selfe into the Hauens of Caorli, a territorie of the Forlani; where the Prince falling sicke, and perceiuing his disease growing worse and worse and that there was no hope of his sodaine recouerie, after he had committed the charge 40 of the Armie to Giovanni his brother, and Reyniero his sonne, he returned to Venice. Emmanuel likewise had armed a great number of vesselles, which hee committed to the charge of one of his Lieutenants, with all authoritie at Sea. He came by Land with his forces into Albania where he besieged the Citie of Bütritor.

But during these atchieuements the Venetians after they had slaine diuers of the enemies, and taken many prisoners, tooke the Isle of Corfu by force. Some neuertheless affirme, That the Island was rather recovered; that they did not fight on the maine Sea; and That the Kings Fleete being dispersed and defeated, the Venetians tooke foureteeen of his Gallies: who after they had left strong Garrison for the guard of this Island, sailed forthwith into Sicilia: where so soone as they 50 arriued, there is no sort of cruelty which they committed not. They did puttall the Province to fire and sword; burnt diuers Cities; cut downe the Trees; plucked vp plants by the rootes; and carried great numbers of prisoners with them to Venice. By meanes whereof the Empire was not onely protected (as at other times) by the Venetians forces, but restored to her ancient splendor and maiestic, which would hardly haue beene done without their aide. The Princes death, which hapned before the Armies returne, hindred the publike ioye for such a victorie, who deceased the nineteenth yeare of his gouernment. Dominico Morosini was by a generall consent chosen in his place.

Sixte galleies were sent the same yeare to defend the Sea-coasts, on which the Pirats made ordinary incursions, who sailing on the maine, tooke fise Gallies of Ancona, which Guiscard, one of the Pirats of his time, did commaund; who being taken was presently hanged. About the same time likewise, diuers buildings aswell 50 publike as priuate, were consumed with fier in our Ladies Island, no man knowing from whence it came. Besides, at the same time the foundations of the great Tower was laid, which is right ouer against the market-place, and is a verie admirable peece of worke. For it is reported, that the foundations of the same great Masse are laid so deepe vnder ground, as there was more time spent therein, than on the whole worke besides. The top thereof, glittering with gold, is of such heighth, as a man may not only from thence see round about the Citie, but likewise discover a great way off at Sea towards the South and East, in such sort as the brightnesse thereof doth appeare like a luckie starre, two hundred stadij in length, to those which saile from Histria and Dalmatia.

The Polani, with diuers other of Hiltria, did by their thefts trouble the Gulfe. The Lukes Sonne with Marino Gradonico were sent againſt them with fiftie Armed Gallies. Pola being beſieged by them, the inhabitants at their firſt arriuall ſued for peace, which was granted them on condition, That they ſhould no more robbe at Sea; and pay yearlie two thouſand weight of oile for S. Markes Church. The Parenzans likewiſe, being moued with the like feare, promiſed to giue them aide, as oftentimes as the Duke ſhould goe to the wars. The Emonians promiſed as much, with a yearlie tribute of oile. Some did, beſides, acknowledge them for their Soueraigne Lords, promiſing to free all the Venetian Merchants from ſubſidies and impositions; Thoſe of Ancona likewiſe at the ſame time made a league with the Venetians. The like did William King of Sicilie who ſucceeded Rogero; in regard whereof he graunted diuers priuileges, and immunities, to the Venetian Marchants which frequented the Faires of Sicilie.

Zara made an Archbiſhopricke

Pope Anaſtaſius, at the Venetians entreatie, created the Church of Zara into an Arch-biſhops See, whereunto he ſubſcribed all the Cities of the neighbour-Iſlands. Yet I am not of opinion, that the ſame was done ſo much in fauour of thoſe of Zara, who were not at the ſame time greatly affectionate to the Venetians, as in hatred to the other Cities of Dalmatia; which, for the moſt part being revolted from the Venetians, did at the ſame time obaie the King of Hungarie. If this be ſo (as diuers likewiſe affirme it) we muſt thinke, That Dominico Michaeli, at his returne from Syria, did not recouer Spalatra, Trahu, nor any other Citie in Dalmatia, but only Zara; or elſe of a certaine, That this Arch-epiſcopall erection was in the daies of Vitalis Michaeli the ſecond, in whole time, we finde, Trahu, Spalatra, Ragufa, and diuers other Cities of Dalmatia, to bee poſſeſſed by the Emperour Emanuel.

The Church of the Virgin, which the croſſed Friars poſſeſſe, was built at the charges of the Gulſoni, an honourable familie, as that likewiſe of S. Mathew: toward the which Bernardo Cornari did freely giue the ground. This is all which is obſerued to haue hapned at home, or abroad, vnder this Princes government; who died the eighth yeare of his Principalltie, and was buried in the Church of Holie-Croſſe.

Vitalis

Italis Michaeli, the ſecond, ſucceeded him: who after he had wholly rooted out all ancient emulation betwixt the Venetians and the Pilans, made a league with them.

The Venetians vnder this Princes gouernment took part with Pope Alexander the third, vpheld by the kings of France and England, againſt Oſtavian the Anti-Pope, who was alone fauoured by the Emperour Frederick Barbaroſſa, who, for this cauſe, commaunded the ſubiects of the Empire which were neere neighbours to the Venetians, to ouer-runne them. At the Emperours commandement, thoſe of Verona, Padua, and Ferrara, ſo ſoone as they had ioined their forces together, did aſſaile and take by force the Cape of la Mothe: But vnderſtanding that the Venetian Armie approached, (which vpon the firſt report of the enemies riſing was prepared) they ſoone diſlodged, after they had ſpoiled the Towne; and carried awaie the inhabitants as priſoners. The Venetians not meeting with the enemy, ſell on the Territorie of the Hadrians, to reuenge the iniurie done to their ſubiects. Vrich, Biſhop of Aquileia, preſuming on theſe troubles (for helike which a Biſhop of Aquileia brought to Venice as a priſoner. The original of the Games at Stronctide.) came with a great troope of Forlani and tooke the Citie of Grada, not ſo much in hope to keepe the place (for hee had none at all) as to take thence the rareſt and richeſt things, and to carrie them to Aquileia. But being taken with the manner by the Prince his vnlook-for coming, himſelfe, with twelue of his Channons, and manie others of note, were brought priſoners to Venice. From whence ſoon after he was diſcharged, on condition, To ſend euerie yeare, at ſhrouetide, a fat Bull with twelue wilde Boares, which ſhould be ſlaue in the Market-place, in the preſence of all the people, for a perpetuall teſtimonie to poſteritie of their victorie. But ſome Authours referre this to the gouernment of Angelo Partitatio, which wee haue heretofore mentioned. But I thinke the error proceeded hence from, that they deliuer the ſame to haue hapned in the time of Pope Alexander; not making mention of which Alexander.

Whileſt theſe things were done neere the circuites of the Citie, the Emperour Emanuel attempted by new ſleights to gripe from the Venetians. Who hauing made a new League with William king of Sicilie, had giuen his daughter ſecretly to him in marriage, or elſe of a certaine, ſome hope of new affinitie. For if the ſame had bene done vnder-hand, I know not with what face he could haue entreated the Venetians to make warre on him; becauſe that euerie one would haue perceiued his diſſimulation, by ſolliciting forraine Armes againſt him, with whom hee had contracted new friendſhip and alliance. Now therefore that he might with-draw this King from the Venetians, whoſe faithfull friend hee knew him to be, and who (as then) were ignorant of what had paſſed, he requeſted them by his Ambaſſadors to aide him againſt him. Some write that after the agreement was ſworne to, there aroſe ſome diſſention betwixt the Emperour and the King. If it were ſo, the matter is answered, for otherwiſe it would be a hard matter to beleue, that ſuch affinitie and alliance betwixt ſo great perſonages, could bee contracted vnknoone to the Venetians, or at leaſt could be long concealed from them. Therefore the Grecian Ambaſſadors received this anſwere, that the Venetians could not by the Law of Nations, nor by their ancient cuſtome, take Armes without a cauſe againſt him who was their good friend and confederate: But that the Emperour Emanuel might wholly make uſe of their meanes, as of a Nation which did greatly affect him, ſo farre forth as their honour and conſcience would giue them leaue: though they could not at that time ſend him aide, without great breach to their reputation and publike loialtie. The Ambaſſadors were with this anſwere diſmiſſed, who were ſo ſooner departed from Venice (becauſe there was ſome likelihood of diſcontent about this anſwere) but they ſodainly decreed to ſend to all Venerian Marchants trafficking at the ſame time in Greece, to returne home ſpeedily to Venice.

The Emperour, who before then bare them no great good will, thinking by this this refusal to have a iust occasion to make warre upon them, seized on the Cities of Spalatra, Trahu, and Ragusa, but it is not knowne whether it were by force or by a voluntarie yielding of the inhabitants. Then adding treacherie to treacherie, he did feigne that hee seized on them, only to constraîne the Venetians to renew the league with him, and with no intent to detain them. Therefore he intreated them by his Ambassadors to suffer their merchants to vse their trafficke in the accustomed faires of Greece, and that hee would shortly let them vnderstand, how much hee did loue them, and was mindfull of the benefits which hee had receiued from them, as from his good friends, and companions in Armes. The promise of so great a Prince did indeed moue the whole Citie, but much more the remembrance which he said he carried of the benefits which the Greeke Empire had in times past receiued from their Ancestors. Vpon which assurance hauing reuoked their former decree, they permitted euery one to faile into Greece. Whereupon a great number of Merchants did sodainely depart, who stirred vp by profit went thither, being followed by two Ambassadors sent to renew the league, namely, Sebastiano Cyani, and Auria Maripietro; who were scarce come to Constantinople, when Emanuel, at a day appointed for the same purpose, caused ouer all his Empire all the Venetians to be taken, with their ships and merchandize, commanding them to bee straightly kept till his farther pleasure were knowne, and their money and goods to be shut vp in the publicke warehouses.

The Ambassadors amazed at the newnesse of this deed (for they durst not by the law of Nations hurt them) leauing Constantinople returned into Italie. Some, who in this tumult and feare had put to Sea, arriued sooner at Venice than the Ambassadors, and did report, that by the treacherie and disloyaltie of Emanuel, all their Countymen (a few excepted) were imprisoned, and their shippes and goods seized on in the hauens and faires of Greece.

The vnworthinesse of the matter did greatly trouble the whole Citie. But calling to minde that there is nothing sooner punished among men than treacherie, being resolu'd to reuenge this wronge, they sodainely prepared a mightie Armie: A hundred gallies were (as they say) in as many dayes, with a meruailous courage, ready to set saile, with twentie shippes of burthen. And hauing, besides, sent to all that were abroad in trafficke of merchandize to returne to Venice by the first of September, after they had receiued the supplies of Histria and Dalmatia, the fleet set saile vnder the command of Michaeli. He first tooke Trahu by force, and wholly ruined it: whereby wee may perceiue that they had voluntarily yielded to the Greekes. Ragusa likewise being recovered, the walles next to the Sea-side, with a tower, were beaten downe to the ground, whereon the Emperours Armes were engrauen. This being done in Dalmatia, they came with a faire winde into the Isle of Nigrepont, where Prince Michaeli preparing to besiege the Cities notwithstanding that they were furnished with good garrisons, was dissuaded from it by the Governour of the Island: who being amazed to see so great an Armie, or perhaps) not ignorant of his masters meaning, to abuse so mightie an enemy by some delay counsaied Vitalis to lend his Ambassadors to Constantinople, assuring him that he knew of a certaine, that Emanuel would rather choose a shamefull and discommodious peace, than warre.

the Greekes.*

The Bishop of Equiline, who spake good Greeke, and Manassés Badoario, were sent thither. Vitalis in the meane time went to the Isle of Chios, where hee soone reduced the Citie with the whole Island vnder his obedience. And because the cold grew alreadie verie sharpe, hee resolu'd to spend the winter there, and to expect the returne of his Ambassadors. And for that after the taking of Chios, there was some hope of peace, hee abstained from making any more incursions on the lands of the Empire. Emanuel in the meane time being cunning and politticke, so soone as the Ambassadors arriued made shew in publicke to desire peace, sometimes crauing such things, then refusing others, now approuing the Ambassadors

demaunds, and on a sodaine saying that he would communicate them to his Council, and so of set purpose by these delaies, hee mocked the Venetians. At the last, the Bishop of Equiline and Manassés returned to Vitalis, hauing effected nothing at all, accompanied with the Ambassadors of Emanuel, who arriuing at Chios, and alleading now one matter, and then another, caused a meruailous delaie.

Whilest these things were doing, the contagious sicknesse, seizing on the Venetian Armie, did in a short space carrie great numbers of them into another world. The rumour was that the wells and fountaines, from whence the Venetians drew their water, were poisoned by the Emperours commandement, and that the contagion in the Armie proceeded from the drinking of those waters. Some thinke that Emanuel came with a great Armie to the rescue of the Islands; but not daring to assault the enemy, he returned, after hee had caused all the waters to bee poisoned. It is reported that the whole family of the Iustiniani, was wholly extinct by this sicknesse. For all the males of this familie, that were able to beare Armes, did follow the Prince to these warres. The Citie did meruailously bewaile the losse of this familie. But calling to minde that there was one of the same house yet liuing called Nicholas, who hauing taken holy orders on him, did serue in Saint Georges Church, right ouer against the market-place, or (as others say) in Saint Nicholas Church on the shoare, messengers were by the Common-wealth sent to the Pope, to intreate him to permit the young man to leaue his profession, and to marrie that hee might haue children. Which being granted, the race of the Iustiniani, which hath produced since then so many learned men and great oratours, was preserved in the Citie.

Although Vitalis was greatly vexed with this losse, and perceiued the matter to be delaied by the malice of Emanuel, yet would not he seeme to keepe his Souldiers idle. Therefore, at the beginning of the spring he departed from Chios, and came to Lesbos, and from thence to Lemnos, then to Scyros. But because the sicknesse which was begun in the winter-time, did still increafe, and that the Souldiers and Marriners did sodainely fall downe dead in the streets; being frighted with the cries and slaunders of his owne people hee resolu'd to bring backe the remainder of his Armie to Venice, after he had lost the greatest part thereof.

Some Authours write, that Trahu, Spalatra, and Ragusa, did retolt and yeeld to the Greeke Emperour, (which neuer thelesse diuers doe denie) whilest the Venetian Armie was on the Coastes of the Islands Cyclades; and that Michaeli at his returne recovered them.

The Armie being returned to the Citie, the sicknesse followed soone after; which waxing more contagious at home than abroad, diuers thousandes of persons died in few dayes. Whereupon the people being called into the assemblie, all men laid the blame of that losse on Michaeli, calling him traitour to the Common-wealth and to his owne Souldiers, who seeking to please Emanuel enemy to the Venetian people, had suffered the opportunitie of so godly a victorie to be snatched forth of his hands, hauing abandoned his Armie to the treacheries and deceits of the Greekes: whereunto as hee was readie to answere, and to alleadge his excuses, there arose a sodaine noise among the people which was intermingled with reproaches. Hee perceiuing it dangerous to make any stay there, stopt aside out of the throng, hauing no man in his companie, and went along the shoare the nearest way to Saint Zacharies Church. Thus elapsing he met with a certaine man who fell vpon him and gaue him many dangerous wounds, whereof he shortly died, hauing bene devoutly confessed; the seuententh yeare of his gouernment. Others alleadge diuers other causes of his death. But it is sufficient to knowe that enuie alone procured the same. And nothing did him so much harme, as the ouer-great desire hee had to peace, the which sincerely pursuing, hee hid greatly endanger the Common-wealth. As concerning other matters, he was a vertuous man, and at the fundrie waies, and at fundrie times : These thus Armed, thou must, when neede shall bee, bring into some place in this Palace, making them readie to strike, when thou shalt command. Then, all the chiefe of the Empire beeing called together, I will aske them if their meaning be to haue me marrie with such an one as I loue, and whether they will acknowledge him for Emperour of Greece ? If they say (as I doubt not but they will) that they are so content ; I will then name the for my husband and Emperour, and enforce them at the instant to sweare fealtie and alleageance vnto thee ; But if they shall refuse so to doe, I will deliuer them all into thy hands, and into the power of thy friends, to doe with them what shall seeme good vnto thee. This young man, being valiant and amorous, did greatly praise the inuention of this woman ; and after that hee had made readie that which was concluded betwixt them, vpon the refusall which the Princes made to consent to so base and vnequall nuptials, they were altogether at an instant murdered : and by that meanes, in one daie, ended the race of Constantine in Grecia.

Emanuel hauing in this sort vsurped the Empire ; It is reported, that hee found a Booke of Prophecies, wherein reading by chance he was greatly frighted at one of the verses, which said, that those of Adria should one daie command in Constantinople. I omit the rest, which he, being not able to vnderstand, did impart to soothsaiers and Astrologians ; who were of opinion, that it was to bee meant of the Venetians, who inhabited the Adriatick Sea : which hee himselfe likewise imagining, had alreadie thought likelie to come to passe. And from thence (as it is said) proceeded the original of his hatred towards the Venetians. For he, thinking it would shortly happen, that the Citie of Constantinople should be besieged by them, (the which of a certaine fell fo out within a while after) he sought by treacherie and stratagems (not being able to do it by open force) to ouerthrow and ruinate the Venetian State. And not satisfied with that which he had till then done against them, he drew them of Ancona from their alliance, who in fauor of him, did for a time bar them from their free Navigation. But the Venetians, making alliance with those of Ariminium, nere neighbours to the Anconezans, did in such sort shut vp the passages from them, as their condition was like vnto theirs who are straightly besieged.

When the loanes
began at Venice

The Cities treasure being wholly exhausted by means of the great affaires which had hapned, it was decreed, That the monies of particular men laid in Deposito, should be brought to the treasure of Saint Marke, to be imploied and kept in the name of the Common-wealth as neede should be, vntill such time as the Citie had recovered her former wealth. The which at this day is commonly called a Loane, which was (as some say) deuised by Prince Michael. From whence (as is supposed) grew the chiefe reason of the peoples hatred against him, and the principall occasion of his death. Diuers Ambassadors were sent likewise about the same time from fundrie places to treat of an agreement with the Emperour.

The True cause of Philips his death.

Thus stood the affaires of the Venetians, when as (to the end that the Citie might be alwaies buified about weightie matters) The Cause of Alexander the third gaue them the subiect of a goodly victorie. Some moderne Historians doe in no sort approve this matter. But all the Venetian Annalists, and some strangers likewise, doe make particular mention of it ; and saie, That after diuers secret enmities betwixt Alexander and the Emperour Frederick, occasioned, because, in the new Schisme betwixt Alexander and Ostianus the Anti-Pope, the matter seeing referred to the decision of Frederick, Alexander would not stand to his iudgement : Frederick being moued heerewith, called Ostianus before him, and declared himselfe openly against Alexander. In hatred of whom, he published a Generall Councell at Dijon a Citie in France ; the which beeing dissolved by reason there was nothing done, because Pope Alexander refused to come thither, Frederick in rage resolved to returne into Italie. Whereupon hauing sent his Anti-Pope before him, he marched soone after with great forces beyond the Mounts ; but before his arriuall Ostianus died. In whose whosested Guido of Cremona being elected, Frederick promised to assist him with all his power against Alexander. And after diuers exploits executed in the Prouince, comming nere to Ancona, hee turned towards Rome, whither he sodainly marched with an intent wholly to ouerthrow Alexander. Who being frighted with his comming, making vse of two Gallies belonging to William King of Sicilie, hee came first to Cayetta, and from thence to Beneuentum. Frederick, after hee had installed Guido in the holie Chaire, returned into Lombardie. But Guido likewise died soone after.

Pope Alexander.

Now Alexander, committing the temporall gouernment to the Romans, craued no more but to intend diuine matters ; Provided, that they of the contrarie faction would permit him to liue in Rome. But not being able to purchase his peace on these conditions, and despairing of all reconciliation, he departed from the Citie. But it is hard to determine whether this refusall were the cause of his departure (a thing scarce credible, that the diuision of the inhabitants could haue constrained him to leaue the Citie, the Romans not being interessed therein, in regard they had the temporall iurisdiction in their own power) or whether it were rather the vniust command of the Emperour whereby he was banished forth of all Italie, and those attainted of capitall Treason which should giue him meate or drinke, or receiue him into their houses, threatening to ruine those Cities which should giue him entertainment, and to make warre on those Lords and Potentates, which should fauour him, which might be the cause, that hauing no place of safetie in all Italie, nor any good affiance in William King of Sicilie, hee came through Apulia to mount Gargari, and from thence taking ship (as Obba of Rauenna saith) in a vessel of Liburnia, he came to Zara ; And afterwards passing through Dalmatia, hee came in disguise to Venice, as to the only refuge of all libertie. Yet there scarce thinking himselfe in safetie (as being vnacquainted with the Venetians loue and affection towards him) concealing his estate, which he thought best so to doe, hee remained so long in the Hospital of the Charitie in poore raiment, called by the name of Commodo, as at last he was knowne by a naturall marke vpon his body. Some write, that the better to liue there in secret, he serued for Scullion of the kitchen. But it is more credible that he concealed his Dignitie vnder the habit of a poore Priest ; which by diuers likewise is affirmed.

The Emperour
Frederick vi-

against the Pope.

Pope Alexander
comes to Venice
in disguise.

Forraine Historians doe affirme, That he came to Venice with thirtene Gallies belonging to King William, and not like a fugitiue, to recouer the Emperours fauour in a free Citie, the place hauing bene appointed for the meeting. But if it were so as they say ; What needed so many Gallies ? which were sufficient, not only to haue transported the Popes small household, which is likely, at that time, to be but meane, but all Rome likewise : which in those daies was small inhabited. Besides, what needed he to haue made so long and dangerous a iourney ? As though he had rather to haue trauerfed the Sea-coasts with danger, than to passe in safetie through the Duchie of Spoleta, and marches of Ancona. Vndoubtedly hee needed not to haue bene at so great expences, nor yet to haue so greatly hazarded himselfe, had it not bene to haue auoided a greater danger. For the Emperours decree made all things difficult to him.

Therefore, in disguised habit, or in these Gallies (for some of our Historians co-uerly seeme to consent therunto) he must of necessity come to Venice. But how soeuer he arriued there, all those, whom we follow, doe agree, That being at the pursuit of Fredericke driuen from the Pontifical dignitie, hee had recourse to the Venetians ; and that, being knowne, he was honourably entertained by Prince Cy-ani, and lodged in the Castle of Olisullo : with promise, either to reconcile him to the Emperour, or else that they themselves would reestablish him in his See.

entertained the Pope when they knew him.

First of all, they concluded to send Ambassadors to Fredericke, to entreate him ; in the name of the common-wealth, to be reconciled with Pope Alexander, and that in so doing he should not only performe a matter most profitable for all Christendome, come, but most acceptable to the Venetians, who wholly fought the profit and advancement of Alexander. It is reported that the Pope being present when the letters were writing to Fredericke, and perceiving that they sealed them with wax, he commaunded, in fauour of Ciani & his successors, That euer after the Dukes letters should be sealed with lead: the which is obserued euen to this daie. Obba of Rauenna who liued in those times, as well in regard of the antiquitie of his booke, from whence we haue taken this, as also because he hath curiously set downe al which passed in this warre faith, That the Venetian Princes had till then vsed two sorts of scales; namely lead in all their publicke acts of perpetuall remembrance, and wax in all their misliues, and other priuate writings. At what time the

did beginne to marrie the Sea.

The Ambassadors being come into the presence of Fredericke, were at the first curteously entertained. But loo soon they made mention of peace with Alexander he fell into a rage, and said: Get ye hence, and tell your Prince and people, That Fredericke, the Roman Emperour, demaundeth his enemy which is come to them for succour; whom if they send not presently vnto him bound hand and foote, with a sure guard, he will proclaime them enemies to him and the whole Empire: And that there is neither alliance, nor law of Nations, which shall be able to free them from his reuenge for such an iniurie. To prosecute which hee is resolved to ouerturne all diuine and humane lawes: That he will sodainely bring his forces by Sea and Land before their Citie, and will, contrarie to their hope, plant his victorious Eagles in the market-place of Saint Marks.

The Ambassadors, being sent backe in this manner, did report at Venice the fierce menaces which the Emperour had vttered: wherewith the Citie was in some sort troubled; For there was likelihood of more sharpe warres, than euer in anie time before. They decreed forthwith to arme a great number of Shippes, and to make themselves euer masters of the Sea. For, that being well defended, they did not greatly feare the enemies forces.

Whilest the Fleet was preparing, and the whole Citie in expectation of this warre, speedie newes was brought, that Obba sonne to Fredericke, did approach with threescore and fiftene Gallies. Whereupon Ciani determining to meet him, caused the Fleete then presently made ready, to set saile. Before they went aboard the Pope celebrated diuine seruice, with prayers to God, That it might please him to graunt the victorie to the Prince and his followers. Afterwards turning towards Ciani, he honored him with the golden sword, and with other signes of Knight-hood; who sayling from the Port with thirtie Gallies, made way with speed towards the enemies. It is reported that they met on the frontiers of Hiltria, nere to the Promontorie of Salberico, in the Countrey of the Piranni. And that they fought there a long time; where at last, the enemy being broken and put to rout, eight and fortie of his Gallies were taken; and among others, the Royall Gallie, and two brought Obba prisoner to Venice.

At the report of this victorie, the whole Citie was filled with meruailous ioye and amazement: They did hardly beleue that the battaile was so luckily obtained, and that so small a number had fought so valiantly. But vnderstanding that the Fleet was at hand, and that Obba, sonne to Fredericke, with diuers other great personages were brought prisoners, a great multitude of people ranne to see them. The taking of so great a Prince made Ciani his return the more triumphant. Vnto whom, being come on shoare, the Pope, after he had congratulated his victorie, presented a ring of gold. Take (quoth he) Ciani this ring, and by my aduice, giue it to the Sea, obliging it thereby vnto thee, the which both thou and thy successors likewise shall for euer hereafter yearly doe on this same day, to the end posteritie may know, that ye haue in times passed by right of warre purchased the intire dominion ouer the Sea, making it subiect vnto you as a woman is to her husband.

The

The Venetians suffered Obba vpon his word, to goe vnto his father Frederick, promising to returne if hee could not mediate a peace for Alexander and for them. Departing vpon these promises, and being come into his fathers presence, he was entertained with so much the more ioy, as the feare and doubt of his being aliue had beene great; where after many reciproall embracements entermingled with reares hee did briefly discourse of the battaile, and referre it to haue beene done by the diuine providence, saying hee had omitted nothing in that fight which did be- long to a good Captaine; and that there wanted nothing for the obtaining of victorie, but a iust quarrell. It behooued him then to beleue, that God was powerfull therein, and not men, seeing so mightie an Armie as theirs was, not being slowe to fight, had beene defeated by a few, who were not halfe their number. And howe- soeuer they might well querethrows and destroy, burne forces, yet it was impos- sible to surmount diuine. Therefore hee did most humbly beseech his Maiestie, no more to trouble Alexander for his place, whose quarrell hee might perceiue, by the success, to bee maintained not only by men, but by God himselfe: further al- leading, That he had already disquieted him with the forces of the Empire, and sought to put him from his seate, yet all in vaine: That therefore he should do a dee- pleasing to all men, and worthis of a Christian, if (all hatred being forgotten) it would please him to change his minde, and after assurance taken from the Veneti- ans for his safe coming, he would be pleased to visit the Pope, and openly to giue him satisfaction. Which being once done they might euer after remaine good friends, and consult together about the welfare of all Christendome, the which hee did againe most earnestly intreat.

The discourse of Obba did mightily preuaile with his father; who on a sodaine being changed from warre to peace, began to incline toward a reconciliation with Alexander and the Venetians. Whereupon so soone as hee had receiued safe-con- duct from the Venetians, he came to Venice. Pietro Ciani, the Princes sonne, was sent with six Gallies to Rauennato meet him. Diuers small boates went as farre as Chioggiato doe the like. But being arrived at Venice, without staying in any place, hee went to see the Pope, who tarried for him at the gate of Saint Marks Church, reuested in his Pontificallibus, sitting in a chaire richly decked: nere vnto whom when he approached, he threw off his purple robe, and crept on his knees euen to his Holinesse feet, the which hee humbly kissed. The Pope raised him vp, and embraced him. Then both of them entering into the Church went vnto the high Altar, whereon that most excellent table of gold (whereof wee haue hereto- fore spoken) enriched with most pretious gems was laid, and the which is to this day to be seene in the treasure of Saint Marks. The same was then seene and ga- zed vpon by the people, who receiued a wonderfull contentment to see the two greatest Potentates of Christendome talking there lowly together.

obedience to the Pope.

Some say that the Pope (for satisfaction of his wrongs sustained) whilest the Emperour kneeled on the ground did set his foote vpon his necke, speaking this verse of David, super aspidem & Basiliscum ambulabis; and that the Emperour with a great and inuincible courage made answer at the same time, Non tibi sed Petro. Vnto whom hee replied in choller treading more hard vpon him, Et mihi & Petro. This was done vpon Ascension day. Others say that it was vpon the day that the battaile was wonne, and that in memorie thereof, the Pope granted great pardons to all, who repenting, and being confessed, should visit euery yeare on the same day Saint Marks Church. Not long after, the Emperour and the Pope departed from Venice. But the Venetian Historians say that both of them tarried there certaine moneths.

Diuers opinions of the Historians concerning this reconciliation.

Obba of Rauenna reportes that Frederick came by Land to Ancona, and Pope Alexander with Prince Ciani arrived there at the same time: the whole Citie run- ning out to meet them: And to giue them honorable entertainment, the City sent out two Canopies; the one for Alexander, and the other for Frederick; and that then the Pope comitaunded a third to bee brought for the Venetian Prince, and permitted him in the presence of all the people, that he and his successours should for euer vse one, as they at this day doe, when they walke abroad in solemnitie, with the other Ducall Ensignes.

When they arrived at Rome, the Pope was receiued with all gladnesse: who observing amongst these triumphes silver trumpets which made a verie excellent sound, caused eight of them to be giuen to the Venetian Prince, in memorie of his victorie: which the soueraigne Magistrate of Venice should euer afterwards vse. All the Venetian Chroniclers doe affirme this to be true.

Cyani taking leaue of the Pope, returned with his holy blessing to Venice. The 10
Marriners appointed for that purpose went to receiue him in the Bucentauro. The Bishop of the Castle with the most part of the Citie went forth to meete him and to doo him reuerence; who landing at the Hauene, hauing a burning taper of white Wax borne before him (as the first gift which he receiued of Pope Alexander being at Venice) the Canopie, the silver trumpets, and the bannier, (being the ensignes which he and his successours had receiued, on condition to haue them carried before them euer after) he entered the Citie with great ioy. This is it which we finde aswell in the Venetian Historians as in strangers, touching this so famous victorie, obtained by the Venetians against Otho, sonne to the Emperour Frederick: All which the Venetians, who liued long time after, would haue to be publickly represented. For the whole order of this warre is painted in the hall of the Palace, where euery eight dayes they assemble for the creation of new Officers.

Cyani being oppressed with old age, and ill disposed of his person, after that hee had prosperously gouerned the Common-wealth for the space of eight yeares, caused himselfe to be carried into Saint Georges Monasterie, where in short space he died. Hee gaue to the Common-wealth by his testament diuers lands, neere to Saint Marks Church; and some others in the Mercers street, neere to Saint Iulian, to the Priests of the Church where he should be buried.

It is reported, That it was hee which did enrich Saint Marks Church with that sumptuousnesse and magnificent cost, whereof wee will make so much the shorter mention, as we drawe neare to the end of this booke.

Now this Church is not, as diuers other, so much recommended for the greatness and vnmeasurable extent, as it is for the richness thereof. It is builded in forme like a Crosse, whose corners are highly vaulted, and covered with lead, as all thereof is, which is discerned of Sea-men higher than all the buildings of the Citie about six-score (sixty) from thence. The whole masse is besides supported by most curious Arches, ioyned together by a meruailous skill: The inner part, from the middle euen to the highest part thereof, glistereth with gold; and the concavities of the vaults is enriched with diuers goodly and ancient pictures, made after the Greeke manner, which, with the labour to behold them in respect of their height, doe present to the spectators, by their sad and venerable aspect, a kinde of feare 40 entermingled with pietie, and religion. That which is from the guilding downe to the pavement, is so well compassed and ioyned together with goodly tables of marble, as by their pleasant raies in forme of vaines, the eyes of the beholders are rather wearied than satisfied. The seats below are of a strangered stone, like to Porphyrie. The pavement all of marble, engrauen with diuers figures wholly different, and of sundrie colours. Besides, sundrie Columnnes, and diuers tables of marble Taspic, Parian, Spartan, and Numidian, (at lest, resembling them) enuiron the high seats on both sides the Quire. The coming into the Church on both sides 50 is in a manner of the same trimming. Whose gilded Arches, are sustained without, by more then three hundred admirable Columnnes, not so much for their greatness, as for their diuersitie of colours: the space betweene those pillars being covered with goodly tables of marble. On the height of this entrance, foure great brazen horses gilded are to bee scene, as if they neighed for ioy: which is indeede a most excellent excellent peece of worke, but not of our time. All this beares vp the highest top of the Church, diuided into fixe steeples: euery of which, built like a Pyramides, hath on the sharpest point thereof standing a white marble statue of a naked man. Diuers other representations delightfull to behold, and wrought with exceeding skill, do greatly beautifie the spaces betwixt these steeples. The whole worke aswell on the right hand, as on the left, is of the same substance and workmanship, and all that which is vaulted vnderneath, is covered with gold. In a word there is no place in the whole Church, either within or without, but is either trimmed with gold, or marble, or with some other rich stone; so that two Columnnes of Alabaster, which stand neere to the high Altar, and the Calcidonie stones; which are to bee scene in the midst of the pavement, of the breadth of a foote and halfe, are among so great riches counted as nothing. Such is the structure of Saint Marks Church, the adorning whereof (as I haue said) is for the most part attributed to Prince 10

Cyani. And because it wholly (in a manner) glistereth with gold, I will not sticke (as I haue already done) to call it the golden Church, as often as I shall haue cause to speake thereof.

Whom was the Author of the publike Almes.

The ancient manner of distributing Almes.

He common opinion is, That by a Testamentarie legacie of Prince Cyani, this holy distribution of money was likewise ordain'd, whereby the Procurators of S. Marke doe at this day relecue with the publike money, the necessitie of Orphans, and other poore distressed People. But the ancient manner of distributing it was altogether different from that at this day; the which being more seemely, was also more to be praised. For it is said, That those distributors did themselves enquire of euery ones necessitie, and then putting the money into little coffins of paper, wherein were written the severall names of such only as they meant to relecue that day, they would would in the evening go to the poore mens houses, and giue them the Almes in very great secrecie. A man should not haue scene in those dayes (because there was no such neede) so many poore people at their Gates as now there are. The recommendation of friends and kinsfolkes did then finally preuaile; those onely which were knowne to be poore were alone releued. The ancient maner is now wholly changed: and this change proceedeth from the great multitude of busineses. For they which at this day haue those offices, are almost of the chiefe of the Senate, for Councill, Age, and Authoritie, whereby they haue not onely the managing of this businesse of the Commonwealth, but diuers others likewise, and of greater importance: So, as being imployed in diuers busineses, they themselves cannot in such manner intend this, as did those of old time. But they doe at this day liberally releue all those who are recommended vnto them (provided that the partie who recommendeth be of good reputation, and the pouterie of the person recommended apparant) therein omitting no worke of charitie.

IN the place of deceased Cyani, the people did subrogate Auria Maripietro, (called by some, Andrea) hauing for the same purpose appointed foure men amongst them, who should euer after haue authoritie to chooseth fortie. Being by these men chosen Prince, he had no sooner receiued the enignes of Soueraigne dignitie, but forthwith he disloyned the Pisans from those of Ancona: who being backt by the Pisans, and by consencience of the places, had for a time by their ordinarie incursions greatly molested the Venetians at Sea. But at the last, after a reciprocall restitution of whatfoerer had beene taken, truce was granted for ten yeares.

A new manner of electing the Prince.

At the same time those of Zara revolted from the Venetians the fourth time, and soone after this revolt, Bella King of Hungarie, filled their Citie with Garrisons. It is said that they did thus vpon discontentment, that their Church should be subiect to that of Grada; if it were vpon any other occasion, yet this at the least was all their pretext. It is certaine that this Citie, which in respect of her often rebellions had beene a cause of extraordinarie expence to the Venetians, was very glad, vnder this pretence to vent her former determinations. This revolt being knowne, all men were of opinion forth-with to leuie an Armie, to reduce the Zaratins to their obedience, and to punish them according to their deserts; for their often breach of faith, that they might serue for an example to others. But mens hope to see this Armie in readinesse, in regard of the pouertrie of the common Treasurie, was small; wherevpon diuers of the wealthie Citizens bearing a singular affection to the common-wealth, louing their Countreys profit more than their owne, did giue great summes of money. There were likewise diuers impositions exacted at Rialto towards this warre. By meanes whereof the Armie being readie, sailed into Dalmatia. At the Venetians arriuall Zara was besieged, and all the Islands neare to the Citie were in a short space recovered. The Citie it selfe, in regard of the Kings Garrison within it, could not be taken.

But whilest the Venetians were busied in the Dalmatian warres, the Christian 10
Princes tooke armes for the recouerie of Ierusalem, from whence the Saracens vnder the conduct of Saladine had expelled the French, the foure-score and eighth year after it was taken by Godfrey. Wherefore the Venetians taking truce for two yeares with King Bella, at Pope Clement his entreatie, who did earnestly solicit them to vndertake this voyage, they soone resolved to leue a mightie armie. Diuers great Princes likewise did for the same purpose arme themselves (as wee haue said) at the Popes request. Among whom were the Emperour Fredericke, the Kings of France, and England, and Otho Duke of Burgundie, accompanied by diuers great Prelats: The Pisans likewise joining themselves with the Venetians on the Adriaticke Sea, passed into Syria with diuers vessels. But both their fleets arriued there, 20 a long time before those of Frederick and the other kings. For the Citie of Acre, (which the Christians had likewise lost) was besieged, before Frederick had crossed Saint Georges Arme to come into Asia, or before that Philip (departing from Messina, whither he was come with Richard, after they had crossed the Riuer of Genoa waie and the Tuscan Sea) did arriue in the Prouince. Richard being tossed with a furious tempest cast Anker in Cyprus, which he wholly spoiled, because the inhabitants at his arriuall had refused to receive him into their Hauen. From whence soon after he passed into Syria.

Frederick, after he had taken certaine Townes in Asia, entred Armenia the lesse, where vniadvisedly going into a deepe Riuer, to wash and refresh himselfe, being 30 carried awaie by the force of the streame he was drowned. But before this happened, our people had a long time laboured before Acre: for they had sometime fought with great hazard with Saladine. And besides that, want of all necessaries was so great in the Christians camp, as the Soldiours did not refuse to eate whatsoever they found, how vnholefome or bad so euer it were, and being almost starued, did expose themselves out of their Trenches to bee slaine by the enemies shot. In the end, at the arriuall of these two Kings, the two Armies beeing ioined together, the French became so strong, as they no more feared to bee enforced by the enemy to dis campe from that side. Saladine resolved by force to open a waie for his Soldiours, and vying fraud with force, hee caused a ship full of Snakes and Serpents, 40 to saile directly towards the front of the Christians battaile. But being come in view, before the Barbarians who were within it could haue leisure to vse their cunning, their fleet being broken and defeated before the Hauen, this shippe was of set purpose sunke. Whereupon, the Townes-men and those of the Garrison hauing lost all hope of being relieved, did yeeld, after they had maintained the siege a whole yere. They were cruelly dealt with, by reason that in their capitulation they promised to giue the Christians a part of the holie Crosse, the which could no where be found.

Acre beeing taken, the Venetians possessed the selfe-same right, which they had in times past purchased by Armes in the same Citie. This is all which hapned a-broade during the Principalltie of Auria. But within the Citie they stamped a 50 new coine, called (Aurelia) by the name of the Authour, who retiring himselfe into the Monasterie of Holie Crosse, the ninth year (as some say) of his government, or the fourteenth (according to some) or the eight & twentieth year, which is much more (as others say) tooke the Monastick habit, and there died.

Henrico

HENRICO DANDVLO, the
41. Duke of Venice.

Henrico Dandolo, beeing declared Prince by the fortie according to the manner aboue mentioned, succeeded him.

The Common-wealth vnder this man did not only purchase fame and renowne, but did mightily enlarge the bounds of her Dominions.

He first of all forbad those of Verona from trafficking with the Venetians, because they had wronged certaine Venetian Marchants on the Riuer Adice. This prohibition caused them to restore that which they had taken from the Venetians in their Priuileges and immunities, and neuer more to molest them sailing on those streames.

The Armie returned from Syria, for the great want it had of fresh supplies, hauing beene abroade three yeares: The Pisans likewise left the Prouince: But they, continually during the three yeares they were abroad, did so enuie and hate the Venetians, that the same (as it often hapneth) did beget open dissension, which turned at last to the Pisans ouerthrow. For they, sailing on the Adriaticke Sea, surprized the Citie of Pola tributarie to the Venetians, with intent to winter there, if it were possible. But the Venetians, not being able to suffer such indignitie, did Armeten Gallies, and six ships of burthen: and adding certaine fresh supplies of Souldiours, they came speedily to Pola, the which being as speedily recovered, they burnt all the 40
Tuscan ships which they found in the Hauen. The greatest part of their Fleet was gone to conuoe six ships of burthen of their owne, who returned at that time from Greece laden with Marchandize, and were going home: The Venetians, after they had dismantled the Citie of Pola (not so much for hatred to the Townesmen, as to make it lesse fit for the Pisans retraite, at any other time) sailed towards Modona, determining to meete with those six ships of Pisa, and to fight with the other which were gone from Pola to conuoe them. It was not long ere they were descried; and making towards them, they fought almost in the view of the Citie, where the Tuscan conuoe being broken and put to flight, two of the Marchant-ships were taken. Soone after, they made peace with the Pisans.

Some Venetian Historians, not mentioning this peace, do affirme, How the same year that they fought before Modona, the Pisans, backt by the Brundusians, did hinder the Venetians free Nauigation on the Adriaticke Sea. Whereupon Giouanni Baffio and Thomaso Phaledrio beeing sent against them with great forces, did in such fort terrifie them, as they enforced them speedily to forsake the Seas: and going aswards against the Brundulians who had afflicted them with men and victuallies, they did contraine them to sue for peace, the which was granted by the Venetians.

Pellegrino Bishop of Aquileia did at the same time make a new league with the Venetians; thereby the better to enable himselfe against Treviso, whose open enemy he was. And by that meanes being made a Citizen of Venice, he did purchase diuers lands in the Citie, and did by this agreement promise the Common-wealth all aide and assistance when need should be. For his sake the Trevisians were forbidden any more trafficke with the Citie.

About the same time the Venetians had a new occasion presented them to enlarge their dominions. Isaac at the same time commanded the Grecian Empire, who was a great friend to the western Christians, and had, not long before, liberally receaued and welcomed (which his ancestors before him had neuer done but against their willes, for the natural hatred which that Nation euer bare to all Christians of Europe) all the French and Almaine Capitaines which were going into Asia. This man had a younger brother named Alexis, whom he had euer so dearly loued, as (the name of Emperour excepted, which he refused to himselfe) he liued in equall command with him. Isaac had moreover not long before paid to the barbarous enemy (who had by his owne rashnesse taken him prisoner) a great weight of gold for his ransom. But this most vnthankfull brother, forgetting all these benefites, tooke his brother Isaac by treason, pluckt forth his eyes, and being blinded shut him vp in prison: And not therewith satisfied hee would haue done as much to his nephew, his brothers sonne, a childe of twelue years old. But the young boy by the aduice of his friends, and by discretion farre about one of his age, (as it is reported) sau'd himselfe by flight. The Venetians forces were at the same time verie great. For at the beginning of the spring-time the same year, Boniface of Montferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and Henrie Earle of S. Paul, were arrived at Venice, and with them the Duke of Sauoy, intending to march against the Turkes and Sarracens. Some Authors saie that they sent their Ambassadors. But the most part affirme, that the Princes came themselves in person and compounded with the Venetians for the passage of eight thousand foot, and foure thousand five hundred horse with their baggage, & victuallies, vnto Saint Georges arme, by which way all the Christian Princes had still passed ouer their forces; because there was no likelihood of any other safer way into Asia, as also, for that Germanie and Hungarie were not quiet, and likewise in regard of these newes stirres at Constantinople, the which daily encreased, by reason of that which had hapned.

The Venetian Chronicles make mention of nine and twentie thousand foot, of whom nine thousand were Targuettiers, the which is more credible. For it is not probable, that foure so great Princes, vndertaking so long and dangerous a voyage, would leaue but twelue thousand five hundred men, seeing that any one of them could easily haue furnished as many. It is reported that they promised a verie great summe of money for the transportation of so great an Armie.

Now the Shippes of warre being readie, because the Souldiours arrived later than it was expected, the iourney was put off till Haruest. By meanes whereof the Princes and Capitaines hauing spent all they had brought with them for that voyage were constrained to borrow of the Venetians. It is reported that the Venetians in stead of lending did freely giue them the money which they demanded, to the end to rye them vnto them, hauing determined to make vse of them, promising to vs greater liberalitie towards them, if they would lend them their forces till such time as they had reduced the Prouince of Histria vnder their obedience, & recouered the Citie of Zara which had so often rebelled, the which for a few years had bin possiessed by the King of Hungarie. This being freely granted, they made an agreement betwixt them for a year, That the Venetians should only let forth thre score Gallies at their owne costs to ship their Souldiours, and that all the towns and booties, which should be taken, should be equally diuided betwixt them and the Venetians, Dalmatia (Dalmatia and the adiacent llands excepted, which they acknowledge to be a part of the Venetians Dominion.) Duke Henric, albeit he were euill disposed of his person, & his sight much impaired by the malice of the Emperour Emanuel, would neuertheless for the loue he did beare his Countie, make one in the number. Therefore he departed from Venice before any of the rest, the 15. day of October. The morrow after, they all followed him. The Nauie consisted of two hundred and fortie Shippes of warre. For, besides the thre score Gallies promised first to the French; they made ready thre score and ten Shippes of burthen, to embarke the forraigne Souldiours, and fix score other Vessels, vulgarly called Vrserions, for the cariage of the victuals, horse and furniture of the Armie.

The Triesteines, and other the Inhabitants of Histria, accustomed to robbe at Sea, amazed to see so mightie a Flecte, did speedily send to the Prince for peace, which was granted them on these conditions; That those of Humaga, and the Triesteines, should pay to the Venetian Prince a yearly tribute for each of them, of fiftie hogheads of Wine. And to this purpose they sent Commissioners to Venice, to sweare to this conuention before the Senate, and to remaine euer after loyall to the Venetians, as their Ancestors had done. From Histria the Armie came to the siege of Zara. This siege, (by reason that the Citie was well victualled and furnished with Souldiers) lasted longer than was expected. The Citie being often assaulted, with great effusion of blood on either side, was in the end after sundrie losses recouered, and forthwith dismantled on that part next to the Sea. The chiefe Citizens despairing of pardon in regard of their continuall rebellion, sau'd themselves by flight.

The Winter in the meane time was very much spent, by reason whereof and through the sharpnesse of the weather, they were constrained to tarie there. At what time, yong Alexis, who had escaped from the bloody hands of his Vnkle, arrived at the Campe, and came into the presence of Duke Dandolo, and the French Princes, that Wintered there. This yong boy, after hee had with teares greatly complained on his Vncles crueltie, of his Fathers blindnesse, darke Imprisonment, bonds, and ill vllage, and of his owne banishment, able to draw pittie from his enemies, he did earnestly intreate them, in regard of the ancient friendship which his Father had euer borne to the Venetians, for the fidelitie, alliance, hospitalitie, and other benefites which all Christendome had receiued from him, as well at Constantinople, as in other parts of the Empire, to relieue him in his affliction, and not to suffer his Father any longer to languish in darknesse, more obscure than his blindnesse: And declared how that himselfe being yet very yong, deprived of his Fathers helpe and counsell, and of all his friends, being banished, poore, needie, and ignominiously driuen out of his Fathers Empire, was constrained miserably to beg his bread: After all which hee promised to giue them a great weight of Gold, with other great rewards so soone as by their meanes he should recouer the Empire.

The teares of this yong child did greatly moue all the assistants; his age likewise, and his cause, were found to be iust and reasonable, the which all men did willingly fauour. Then the great promises which he made in this great danger, did shew that he had bene taught what to say, by those who attended him in his flight. For hardly could a man of riper yeares (much lesse one like himselfe, who was not yet out of child-hood) haue of himselfe inuented those things which he promised them. It is reported that he promised, so soone as he should be alone, or with his Father, restored to the Empire, he would make the Church of Constantinople subiect to that of Rome, and giue the Venetians and French-men, a certaine weight of gold in recompence of the losses which they had sustained in times past, and at sundrie times by the Emperour Emanuel: And moreover, to giue vnto the Venetians a great summe of money, which the forraigne Princes had promised them at the first, for the transportation of their souldiers. Vpon these conditions and promises, the Venetians and French departed from Dalmatia at the beginning of the spring, determining ning to faile with a direct courfe to Constantinople, if a contrarie winde did not hin-

the Venetians departure, made rodes and incurfions all along the Sea-coasts of Illiria and Dalmatia; againft whom a new Armie was intended. Rayniero Dandolo, Sonne to Duke Henrico, a braue and courageous yong man, did command in the Citie as Lieutenant to his Father: He, hauing armed certaine fhips of warre, paffed ouer into Dalmatia againft thofe banifhed Zaratins. He caufed a Fort to be built in the neareft Ifland to Zara, which was called Euill Council, to refift the incurfions and dofeigns of the enemies: The Bandetti being backt by the aide of the King of Hungarie, came on a fodaine and fuprised the Garrifon within it, and razed the Fort: whereupon a greater flecte was fet forth, fufficient to reпреffe the incurfions, and rafh attempts of thofe Pirates. The which being knowne to them, they humbly fued for peace and obtained it on thefe conditions; That (the chiefe of them) hauing giuen their children in hofage to the Venetians) all the Bandetti fhould returne home into their Countrey; and fhould obey the Venetian Magiftrate, and the Church, (that of Grada) and fhould besides fend euery yeare to the Duke of Venice a thoufand Connie-fkins.

Whileft thefe things were done in Dalmatia, the Venetians and French-men after they had firft croffed the Ionian Seas, and afterwards the Aegean and the Hellefpont, arriued at the Bofphorus of Thrace, called St. Georges arme. But wee muft fpeake fomewhat briefly here, of the place and fituation of the Citie, for the more eafie vnderftanding of what fhall be hereafter fet downe.

Bizantium (named, as all men know, Constantinople by Constantine, who much augmented it, and did there eftablifh his Empire) yea builded (as faith Trogus) by Pausanias King of Sparta, is feated in fo pleafant and commodious a place, as the Megarians, who a long time before were the founders of Calcydonia, which is right ouer againft it, were eftemed by Apollo's Oracle of fmall iudgement; becaufe they refufed fo goodly and fertile a Countrey, as is that where Bizantium was afterward builded, and chofe a barren and defert foile.

The ftreight of the Sea is fife hundred paces in breadth, and waxeth fill more narrow, as it draweth nearer to the Bofphorus of Thrace (fo called for the vfuall and eafie paffage of Oxen) called at this day S. Georges arme. This Citie on the North fide hath the Sea of fiftie ftadys in length, and the maine drawing towards the Weft. At the mouth of this ftreight in a fmall diftance ftands Constantinople on one fide, and Pera on the other, fo called in Greeke (as I thinke) for the fmall fpace that is betwixt them, being oppofite one to another. Alexis had fhut vp this fpace with a great yron chaine, and placed a ftrong Garrifon at either end thereof, to hinder the enemies entrance.

Now whileft this great flect ftaid there; the Ambaffadours of the Ifle of Candie came with two Gallies in the name of the whole Ifland, to acknowledge him for their Lord. This yong youth, after he had louingly receiued them, gaue the whole Ifland to Boniface of Montferat, a valiant man, and his neare Kinfinman. The chaine in the meane time could not be broken, vntill that a very great fhip, called the Eagle, furnifhed with great yron tongs, and driuen forward by a North-winde, ftrake vpon it, and brake it in peeces. Prefently hereupon the Venetians entred the ftreight and landed all the forraigne troupes, which done, the Citie in an infant was befieged both by Sea and Land. But fo foone as the Campe arriued, Theodore LaCaris, fonne in law to the Emperour, made a fodaine fallie with his forces on the Pilgrims, (for the French-men and they on this fide the mountains departing to the warres of Egia, would at the firft be fo called) to trouble their incamping. The fight at the firft was very bloudie, and doubtfull, but at the laft, the Greekiſh furie being abated, Theodore with his forces was conſtrained with great loffe to retire into the citie. The Venetian flect on the other fide attempted to winne the Hauen, but they fpend two whole daies in breaking the chaine which lockt it. And this fight was fo much the more

more difficult to the Venetians, by how much the Garrifon of the Hauen was ftronger than that of the ftreight, whereof we haue fpooken. Twentie Gallies on a front being tied together by great yron chaines, lay at the entrie thereof, to keepe out the enemies; and it was dangerous to come neare them, in regard of the great numbet of arrowes which flew from them againft thofe which came formoft. Yet neuerthe-leffe the Venetians valour ouer-came this: For after they had likewife broken it, and furiously affailed the enemy, the hatien was wonne in an infant. The Gallies being forſaken at the very firft brunt by Alexis Souldiers, fell into the poffeffion of the Venetians.

After this viftorie, they refolued to affault the Citie with engins on all fides, and after they had diuided the portions betwixt them, the Venetians did forth-with erect diuers warlike engins againft the Citie on the Hauens fide. Then they tooke two great malts of fhips, and tying them together they made a bridge vpon them; from whence they ſhot into the Citie at their pleaſures, by reaſon the bridge was much higher than the walls. They did moreover caſt fierie lances vpon the neareſt houſes, which lighting vpon drie matter kindled ſuch a flame, as thofe who defended the wall being therewith terrified, in great confuſion forſooke their places; which the Venetians moyning on ladders, did forthwith poſſeſſe. Alexis at this fodaine rumour came ruſhing thither with three thouſand Souldiers which were of his guard, and made ſhew at the firſt, as if he would haue affailed the Venetians, vſing thereby a Greekiſh pollicie, to make ſhew of nothing leſſe than flight. But becauſe all was loſt, not only in that place, but likewiſe on the land-fide, where Laſcaris had beene beaten into the Citie with great loſſe, Alexis made a ſtay, as though he would haue defended the fight till the morrow. But the Venetians purſuing the viftorie, did alreadie in a manner fight in the very Citie. Whereupon Alexis at the entrie of the night holding all for loſt, left his wife and children, and committing great treaſures which hee had drawne forth of the ground to the keeping of his Daughter Irene, who was a Nunne, about midnight he left the Citie and fled.

His flight being openly knowne, Iſaac was forthwith taken out of priſon, and the Citie-gates being let open, the yong Alexis was with great ioy receiued by all the people: Both of them were ſaluted Emperors: Great was the ioy on either fide, but not without teares, to behold the wretched blind old man, who did greatly praiſe the pietie, and good nature of his ſonne, and reioyced with him for this hap-pie ſucceſſe, exhorting him courageouſly to maintaine the Empire which hee had by his vertue recovered. The child on the other fide was no leſſe ioyfull, to ſee his Father freed from the priſon of his wicked brother; and that ſo peridious a perſon, hated of God and Men, being driuen juſtly both from Empire and Countrey, was compelled to vndergoe ſo ignominious a banifhment: ſaying, that his owne happi-neſſe did not ſo much content him, as to ſee his Father reuenged on his enemy. That hee did not doubt, but that this wretched Alexis was greatly troubled in his minde, knowing his enemy to command in the ſame place, from whence himſelfe had beene ſhamefully expulſed. After all theſe reciprocal complements, Iſaac did in open aſſembly confirme & ratifie all that which his ſonne had granted to the Venetians and French-men, the Proteſtors of his ſtate. And all the good old mans thoughts were, how; and by what meanes hee might pay the Venetians, and French, that which had beene promiſed them: when falling ſodainly ſicke, hauing (as it was thought) taken the aire too ſoone, he died in few daies after. The Sonne, no leſſe mindfull than the Father, to acknowledge the benefits which he had receiued, did meane, not only to effect what he promiſed, but to releue thoſe that paſſed into Aſia, with victuals, men, and all other neceſſaries. But this vngratefull Citie, accuſtomed euer to ſeditious noueltie, did croſſe his deſignes. For a ſodaine commotion being raifed in the Citie the people with great noiſe ranne to the Palace, where after diuers reprochfull ſpeeches vſed to the yong Alexis, they told him that he was a foosumme of money foolishly promised to a covetous Nation, enemy to the Greeks, made no matter of ruining & depouling his Citie of her wealth. But the yong man fearing in that tumult to be slaine, and being more discreet than one of such yeares, he told them aloud, that he would therein be ruled by his subiects. By this popular answer he appeased the tumult for that night. The next day, so soone as hee had debated the matter with diuers of his friends, by their aduise he sent to his Cousin Boniface, entreating him to come to his aide about the third watch of the night following, with all the forces hee could bring, acquainting him in what danger hee was among his owne subiects; the Empire not being alone in hazard, but his owne life likewise. Therefore he did earnestly entreate him, not to forsake him in those tender yeares, being his neare kinsman, and wholly destitute of all helpe and counsell, further certifying him that he would giue order, that one of the Citie-gates should be open against his arrivall.

Myrtilus.

Among those who knew this secret, was one called Alexis, surnamed Myrtilus; or (as others say) Myrrophon, whom the Emperour Iulian had preferred from a meane estate to diuers places of honour. This man being ambitious, and sodaine in his attempts, discovered the whole matter to certaine of the contrarie faction, whom hee knew to be of great authoritie in the Citie, and procured them to raise a new fire at the houre appointed of the night following. This was accordingly effected. Now therefore in the midst of the uproare, hee counselled the yong Alexis, trembling with feare, to hide himselfe in the most secret place of the Palace; and making the danger to be much greater than it was, he in a manner enforced him so to doe; and hauing hid him in a sure place, hee committed him to the keeping of some of his owne trustie friends. Hereupon he came forth, as though hee would haue quieted the tumult, the which he had promised to doe. The beginning of his speech was, in declaring vnto them in what termes the affaires of the Empire stood, & the imminent danger which threatned them from those covetous Nations, (for so he termed them) and enemies to the Greeks, and therefore hee said it was most necessarie to haue a man of iudgement, valour, and discretion; and not a child, if they desired to redresse these mischiefs. He obtained at that time what hee so much desired. For the whole multitude, crying out consufedly; some said he should be gouernour of the Citie, others Generall of the men at Armes, and the third sort called him Emperour. And thus in this tumult being followed by a troupe of Souldiers, and by some of his kinsmen who assisted him, he made himselfe Master of the Imperiall Palace, where with his owne hand he cut yong Alexis throte. Then after he had appeased the tumult, and raised great forces, his first resolution was to driue the French and Venetians forth of the Empire; and afterwards for his better safetie, to put all Alexis Friends and Allies to death.

The Greckes
the Citie.

In this resolution hee forthwith marched out of the Citie, and embattailed his Armie, whom he conducted against the enemy, after this maner. In the Front hee placed Priestes bearing Images in their hands, who at the beginning of the fight should sing certaine spirituall Hymnes. I know not whether hee did this to draw his enemies to some deuotion, or whether hee thought by beginning with diuine Action, the sooner to obtaine the victorie. The first charge lighted by chance on the Earle of Flanders quarter, who like a valiant and carefull Captaine, did with a few sustaine the furious assaults of the Greckes, vntill that an armed Legion came to his rescue, and soone after all the rest. Whereupon, the fight in an instant being equal, and his enemies very much shaken, Myrtilus altogether dismaied fled a pace towards the Citie, and was so narrowly pursued by our men, as himselfe and his troupes had like to haue bene taken vnder the Walls. The Italians and French held as a token of good lucke, the taking of an Image of the Virgin Marie from the Greckes: imagining that it did foretell their victorie, in regard such a diuine power had forsaken the Greckes and was come vnto them. They did afterwards consult whether it were best to besiege Myrtilus in the Citie. All men were of opinion that it was lawfull and iust to kill a wicked man, who had not onely defiled himselfe by an execrable murder, but had likewise seized on the Empire which was engaged to them by covenant for great summes of money.

The Venetians and French contracted new alliance, wherein it was expressly mentioned, That the halfe part of the Citie, Townes, and other matters which should be taken perforce from the Grecian Empire, should belong to the French, and the other halfe to the Venetians. Some Authors make mention of another kinde of diuision, wherein the Venetians had but the third part onely of whatsoever was taken. But the most part are of the former opinion: Hereupon, all of them prepared for the besieging of the Citie, and they proceeded therein both by sea and land with such earnestnes, as they neuer ceased, vntill they had brought it in subiection to the French men, and the Venetians. Neuertheless the victorie was not verie easie. For the siege, through the wilfull obstinacie of the Greckes, lasted threecore and eight daies. The Venetians valour did greatly appeare in this siege; who, hauing assaulted the Citie after the same manner as they had done at the first, after they had driuen the enemies from the walls, entered the towne somewhat before those, who in great numbers fought on the land-side. Myrtilus in the darkness of the night departing with his wife and concubines, carrying with him a great weight of gold, auoided his deserved punishment. The Citizens being reduced into euident danger, (for the victors who possessed the walles, amazed them on the one side, and Myrtilus flight dismaied them on the other) did (if needeise enforcing them thereunto) sue for pardon; and to this purpose, they caused the Clergie to goe formoft with their reliques and Images, and themselves after being vnarmed, who coming in view of the Venetians, which possessed the walles, began to crie for mercie: the which was easily granted them vpon the opening of their gates. The Venetians entering first, the French followed with all their troups which had fought by land. Now the Citie being taken, the chiefe of the Armie consulted together to name fiftene men which should haue authoritie to elect a new Emperour. And it was expressly mentioned, That if the Emperour whom they chose were not a Venetian, it should be lawfull for the Venetians to appoint one of their own nation, whom they pleased to be Patriarch of the Citie. This thus concluded, the Venetians deputed fise Electors, the Earles of Flaunders and Saint Paul as many, and the Dukes of Sauoy and Montserrat made vp the number. By these mens voices Baldwin Earle of Flaunders was declared Emperour; and Thomas Morosino Patriarch of Constantinople by the Venetians: who soone after went to Rome, and was confirmed in his dignitie by the Pope Innocent.

The Princes in the mean time desirous to prosecute their voyage to the holy Land, vifing great liberalitie to the new Emperour, gaue him the moitie of the Citie, Provinces, Tributes, and other matters, (fallen to them by agreement) of the Grecke Empire. And not satisfied with this good office, they added to this great liberality, That all the Cities, Castles, Forts, and Townes which they should take depending on the Grecke Empire, should be recovered as in his name, and reduced vnder his obedience. Some thinke that the fourth part of the Empire was giuen to him, and the residue being diuided into two parts, the one part thereof fell to the Venetians.

beralitie to the new Emperour.

All things at last being quieted in the Citie, the Armie speedily departed. Boniface of Monterrat, and Henric the Emperours brother dislodged first of all, who with great good successe possessed Thrace which lies on either side betwixt Constantinople, and Adrianople, three daies iourney in length. And all that conquest, such as it was, they reduced vnder the Emperour Baldwins obedience, according to their promise: Prince Henric remaining at Constantinople, dealt with the Emperour to bound that part of the Empire which was fallen to the Venetians, because it wholly almost consisted of Islands seated in the Aegean and Ionian Seas. win, to take away all cause of strife, and that their fellowes should truly receiue whatsoeuer had bene promised them, he made Boniface King of Theffalie, and gaue the Isle of Candie, which he tooke from him, to the Venetians: And the better to confirme the matter, the Venetian Prince sent M. Sanuto, & Rabani Carcerio his Ambassadors to Boniface, who was encamped before Adrianople; and till they returned hesent an Arnie to receiue all the rest. The Ambassadors sent to Boniface, arriuing at Adrianople, shewed him the Emperours decree; and offering him besides a good summe of money, he easily condescended to their request, and made ouer to the Venetians all the right which he pretended to the Isle of Candie by vertue of Alexis gift.

Thomasa confir-
by the Pope.

In this meane time Thomasa, Patriarch of Constantinople, at his returne from Rome, where he had obtained whatsoever he demanded, came to Venice, and after he had staid a while there, being readie to returne into Greece; hee tooke with him foure gallies which were sent for supplie to the Prince at Constantinople, with which he recovered Ragusa which was reuolted from the Venetians; and having repaired Durazzo, which the Greeke Emperours had abandoned, he left a good Garrison in it. Thence he came directly to Constantinople, where he was receiued of all men with great ioy: But nothing did so much hasten his returne, as the commaundement which the Pope had given him to crowne Baldwin Emperour of Greece. And that Coronation-day was beautified with a great assembly as well of 20

Greekes, as of French-men and Italians. Scarfe was the yeare expired wherein Constantinople was taken, but that all the Cities and strong Townes of the Greeke Empire, as well on the Sea-coasts as on the firme Land, were reduced vnder the Emperours obedience: Adrianopolis excepted. But this fortunate successe was interrupted by his too sodaine death. Some affirme that hee died at Constantinople. And others say, that being incamped before Adrianopolis, he fell into an Ambush, and being taken by the enemies he died in Prison; and that, by his death, there was no Emperour in Greece for seuer yeares after. This is that which the Annallists maintaine. Those which alleadge the contrarie, say, That Henric, his brother, was at the same instant saluted Emperour in his stead, who, being discamped from before Adrianopolis, which his brother had besieged, to effect his more speedie Coronation at Constantinople, receiued newes on the way of the death of Henrico the Venetian Prince; so as there was a small time betwixt the death of the Emperour Baldwin, and that of Henrico, who decessed the thirteenth yeare of his Principalltie, and was honourably buried in Saint Sophias Church.

It shall not bee amisse to set downe in this place certaine propheticke verses, which I find in some Historians to bee attributed to Sibylla, the which are reported to haue been common almost in euerie mans mouth, long time before the French-men and Venetians tooke Constantinople: if it be so, I doe assuredly beleuee, that this Oracle was the only cause of that mortall hatred, which the Emperour Emanuel bare to the Venetians. And forasmuch as all that in a manner which hapned at Constantinople, since the time of the Emperour Constantine vntill Henrico the Venetian Prince, is comprized in these verses: I haue thought it fit to set them downe word for word, to the end that by them it may be knowne how well this woman possessed with a diuine furie, did propheticke of things to come; and that which Plutarch speaketh of the Egyptians is not altogether absurd, who thought that the spirit of diuination was easily communicated to women. They begin thus.

The cause why
Emanuel hated
the Venetians.

A Prophecie found in Constantinople.

Æ Neadum gloria Bizantium deducetur, Eruntque Danai in robore delicato vsque ad Leonem sexa-ginta

ginta pedum. Donec catulos eius Vrsus deuoret. Hunc Aquila dispecta Vrsum dissipet, Aquilam Hircus obumbret, Pullum voret Aquilæ, Fietque Potentum in Hadriaticis aquis congregatio. Cæco Duce Hircum abigent, Bizantium prophanabunt, Hircus non balabit amplius, Nec Gallus cantabit, vsque dum sexaginta tres pedes, & pollices nouem discurrant.

Which may be thus Englished.

*Bizance shall rise, the Romans glorie hight, Græcia shall flow with fulnesse of delight,
Vntill the sixtie-footed Lion come,
Whose princely whelps with death the Beare shall dome:
The Beare shall by the roiall Eagle fall,
The Goat orethrowes the Eagle, Chick and all.
And in the midst of th' Adriatick strond
Shall meete great States combin'd by mutuall bond Against the Goat. They, led by Chieftaine blind, Shall quell his pride and tame his Tyger mind,
And Bizance selfe they likewise shall subdue.
So droops the Goat; And the shrill Cock that crew
So lowd of late, henceforth shall chant no more,
Till of a greater number kept in store
Sixtie three feete, with thumbs thrice 3, times told,
By fading hence this mysterie vnfold.*

The Roman Empire (saith thee) shall bee translated to Constantinople: which came to passe in the time of the Emperour Constantine; and Grecia shall liue peaceable in all delights, vntill the Emperour Emanuel his time who liued three score yeares; Adronicus, whom Sibylla calleth a Beare, after hee hath slaine his children, shall vsurpe the Empire; Isack sonne to Emanuel, of whom none account was made shall put Andronicus to death; Alexis shall take his brother Isack by treason; who wore a long beard after the Greekish manner: and hauing put out both his eyes, shall thrust him into a darke Prison, into which likewise, some say that young Alexis sonne to Isack was put, from whence escaping afterwards, hee came for succour to the Venetians. That the Venetians at that time ioynd with the French shall passe into Greece vnder the conduct of Prince Dandolo, who by the enuie of Emanuel had almost lost his sight, as hath bene said; and that Constantinople being taken by them, the honour of the Empire shall bee taken from the Greekes: For in the space of sixtie three yeares and nine moneths, there shall bee in Constantinople neither Emperour nor Patriarch of the Greeke Nation; whereupon Sibylla (if this Oracle be hers) calleth the one a Cocke, and the other a Goate. This is that which thee hath said.

The meaning of the prophecies.

Pietro Cyani, sonne to Duke Sebastiano, succeeded Dandolo, & was Earle of Arba when he was created. The Venetians in the mean time, who were at Constantinople, because they would not bee without a Magistrate, did create a Pretor to gouerne them; which creation neuertheless was not to bee in force till it were confirmed and allowed by the Prince and Senate at Venice. The first who executed this new Magistracie in Constantinople was (as it is reported) Marini Zeno. Ambassadours were sent to Constantinople to the Emperour Henric to renew the league. Boniface of Montferrat on the other side, hauing conquered Thessalie was called King thereof, according to the Emperour Baldwin his decree.

Boniface King of Thessaly.

A Decree of the Venetians about the possession of the Islands.

The cause of this decree.

But whilst these things were done in Greece, the Venetians after the creation of Cyani, to the end they might with more ease ioine all the places of the Greeke Empire to their State, which were fallen vnto them by the agreement made with the French and the other confederates, they published an Edict; That all the Citizens of Venice, or their allies, who could at their owne charges seize on the Isles of the Aegean and Ionian Seas, and of other places neere thereunto, depending in time past on the Greeke Empire, (reseruing certaine Isles mentioned in the decree, which they were expressely forbidden to attempt) should claime them for their own, as lawfully purchased by right of Armes. Although at the first this may seeme not verie commodious for the Common-wealth, Yet considering it more needrily, it was necessarie to be so, as well for that the Citie was at the same time busied about the affaires of Greece, as in respect of the great numbers of Pirates; who were so increased, whilst the Venetians were imployed in the Thracian wars, as there needed a mightie fleet to repress their incursions: And therefore there was no possibilitie with any safetie to seuer the forces of the Common-wealth in so many places at once. It was then thought most conuenient, that the wealthiest of them should set forth one or more Gallies a peece, or other ships of warre for the same purpose: The which they presumed diuers would doe for the hope of the proposed gaine; and that thereby it might come to passe, that the Common-wealth hauing afterwards neede of those ships of war, let forth at the charges of particular men, might make vse of them, by vertue of her owne authoritie in such cases.

Besides, euery one was bound to keepe at his owne Costes, the places which should be possessed (which the Common-wealth could not doe without great expence 10 pence) and to carrie thither their wiues and children, with all their wealth: And by this meanes, as by Colonies sent from the Citie, the whole should bee subiect to the Venetians obedience. But howsoever they had respect either to the one or other of the fore-nam'd occasions, it is certain that diuers particular persons did take Armes for this purpose. And to the same purpose before any of the rest, the publicke fleet of one and thirtie Gallies sailed into the maine, conducted (as some say) by Raynier Dandolo, and Rugiero Permarin: and others changing both the names make mention of none but Raynier Permarin. All Annallists almost, and other authors likewise doe set downe the atchieuements of particular persons before those of the publik State: as though it were likelie that priuate persons durst haue attempted any thing on the Isles, before that the Seas were freed from Pirates, with whom the commonwealths Gallies were enforced to fight, at the verie entrance almost of the Adriaticke Gulph.

And because the continuall course of this businesse doth so require it, wee will first of all set downe that which was performed by the generall Armie. They were scarce out of the Gulph, when they met with Leo Vetrano the Genouefe, one of the most famous Pirates of those daies, with nine Gallies, who being assailed by the Venetians, was easily broken, taken, and brought to Corfu, whither the fleet sailed, where he was hanged. After the recouerie of which Island, the Venetians sailed towards Modona first, & then to Corona, the two receptacles of theues and Pirates, which they ruined. They are two Cities of Peloponessus at this day called Morea. The one lies betweene Coriphallum, and the mount Acritia, and the other on the Sea of Messina. Neere those places the Ambassadors of Achaya and Athens came to the Generalls of the Armie promising to yeeld themselves to the Venetians; but it is reported that their rash resolution was interrupted by a Captaine named Mega, who the same time possessed those places. I thinke that these places were held by him, & by others, at such time as the Venetians were busied in the wars of Constantinople: At which time all the Islands and Sea-townes of the Aegean and Ionian Seas were expoid for a preyo as manie as could winne them: the Empire beeing then verie much declined. Albeit I wil not denie but that he might be before then appointed Gouernour there by those who did command Greece.

Modona and Corona receptacles of theues and Pirates, ruined.

The passage of the Sea being in this sort opened, all men hastened to these Islands as to an assured bootie. Marco Dandolo and Giacomio Viadre being ioined together seized on Callipolis. Marco Sanuto, accompanied with diuers Citizens who were at the Islands Cyclades, made himselfe master of Naxos, Paros, Molos, Herma and Andros. Raban Carcerio with his nephewes tooke Euboea, called at this day Nigrepont, and Euripa neere adioining. Andria and Henrico de Glassis, seized on Tenos, Micon (which the Modernes haue called Micolla) Sehyros, Philocolon, (called in times past Philocandea) with Stalimium which is named Lemos.

The names of the Islands possessed by particular persons.

40 In this meane time Henric, surnamed the Fisher, Earle of that part of Morea which was called Mailla, aided by certaine Gallies of Genoa, attempted to take the Isle of Candie from the Venetians. But Raynier, Generall of the Armie, arriuing there vnlooke for, did not only preferue the Island, but sank four Genoa Gallies that were found neere the shoare, in which some will needes affirme, that Vetrano was taken, and forth-with put to death. The Venetians loon after, to curb the pride of the Greekes, sent to Candace, called Candida by the vulgar, the head Citie of the Island, a Colonie, namely horsemen of the order of Senators, and footmen of the common sort of people.

The Venetians send a Colonie to Candace.

The Genouefes in like manner did robbe and scoure the Seas, against whom Giovanni Trevisano was sent with nine Gallies well provided; He, hauing met with the Fleet of Genoa, assailed it with more courage than force, and tooke twelue of the enemies vessels: By which losse the Genouefes being daunted sued for peace. Some Authors affirme, that, the Genouefes hauing taken a ship from the Venetians, Trevisano was commanded to pursue them with two Gallies and two ships of burthen; who, who, hauing overtaken them in the Libian Sea, nere to the ruines of old Carthage fought with them, and tooke from them foure ships, and soone after, twentie eight more on the Sicilian Sea.

About the same time there arose great diffention between the Venetians and the Paduans about a small matter. The Treuisans were at the same time by reason of a long peace, full of riches and delicacies, so as giuing them selues ouer to all sportes and pastimes (as men commonly do in a prosperous estate) they inuented pleasant recreations. They erected in the Market-place of their Citie a Castle, made of verie costly silke, compassed about with scarlet in sted of Walls, within the which were placed the noblest maidens of the Citie, wearing Coronets on their heads in sted of Helmes, and for Courasses verie rich Chaines and Jewels, who defended the Castle against yong Gentlemen of the like yeares. And the weapons on either side were small artificiall apples, made of nutmegs, roses and lillies, fashioned round like a ball, with a sodaine small raine of rose water, and diuers other sweete odors. This great preparation being published abroad, caused diuers who were desirous to see, (as the manner is) to come to Treuiso. Diuers Venetians and Paduans being entreated to be of the number came to these shewes. But whilst all men were builed in assailing the fort, and in looking on what side they would begin, it hapned that a troope of yong Venetians seized on one of the Castle gates, & would forthwith haue set vp their ensigne there: which certaine Paduans perceiving, who not farre off from thence did assaile the Damfells, fearing that the Venetians would carrie awaie the glorie of the fight, laid hands on the ensigne wherein was painted the picture of Saint Marke, and hauing plucked it downe, did shamefully teare it in peeces: By reason of this braue there arose on a sodaine a great quarrell; and they had fought in the verie place with great slaughter, If the Marshalls of the field had not instantly broke vp the games. But the Paduans, not acknowledging their faults (for there was some likelihood that the Venetians would revenge this iniurie) after they had made a league with the Treuisans, making shew as if they had received the wrong (being vsuall with those that will couer their fault) began first, and without any warlike summons, entering into the Venetians Territorie, carried thence much bootie. The Venetians sending to demand that which they had taken awaie, the Paduans in sted of hearkening thereunto, came and besieged the Tower of Bebia, seated at the mouth of the riuier, which Prince Cyani had fortified with a strong Garrison, vnder the command of Marco Concano a valiant person.

The Venetians being moued as well at this second as first affront, went to armes, and comming sodainely to the Tower, they assailed, brake, and defeated them, and tooke more than foure hundred prisoners, with foure ensignes, which did highly content the displeased Citie of Venice. The Treuisans, who were comming to aid their fellows and allies, vnderstanding that they were defeated, returned back all amazed. The yerely tribute which those of Chioggia were wont to paie, was forgiven them by a publike decree, because they had valiantly behaued themselves in that incounter.

Soone after this battaile of Bebia, by the mediation of the Patriarch of Aquileia, a peace followed, on condition neuertheless, That the Paduans should send to the Prince at Venice, five and twentie of those which began the stir at the games of Treuiso; who being deliuered, the Venetian sent them home againe without any harme at all. This peace lasted not long, for both sides fell on a sodaine to Armes. The occasion of this new warre grew about the confederates of both these people.

The Forlani were at strife with the Treuisans about their boundes, who presuming on the Venetians aide, entered the Territorie of their new enemies. Bertoldo, their Bishop by whose authoritie the whole matter was managed, went for succour to the Paduans. But others saie that it was to the Venetians, who made him a Citizen of Venice, And that which makes me most to beleue it, is the ancient alliance bebetwix the Paduans and those of Treuiso. But they affirme that at the first beginning of the warre, Bertoldo and the Count Gorician came to Venice, where after they had agreed vpon truce for five yeares, the warre was finished.

About the same time the Episcopall See of Malamoc, (as some say) was translated to Chioggia. After that a great Earthquake did wonderfully shake the Citie, whereby a part of Saint Georges Church fell downe to the ground, and diuers other private buildings. This hapned in the places nere to the firme Land. But the Venetians power did daly encrease in the Islands. Rabano Carzario, who had seized on the Isle of Nigrepont, fearing that he should not be able at his own charges to keep such an Island, did freely with his Nephews put himselfe vnder the Venetians obedience, promising to paie a yearely tribute. Certaine Gentlemen in manner of a new Colonie were sent to guard Corfu, among whom, were Pietro Michadi, Stephano Foscare, Sigiberto Quirino, and Giacomio Seiano. Guifred, Prince of Achaia, who did succede his Father Mega, with Gallus the wrongfull possessor of Cephalenia, came, and shrowded themselves vnder the Venetians protection.

Whilst these things were done in the Islands, and on the Sea-coasts of Ionia, the Emperour Henrie made a league with the Valachians; and after hee had married the King of Valachias daughter, he did in short space by means of that new affinity, recover all the Townes of Greece, which by Baldwins death were reuolted; And all matters being peaceable abroad, he attempted a verie holy and pious matter in the Citie, by fauouring the Popes Nuntio sent expressly to Constantinople, to the end he might draw the Greekes to the obedience of the See of Rome. It was likelie to haue raised a great tumult in the Citie, all the Citizens crying out against Henrie that it was the part of a good Emperour to meddle with temporall, and not with diuine matters; that they had bene too much obedient to him, to haue endured that their Church should bee termed subiect to that of Rome. Therefore Henrie, after he had left the Greekes to their wilfullnesse, returned to the government of the Empire and declared the sonne of Boniface to be King of Thessalie, and gaue euerie daie hope of greater matters. But hee was on a sodaine preuented by death.

Whilst these things were done in Greece, Prince Cyani sent Ambassadors to the Emperour Oslo, to congratulate his victorie obtained against his enemy Philip Duke of Sueuia, and his corruall in the Empire, who freely granted them the confirmation of all their priuiledges and immunities. Angelo Phaedrio Procurator of Saint Marke, did greatly enrich with diuers sorts of pretious stones, the golden Table which (as we haue said) lieth vpon the great Altar in the sumptuous Church of St. Marke. Prince Cyani (his first wife being dead) married Constantia Daughter to Tancred King of Sicilie. It is reported likewise, that he builded the Church of Saint Marie of Ierusalem; which is at this day an house of Nunnnes.

Peter, Earle of Auxerre, after the death of Henrie, whose sister hee had married, was, by a generall consent, chosen Emperour of the East, who with his wife comming to Rome, was crowned by Pope Honorius in S. Lawrence his Church without the Citie. Afterwards he departed from Rome with Iohn Cardinall Colonna, (sent by the Pope for Legate into Hungarie, to leue forces against the Turke) and being come to Brundisium, he there shipped his wife and children. But himselfe entering into the Venetians Gallies, sailed directly towards Dalmatia, determining to goe from thence by land to Constantinople.

It is reported, that in the Venetians behalfe he would needs assaile Durazzo. Theodore Duke of Albania, commanded there, who tooke it from the Venetians, after they had rampied it with strong walls, where he placed a strong garrison of Albanians; so as the Emperours assaults were in vaine. This Theodore called himselfe Emperour of Greece, and reckoned Emanuel, who had bene Emperour, in the list of his Ancesters. But feigning afterwards to be reconciled with Peter, he invited him to a dinner in the Citie, where in the middelt of the banquet he was murdered. Others

In the meane time Robert, sonne to Peter, came through Hungarie, and Misia, to Constantinople, where hee was sodainly saluted Emperour. The Prince at the beginning did communicate diuers great affaires of the Empire to Marino Michaels the Venetians Magistrate in Constantinople. In which faithfull league of friendship and confederacie, hee perpetually continued, so as in all the titles of his letters of state he called the Venetian Prince (as his Ancestors likewise before time had done) his most deere Colleague in the Empire: nor did he this, without a cause. For the ancient French forces beginning daily to decline in Greece, and no new succours nor supplies comming to them from any place, the matter was brought to that passe, as the whole burthen of the Empire lay only on the Venetians.

This Robert married the daughter of a rich Matrone, though of meane birth, formerly betrothed to a Senator: whose great heart not brooking so apparent iniurie, resolued presently how to reuenge it. Whereupon, accompanied with diuers of his faction, who were mightie, in a great rage they came to the Emperours Palace: which breaking open, and finding the Maiden, they cut off her nose with great cruelty: And eftsoones taking her Mother who had made the marriage, they threw her head-long into the Sea. Robert here-with vexed went presently to Rome, where after he had complained to the Pope of the wrong done to his wife, returning towards Constantinople he died in Achaia. Baldwin, his sonne, being left very yong, married the Daughter of Iohn King of Ierusalem, who by a generall consent was entreated to take vpon him the gouernement of his sonne-in-lawes Empire, who was yet in his Non-age. The Cardinall in the meane time who was sent by the Pope into Syria with great forces, arrived at Prolomais. The chiefe in this enterprize was Andrew King of Hungarie, who (as it is reported) was aided by the Venetians in the transportation of his troupes and carriage, the which was easily granted him, by reason that he did renouace and giue ouer to them, all the claime which the Kings of Hungarie might pretend to Dalmatia. Some Annallists report, That Damiet in Egypt, neare to the Riuer Nilus, was taken in this journey, and that they brought away thirtie thousand prisoners. Wee finde no other memorabile matter to haue beene done in this action.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the ninth Booke of the first Decad.

The ninth Booke containeth the full description of the Isle of Candie; The reuolt thereof from the Venetians; and the reuenerie of it by them after they had chased away Count Mailloc. The Nobilitie of the Island goe from thence rather than they will obey the Venetians. The rebellion of the Citie of Candace. How after diuers warlike exploits, all the Candioti almost were reduced vnder the Venetians obedience. New stirres of the Islanders, appeased by force. The preparation of VATTASVS to seize on the Island, the Inhabitants hauing offered it vnto him. The punishment of the rebells after the enemies were driuen out. The Venetians victorie against the King of the Exagoni before Constantinople. VATTASVS defeated in the same place by the Venetians within few daies after. Truce with the Genouefes for nine yeares. The warre of the Venetians by Sea and Land against the Emperour FREDERICK and ECCELIN. The Genouefes victorie against FREDERICK, and the Pisans, neare to the Isle of Cirna. The fifth rebellion of Zara, and the speedie reuenerie thereof. The declaration of the Assemblies which are made for the Creation of a Duke. The Paduans are set at libertie by the Venetians, by the helpe of Pope ALEXANDER, so soone as ECCELIN was driuen forth of the Citie. Twelue thousand Paduans murdered at Verona by the command of ECCELIN.

The continuall reuolts in the Isle of Candie, happening almost one after another, which for a time greatly troubled the Venetians affaires, doe enforce vs a little to digresse from Italie: wherunto the subiect alone doth not inuite vs being filled with various matter, but the fame of this Island so much renowned for the greatnesse and antiquitie thereof. That therefore such as are ignorant of antiquitie may not erre in the knowledge of her name, it is the same Creta, which the vulgar at this day call Candie, by the name of a Citie (as I thinke) which is of late so called therein. Dosiades thinks that it was called Creta by the Daughter of Hesperides: And Anaximander saith, by King Curetus: Philistides and Crates say, that it was first called Acria, and after Cureta; from whence we may easily gather that her name was in the future deuined.

Endoxus

Endoxus (to speake somewhat of her situation) thought it to be seated in the Ægean Sea. But the most curious Authors saie, that it is enuironed with diuers; namely the Ægean, Cretan, Libian, Ægyptian, and Carpathian Seas. Apollodorus saith that it is in length, two thousand, and three hundred stadij. Artemidorus fitteth downe foure thousand and one hundred, extending from the East to the West, where her out-stretched proportion is longest. Some account but two thousand, and her breadth to be much lesse. Plinie thinckes that no part thereof doth exceed fiftie thousand paces in breadth, two hundred threecore and tenne thousand in length, and five hundred fourecore and ten thousand in compass. Her territories, besides, is verie closely compacted, full of mountaines, and verie fertile val-lies. The hills towards the West are of a meruailous heighth, not giuing place any iorte to mount Taygetus in Laconia. In the middelt thereof where the hills seeme highest, mount Ida is to be seene, so much celebrated in the fabulous Poets.

Mount Ida:

Radamanth and Minos Lords of Candie.

Ephorus writes That the most ancient inhabitants of the Island were first instructed by Radamanthus to build Cities, and to lead a more ciuill life; and afterwards by Minos his succellor, strictly to obserue Iustice: hauing established lawes and ordinances for the same purpose. The same Author, and Plato likewise, did thinke, That this people, and the best-manner of Greece, especially the Lacedemonians, haue beene followers and obseruers of these lawes. But (as Strabo saith) all things being altered from bad to worfe, this holie kind of life vanished, and mens manners being wholly depraued, it was first troubled by Pyrates; and soone after being inuaded by the Romanes and subiect to their dominion, it was for a time vnder their protection in peace and quietnesse. At length that Empire beginning to decline, after Constantine had translated the Imperiall seate to Constantinople; & afterwards vpon the diuision of that entire Empire into twaine, hauing two Emperours; one for the affaires of Greece, and the other of Italie, this Island was euer reputed as a part of the Greeke Empire.

In this passage of time it was not onely molested by the Barbarians, but at sundrie times greatly afflicted; And notwithstanding all oppositions, after the Empire of Amyntus, which lasted not long, it was taken from the Greekes, and ioyned to the Venetians dominion. But such is the disposition of this Nation and their desire of noueltie so great, as the Venetians a long time had much trouble to containe them vnder their obedience. Whereupon I will here beginne to speake of their turbulent commotions.

It was moued
the Genoues, to attempt on Candie.

Enue which euer waites on prosperitie, so soone as the Venetians possessed Candie, did incite the Genoues repining at their greatnesse, to imploie all their forces (which at that time were great and mightie) and by some meanes or other to snatch it from them. For the Island was as yet scarcely fortified with Garrisons, when they attempted by some of their Nation, with armed Gallies for the purpose, to conuere it: but afterwards with greater force, when they understood what was befallen to Petrano their countie-man, whom the Venetians had put to a shameful death: wherewith being througly vexed, this emulation was conuerted into open hatred, and they assayed by all meanes to winne the Candiot rebellion. Which they being readie to put in practise: Count Mailloc tooke armes to trouble the affaires of the Island. This man being couragious and sodaine in his attempts, presuming on his assurance of the Genoues forces, did in a short space reduce the whole Island in a manner vnder his obedience.

The Venetians, who from the beginning were resolute to keepe that Island by all meanes whatsoeuer, did set forth a great Fleete. And in the meane time diuers were of opinion, after it should be recovered, to dismantall the Cities, Castles, and townes that were strong either by nature or arte; alleadging diuers reasons for the confirmation of their saying. But Rayniero Dandolo who was a man sodaine and verie rich, did presently offer to keepe whatsoeuer should be recovered, at his owne costs. At which offer of his all the assistants blushed, so as no man afterward durit speake of razing of Cities, fearing thereby they should seeme vnable to keepe the Island vnder their subiection. The Armie being readie, departed vnder the command of the same Rayniero, according to some Annallists, who had more mercenarie Souldiours out of Lombardie, than of their owne allies and confederates. At his arriall in the Island, the Metropolitane Citie of Candace which at this day is the best (for Marchants traficke) of the whole Island; was forth with recovered, and after all the other townes and Castles. Count Mailloc being brought to verie meane tearmes in a Fort, and being enforced to yeeld vpon compolition, departed out of the Island.

The Venetians
Armie in Candie.

The Candiot were already brought to a reasonable good passe when as certain seditious Greekes did by their commotions interrupt the peace of the Island. Rayniero speedily opposing himselfe against these combutions was slaine with an arrow, thotte through his body, who being carried to Candace, was buried in Saint Georges Church. His death being reported at Venice, Giacomo Longo and Leonardo Nungio were sent with speed to guard the Island; and with them Giacomo Tepulo for the Islands Gouernour. And in another place, Raphael Zeno failed towards Morea to the reliefe of Coron and Modon. Giacomo Longo meeting by the way not farre from Candie, three Shippes of Genoa, suncke them and gaue chase to diuers others. Moreouer seeing in regard of the leuitie and inconstancie of the Greekes, there was no likelihood of abilitie to quiet the state of the Island, without a great standing Garrison, they resolute to send a Colonie thither: namely horse-men of the order of Senators, and foot-men of the common sort of people. Vnto whom, being scattered here and there in Candace and other places of the Island, were great inheritances giuen; to some for terme of life, and to others in perpetuities. Howbeit some Authors affirme That the Colonie was sent thither chiefly vpon the Islands recouerie as hath beene already spoken in the precedent booke.

Soone after the arriall of the Colonie, the Hagio Stephan (who for Nobilitie and riches were the chiefe of the Island) being desirous of noueltie, did reuolt from the Venetians, and seized on Mirabeau and Sethia. Gionanni Tepulo to appease these stirres called Marco Sanuto to his aide from the neighbour-Islands; promising well to reward those whom he should bring to his succour. For I know no better meanes that he had to deal with a Venetian than vpon reward. The Historians make no other mention wherefore this reward was promised him at his arriall. The Authors of the rebellion were in an instant chased thence and the townes recovered: But in the meane space, there arose some strife betwixt the commanders which gaue fit occasion to a mischieuous fellow called Senafus who was desirous of inno- uation, and watched for nothing more than how he might disturbe the peace of the Prouince; the which reuolted on a sodaine.

Candie.Sanuto comes to aide the Venetians in Candie.

It is reported, that because sufficient order was not taken for the prouision of vi- tualles in the Citie, there was no bread to be sold on a market-day (as was wont to be) in the market-place. This Senafus, who with others desired to disturbe the State, would not let slippe such an occasion. But hauing drawne together a great multitude of people, they all ranne first to Sanutos lodging, as to him who delt not with the Cities businesse (but diuers thinke that Sanuto had concluded with them so to doe, who because he would not seeme to partake in so wicked an enterprife, nor to take armes to trouble the State, but vpon necessitie, was contented (as hath beene said) that they should first come to him) and then afterward they came with great rumour to the Palace, and the Citie was sodainly taken by a few Souldiours fore-appointed for the same purpose.

A new commo-
tion in Candace;

Tepulo perceiuing all this to tend to a rebellion, retired himselfe in disguise to the house of Marco Tonico his friend; and imagining that, the Towne being taken, it might endanger his life if he should be found there, he was secretly in the night let downe by a corde from the Citie walles in womans attire. This sodaine flight caused him to take his iourney towards Themenum, a verie strong Citie; where thinking himselfe in safetie, hee resolved to remaine, after he had a little fortified the place a new, because he would not seeme by too much despair to abandon the Prouince. Some saie, Tepulo being driuen forth of the Citie, Sanuto became Captain of the Rebelles, who forgetting his Countrey and the benefits that hee had receiued of the same, did in haite with those of his faction runne vp and downe the Island, causing it to revolt from the Venetians: And that after he had left Stephano Sanuto his kinsman to guard it, and ioyned all the Greeke and Italian troupes together, he did in short space reduce all the Cities and strong places (in a manner) of the Island vnder his commaund. Some likewise saie That he came and besieged Temenum whither Tepulo had retired himselfe, who with those that were come to his aide did brauely defend the Citie: For diuers who remained loyall to the Venetians, tooke one as they vnderstood that the Gouvernour was at Temenum, ranne thither to succour him. The siege before Temenum being raised, the Gouvernour in few daies recouered Montfort and Lasfitha.

plies in Candie.

Thus stood the affaires of Candie, when as Dominico Quirino, and Sebastiano Bethanio being sent as Providatori, with great forces of horse and foote arrived in the Island. The Gouvernour who till then durst not rashly attempt ought against the enemy, who was much stronger than himselfe, after he vnderstood of the Providatori arrivall, who, besides the forces they had brought into the Island, were well furnished with weapons, money, and victuals being thrust forward with hope to effect some great matter, departed from Temenum, and came and lodged with his troops at Panofobrita, a verie fit place to execute an enterprize, where having fortified his campe, he did in haile build a fort. Sanuto being advertized of Tepulos departure, and of the place where he was incamped, did with his Armie forthwith march thither. The Gouvernour being somewhat daunted at the sodaine coming of his enemy, had certaine notice by his spies what forces he had in his campe. And being strengthened with new supplies, which (as I thinke) were mingled among the Islanders, he was not slacke to embattle his troops ready for the fight, if the enemy were so pleased. Sanuto on the contrarie, imagining that which was true, That by temporizing he was able to overcome him, made none account hereof. For besides, that his souldiers in regard of the commoditie of the places did greatly annoy the Tepulans, he saw new forces daily to arrive at his owne campe from the Citie of Candace, and from all other parts almost of the Island; and on the contrarie, that time would bring so many discommodities to the enemy, as he would be at last enforced to die by famine, or by some other violent death, or else wholly to forsake the Island.

Candace taken by Tepulo.

Tepulo soone discovered the purpose of his enemy; and not being able to draw him to battaile, he left a strong garrison in the fort newly builded, raised his campe, and returned to Temenum: From whence soone after departing in great silence, he came to Candace, and about midnight setting vp ladders against the Citie walls, he gaue entrance to all his troops, without noise or slaughter. The Citie being thus recovered, Stephano Sanuto who commaunded there, with diuers others were taken prisoners. The enemy being troubled with these newes, resolved to give care to a peace, the which he obtained of Tepulo on these conditions, That after he had retired all his Garrisons which he held in the Island (for all the countrey in a manner from Milopotamus vnto the Promontorie of Spatha, was possessed by his souldiers) he should leaue Candie, and get him home into his Islands with one Galley, and a little ship for the passage of his troops, or with more if he needed were, not of his owne, but of hired ones for that purpose. This agreement being made with the Gouvernour, and assurance given on either side, Sanuto embarked his troops, and by his sodaine departure gaue peace to the Candiotis.

nuto.

Great reasons in Sanuto his behalf.

This is in a manner all which some Authors set downe of the second rebellion of the Island, which may yet rather be termed a ciuill warre. For it is not credible that Marco Sanuto did euer beare Armes with an intent to take the Island from the Venetians;

Venetians; but onely to drue thence the gouernour, who was his mortall enemy. For vpon what ground or what assurance should he beare Armes against his countrymen and countrey? And what should moue him to rise against a people, till then inuincible? seeing he knew for a certaine, that if the Venetians were once his professed enemies, they would not onely haue taken Candie from him, but all the other Islands which he had formerly wonne by right of warre.

Besides, what simplicitie had it bene in him to intend the ruine of those, with whom he resolved afterward to ioyne himselfe. For he would neuer haue gone about to haue drawne Count Maille forth of the Island, if he had in any sort desired to haue taken it from the Venetians. But it is farre more probable, that it was for some ialousie or secret grudge happened betwixt the Gouvernour and himselfe after the battaile, because that either of them enuying one another, would seeme more affectionate to his countrey, and to deserue better of the Common-wealth, than his fellow, and that at last he would haue driuen him out of the Island by force, determining after he had chased him thence, to give the Venetians a sufficient prooffe of his loyalty, in deliuering the Island vnto them peaceable, and at quiet, being defended by his aide. Other reasons likewise may perswade vs to beleue, that it was vpon such occasions as I haue set downe. For perceiving by the new supplies, that they pursued him as an enemy, he would not (of set purpose) fight, and though he possessed diuers places in the Island, he neuertheless freely abandoned them, & departed forth of the Prouince. If he had marched as an enemy against the Venetians, there wanted not those, who would haue repossessed him in the Island. The Genouefes would willingly haue accepted it, who were ialous and enuious of the honour and fame of the Venetians. But he did rather giue place to the publike peace, than helpe his enemy Tepulo. Some Historians referre to the same time that notable victorie obtained by Giovanni Trusiano ouer the Genouefes, whereof we haue made mention in the precedent booke. Candie remained not long quiet. For a new commotion, much more terrible than that whereof we now speake, did trouble the whole Island, the which growing from a small cause, kindled such a flame, as the whole Prouince felt it. The common report is, that by the counsell of one named Pietro Philameno Gouvernour of the Castle of Boreparitano, the horses of a certaine Candiot Gentleman were stolen: Which being told to Paulo Quirino, who at that time was Gouvernour of the Island, he commaunded restitution to the Islanders of that which had bene taken from them. Now because it was not done with that speed as they would haue it, the Greeks who were set on by others, tooke occasion to ouerrunne, vnder the conduct of Petro Scordillo, (who did owe the stolen horses) all the countrey of Reparitano, from whence they carried away great spoiles. The Candiotis vpon this stir being desirous of nouelty, complotted forthwith a revolt, whereupon in short space all that lieth from Milopotamus vnto the farthest part of the Island towards the West, rebelled against the Venetians.

in Sanuto his half.

tion in Candie.

The Gouvernour, to stay these new insurrections of the Greekes, speedily sent Pietro Thonisto, and Giovanni Gritti, with great forces beyond the streights of Milopotamus: who passing through the Forrest of Psieuronessus, not sending out their discoverers, were assailed and defeated by Constantine Scusio, & Theodore Milefin, who lay in ambush for them, being accompanied with great multitudes of Greekes. Many Venetians were there slaine by them, who knowing the waies of the Forrest did meete them scattered heere and therein amazed troupes. Giovanni Gritti one of the Captaines, died there, who was an industrious and courageous person, with Nicolas Balastro, Marco Bono, Andrea Thealdo, and Pendramino of Aquileia, with a great number of souldiers. A few of those which escaped the slaughter, having throwne away their Armes, came by verie strait and narrow waies to the Gouvernour: In whose place soone afterward succeeded Dominico Desfio, vnder whom peace ensued betwixt the Venetians and the Greekes. To some of whom, to winne them by bountie, (as to Scusio, and his companions Authors of the reuolt) were giuen in perpetuitie certaine Lands on the hither side the Riuer Mufella, towards the West.

There belikewife in the Island certaine Lands possessed in olde time by the ancient men at armes called by the common people Knight-ships. Some of these were giuen at the same time to the chieft of the Greeks, as some other of them likewise to Theodore and Michaeli Melisini, so soone as they were receiued into fauour. This is all which we finde to haue hapned as well abroad as at home during the gouernment of Prince Ciani: who after he had commaunded two and twentie years, being become vnprofitable to the Common-wealth by reason of his olde age, did willingly depose himselfe, and dyed fortunately soone after in Saint Georges Monasterie, whither he retired himselfe for deuotion sake. His bodie was buried in the Monument of his Ancestors.

deposed him selfe

Giacomo Tepulo was by the fortie elected in his place. Candie in this Princes time was not verie quiet; whereof I will briefly mention some passages, before I touch anie other matters, which hapned as well abroad as elsewhere during this Principallitie. The Venetians too much lenitie towards the Candiots, was the cause that the Greeks (who are by nature light-headed and inconstant) in stead of yeelding loue and obedience to the Venetians, did shew themselves altogether stubborne and peremptorie: For a base minde doth rather abuse an other mans patience than make any good vse of it; and is sooner brought to his dutie by seueritie and exemplarie punishment; than by meekenesse and fauour.

Thus the Scordiliani and the Melisini through too much licentiousnesse hauing giuen themselves ouer to all manner of vices, and laying aside all shame, beganne first to disturbe the common quiet by secret thefts, and afterwards by open robberies to make hauocke in all places. The Gouernour being moued with these vnseemely actions, did forthwith leaue Souldiours, and sent to entreat Marco Sanuto, with the greatest forces he could raise to come speedily into Candie, for the more speedie expulsion of those theues and enemies; saying That the Islanders did incline to an open rebellion; and that if their desseignes were not sodainly prevented and restrained by force, hee stood greatly in feare of the whole Islands reuolt from the Venetians.

SANUTO

Sanuto esteeming delay in such a case dangerous to the Common-wealth, with all speed possible assembled his forces and then waited ouer into the Isle of Candie. Where to bridle the Rebelles, hee caused a Castell to be built in a verie comodious place. At the sight whereof the enemies being daunted, though not giuing ouer their wilfull headinesse, sent to John Vattajus (who held Lesbos an Island of the Egean Sea, and who possessed at that time diuers places of the Greek Empire, entitling himselfe Emperour of Greece) promising him by their mensengers the entire dominion of the Island, after the Venetians should be driuen thence, so as hee would in time send them sufficient aide to expell the enimie.

Sanuto cometh to the aide of Candie.

The forces of Vattajus were at that time verie great. For he was in league with the King of the Hexagons, who likewise in the places neere adioyning to the Ponticke Sea, called himselfe Emperour of Greece, determining at either charges to assaile the Empire of Constantinople. This King was angrie because young Robert, sonne to the Emperour Peter, had by the aduice of his counsell preferred the alliance of the King of Hierusalem (who had but the title of that Kingdome) before his Vattajus, being drawne on by these promises, sent thirtie Gallies to aide the Candiots. At their arriual Marco Sanuto being wonne by Vattajus (as it is reported) departed out of the Island with all his forces. Whereupon the Generall of Vattajus his Armie resolved to besiege the Cities; and entring Rethimna, he constrained Marco Quirino to yeeld himselfe: The like did Margareto Fosari at Milopotamus, and Conrad Milenius at Castel-nouo. Yet all these places did not yeeld at the first summons, but after they had fought and valliantly defended themselves for a time. Cataldo Auentali, who had seized on the Fort of Boniface with a good troope of Souldiours, did valliantly defend that place till the coming of the Gouernour, who was with an Armie secretly departed from Candace to relieue his owne Souldiours and to raise the siege; whereby the enimie being constrained hastily to dislodge left behind him diuers engins of warre: And because the victorie seemed not so easie as the Candiots had perswaded him it would be, perceiving withall that the warre was more troublesome to him than the Venetians, he determined to returne to Lesbos.

Wherefore after he had shipped all his forces, he left Candie to the Venetians; and sailed thence. His fleet soone after, being verie great, was in such fort tossed and beaten by a tempest neere to the Island of Cithera, as they were all cast away, three small vessels excepted. Nicolas Mutatio and Marin furnished Marini, being sent Ambassadors into Greece about a peace, suffered shipwracke in that tempest. The Gouernour Nicolas Tonisso, who succeeded Giovanni Storlato, and Bartholomeo Gradonico his successor, did recouer certaine towncs.

Vattajus Armie leaues Candie. And suffers shipwracke.

Nicolas Senastus and Michael Molefisi, Authors of the rebellion and so many mischiefes, being delt with by Gradonico, returned to the Venetians obedience; and he gaue them all the territorie which lies from Petræa to the mount Athris; on condition, That they should send euerie yeare five hundred pound weight of Wax for the vse of Saint Markes Church; and likewise pray vnto God for the Venetian Prince, and perpetually beare Armes against the Rebelles, till they were all reduced vnder the Venetians subiection. There remained no more Rebelles at that time but those that inhabited along the Riuer Petræa euen to the mount Summonium. Gradonico dyed in the meane time, and by his death the Prouidatori tooke the gouernment into their owne hands. For to euerie Gouernour two Prouidatori were giuen. Giovanni Ardisino and Marco Molino, had this place in the Island when the Gouernour dyed. Molino being at the siege of Sithie, a Sea-towne, perceiued on a sodaine twelue Gallies, who with full sailes came from the maine towards the Island:

An agreement with the chiefe Rebels of that Island.

Gradonico dyeth.

Two Prouidatori giuen to euerie Gouernour.

Which Vattajus sent for supplies to the besieged. Whereupon, fearing if this Fleet should enter the Hauen, that the inhabitants presuming on this new aide, would make some sallie forth vpon him, whom he should not be able to repell by reason his forces were very few, or if they should saile to Candace, they might at the very first take it: he speedily raised his Campe, and in all hast returned to the Citie, from from whence he sent Ardisino with those shippes of warre which he had readie in the Hauen for the same purpose: to hinder the enemies landing, if he found it to be necessarie for the Common-wealth. Vattasus forces in the meane time were entred into the Hauen of Suda, where the Venetian Gallies, arriving as soone as they, did with great cries assaile the enemy, who already possessed the Port. The Greekes forthwith prepared for the fight, which they could not fitly doe by reason of the straightnesse of the place, so as they attempted to repulse the enemies fleet by their warlike engines and shot. The inhabitants bordering that place, who at the first noyse came running to the aid of their Countreimen, did greatly helpe the Greekes. For all the shoare was filled with townes-men and peasants, who without intermission assailed the Venetians. The fight lasted from morning till noone, when as Ardisino the Prouidator being fore wounded commanded to sound the retreat: The Venetians determined the next day to renew the fight; which the Greekes fearing, about midnight they left the Hauen, and sailed thence into the maine.

Whilst the Prouidator executed these warlike exploits, Angelo Gradonico arrived in the Island as Gouvernour. By his wisdom the Subriti were reduced to the Venetians obedience, neuertheless upon condition, to deliuer alius into their hands Emanuel Dracontopulus and Constantine his brother; or if that could not be done, to kill them, as the chiefe authors of all the Rebellions, because so long as they should live, there was no likelihood that the Island would ever be quiet. Besides, that the Calcoethes, and the Anatoliks (who boasted to be issued from the Emperors of Greece) should be banished; & that thirtie of the Noblest families of the Subriti, should come and dwell in the Towne of Boniface. The Candiots and their affaires being thus pacified, they which held the Citie of Nicella, (for there were diuers of Vattasus garrisons still in the Island) did forthwith yeeld.

But it is now time to leaue the Candiots, and to returne to other matters hapned at the same time in Greece, as well in the firme Land, as in the Islands neere adioining, which being of greater importance, haue more troubled and molested the Venetians. For so soone as the new agreement or new affinitie (as it was said) betwixt Vattasus and the King of the Hexagoni was knowne abroad, and that the rumor was, that both of them joining their forces together, would assaile the Greeke Empire, John King of Ierusalem, Gouvernour of Constantinople, being troubled with these newes, began to consider by what cunning meanes he might preferue and defend the Empire committed to his charge; in which busines the Venetians were they alone from whom he expected aid: The which hauing imparted to Theophilo Zeno the Venetian Magistrate at the same time in Constantinople, they both sent to Prince Tepulo, to acquaint him with the League and affinitie of these two mightie Princes, who by the report of all men were in Armes for the inuasion of the Greeke Empire, and that therefore they had need of aide with all expedition, which is a chiefe point in Martiall businesse, saying, That they knew of a certaine, that both of them were verie busie in leuying a mightie Armie: They entreated him therefore to hasten the succours, if they desired to haue Constantinople preserved; And not sparingly to send them this or that, but all things whatsoever they knew to be necessarie for the maintenance of so great and dangerous a warre, Alleging this further caution, That they were not to delaie the matter, for feare least the enemies (which God forbid) should surprize some places fitt and commodious for the wars, which afterward when they would they should not be able to remedie, to the great preiudice of them and their confederats.

The Citie gaue a willing care to this aduertisement, and being moued by the imminent danger, they commanded forthwith to leaue a great Armie. Whereupon 25, 50 Gallies in short space made readie to set saile, who departing from the Port vnder the command of Leonardo Quirini, and Marco Gussini, sailed directly towards Constantinople, when newes was brought them that the Citie was besieged and enuironed with a mightie Armie. The Generalls of the Armie, being troubled at this report report, made all the hast they could, for feare least some mishap might in the meane time befall the Citie.

Leo Guualli, a man well experienced in marine matters, did command the enemies Naue, who hauing notice of the Venetians approach, shifted his place, and brought his Gallies nearer to the shore, where the land-armie was encamped (for the Citie was already besieged by land.) But this designe of the enemy could not make the Venetians change their first resolutions, who at their first arrival did so furiously assaile the Greekish Naue, as in a moment they suncke foure and twentie of their Gallies, and put the rest to flight, in the view of the amazed enemies. The victorious Venetians entring the citie, which they freed from the siege, were ioyfully entertained by all men, but chiefly by their Countreimen who dwelt there: And after they had perswaded them euer to hope well, and to feare no harme so long as the state of The Common-wealth should prosper, they remained there a few daies, and then returned into Italie.

The victorious fleet returned to the Citie sooner than was expected, to the exceeding pleasure and contentment of the people. They tooke great delight to heare, that their Countreimen were deliuered from so great danger; and their ioy was not small for that so pouer an enemy had been so sodainly defeated, who was as soone overcome as lookt vpon.

But the vanquished could not long remaine quiet. For Vattasus who on the other side had armed sixe and twenty Gallies (because the former fleet as some say was sent from the frontiers of the Ponticke Sea by the King of the Hexagoni) came againe and besieged Constantinople, with greater numbers of small vessels. But how great fouer the Armie was, it could not discourage Giovanni Michaeli Magistrate at that time for the Venetians in Constantinople, who with sixteene armed Gallies in the Hauen for guard of the Citie, gaue a furious assault to the enemies Campe. Vattasus Armie did not long endure the furie of the fight. For the affrighted enemies did forthwith inuent meanes how to escape: and fortune soone after beeing aduerse to their partie, they openly began to lie. Tenne of the enemies Gallies being taken, and the residue put to flight, gaue the Venetians a goodly victorie, and those of Constantinople free passage of the Sea. The siege being raised Vattasus fell sick, and soone after died in the Citie of Nymphaea. He left behind him a sonne named Theodore, begotten on a daughter of Theodore La Zaris, whom he married when they were both verie young. Other Authors affirme that beside one and twentie Gallies taken from the enemies before Constantinople, diuers others were taken from them at the streights of the Rhodian Sea, among which were diuers of Syria.

About the same time, at the intreatie of Pope Gregorie, truce was concluded for nine years with the Genoueses. His Holinesse knowing the little loue which the Emperour Fredericke did beare towards him, thought it much auailable for his partie, If, after hee had reconciled these two the mightiest people of Italie, hee could oblige them to him by some good offices. Whereupon (as it is reported) hee entreated the Venetians to send their Ambassadors to him to treat of a peace with the Genoueses: Some say that Stephano Iustimiano, and Marino Morosini, were sent thither; and others set downe Giouan Cornari, and Paulo Molano. Diuers Authours affirme, That the matter was debated at the Councell held at Lyons; and others say, That the truce was concluded at Rome. Among sundrie Articles set downe for the assurance of both parties, it was specially mentioned, That it should not be lawfull for either of them, to purchase new enemies, nor yet new alliance, nor to denounce warre against any, nor to aid any one, without the mutuall consent of either partie. The Pope thundered diuers great excommunications against those, who, in contempt of that agreement, should doe any thing contrarie to the same.

nople; and by that means they were thought to haue infringed it, whereof afterwards grew such grievous warre twixt these two people: But neither he nor those which believed this, did consider, that the Venetians did as they ought in bearing Armes against the King of Hexagons and Iohn Vattassus, who invaded that which belinged vnto them: For the Venetians had purchased right and title in part of Constantinople, which in the name of the Common-wealth they had bene sent from the beginning, vnto whom to denie aide and helpe in so great a danger, they humbly craving the same, had bene as ill done, as for them to infringe an agreement, how holie soeuer: The Venetians raised the enemies Campe before Constantinople, because it was iust and reasonable so to doe; seeing it is lawfull for euery man that hath power and meanes, euer to keepe and defend his owne. For it is as cruell and inhumane a matter to hinder any one from repelling an iniurie done to him, as to wrong an other man. And the Genoueses themselves, if any man should haue invaded ought that had belinged vnto them, would they haue forborne to take armes, till they had receiued aduise and consent from the Venetians? Besides, it is to be thought that the Genoueses by meanes of this treatie, did deale but craftily with the Venetians. For, imagining that it would come to passe by meanes of this agreement, whereby they held the Venetians bound as with a chaine, that they would delay the aide, either by determining, or making shew to prepare forces, vntill the enemy (whom perhaps they had taken Constantinople: because they could not draw the Venetians to this follic, they beganne to crie out, as though they had broken the accord so holily sworne to. But so farre off was Pope Gregorie (who was the meanes for the truce) from the least thought that the Venetians had in any thing at that time broken their faith, as on the contrarie he euer remained firme and constant in their friendship and alliance. Nay, moreover, I find, that about the same time, or soone after, the selfe-same Genoueses did demand aide of the Venetians, as of their faithfull friends and companions, against the Emperour Frederick, and the Pisans, which was freely granted them: But of this wee will speake elsewhere.

It is reported that Pope Gregorie, at the beginning of the truce, did request the Venetians and Genoueses, with all the other Potentates of Italie, to take Armes for the recouerie of the holy Land; and that the same had bene done (because they had all freely promised so to doe) had not the Popes sodaine death broke off that notable enterprize. The Venetians at the same time had friendly composed certaine differences betwixt themselves and the Genoueses: diuers Commissioners for the same purpose being sent from either side. But a cruell tyrannie, which had then crept into the Citie, did in a manner interrupt the whole treatie already concluded, which would not haue proued very necessarie, in regard of that which afterward happened.

Eccelin, a man basely descended, and whose grand-father of the same name, coming like a poore Souldier out of Germanie, had followed the Emperour Otho the third into Italie, being made rich and raised to honour by the Emperour Fredericke the second, (whom he very much resembled) did by little and little commit great tyrannic in Italie, whilst Frederick being armed against the Pope, ouer-ran the greatest part of Italie, and chiefly Lombardie; where diuers famous Cities were greatly vexed, vnder a colour only (as I finde) for that at the beginning of the controuersie betwene Pope Gregorie and Frederick, they had remained Neuters, not taking parts as others did. Eccelin by goodly promises solicited the Paduans, and in hope to preserve their liberties, constrained them to follow the Emperours part. These men vnder a gentle kind of bondage, were soone after held very thort by him: who laying vpon them an vnusuall yoke, beganne openly to tyrannize. Then might you haue seene Gentlemen; some led to punishment, and others to prison; from whence being brought forth, they were either condemned to death, or perpetuall banishbanishment; their goods spoiled, Noble Maides, and Matrones rauished and deflowered: In a word, all detestable actions which a proude conquerour is accustomed to vse towards poore captiues, was executed by this new Prince on the wretched Paduans: Diuers fled away for feare; Diuers likewise being destitute of all meanes, and banished the Citie, with their wiues and children, came to Venice, as to the only Sanctuary of freedome.

All Lombardie on the other side did tremble at the Armes of Frederick. It is reported that Pietro Tepulo, sonne to the Venetian Prince, commanding certaine troupes of Milan against Frederick, was vanquished neare to the new Court, and taken prisoner with great losse, together with sundrie men of note. Frederick, in hatred to the Father and to the Venetians, whose enemy he was already professed, sent him first to Pisa, and afterwards into Apulia, where (as it is reported) he was miserably murdered. The Historians make no mention why hee put him to death in that Prouince. But I thinke, he did it to gratifie those of Apulia, who about the same time had bene greatly afflicted by Giovanni Tepulo, brother to Pietro. For the Venetians in the Popes behalfe had sent sixe and twentie Gallies into Apulia, vnder the command of this Giovanni Tepulo, to invade the Cities of that Prouince, which tooke part with Frederick. This Tepulo hauing at his arriual chased away the Garrison of the Prouince, seized on Thermida, then on Campo Marino, and soone after on Beticia. But whilst he was busied in razing and ruining the taken Towne, word was brought him that the Barze, (the goodliest shippe, which at those daies sailed on the Seas, carrying a thousand Souldiers, and which had fought at Sea for Fredericks partie) was entred into the Hauen of Siponto, called at this day Manfredonia; whereupon he sailed thither with his Gallies, where for his owne aduantage finding the ship in the Hauen, hee assailed it, rooke it with great ease, brake it in peeces, and burnt it in the enemies sight. For this cause it is likely that Frederick sent Pietro Tepulo to be executed in Apulia. Whilst these things were done abroad, or at least soone after, diuers good decrees were enacted in the Citie: They established first the Court of Requests, with three Iudges, to decide euery mans controuersies. And next the ancient Lawes and Statutes of the Citie were examined, and being againe confirmed, were set downe in better termes, and reduced into another quantitie. Some Authors referre to these times, this second battaile of Giovanni Micheli, where he defeated with a few Gallies, the great Armie of Vattassus. Frederick after hee had obtained this victorie at the new Court, in the state of Milan (as wee haue said) where Tepulo was taken prisoner, came to Padua, already subiect to the cruell tyrannie of Eccelin, where keeping the Feast of Easter, newes was brought him, how the Pope had a while before excommunicated him, and all those which followed him, or in any sort did giue him assistance: wherewith being incensed, like a man beside himselfe, he forthwith fell on the Venetians Territories, and being come as far as S. Hilaries Church (where a little before Eccelin had builded a Fort in the view of the Venetians) he cut short his iourney, and turning on the right hand, hee marched with speed towards the Tower of Bebia. This Tower for the hard access therunto, by reason of the water which enuironeth it, did brauely sustaine the enemies assault, vntill that a great number of light vessels being come to the rescue thereof, enforced him to dislodge.

It is certaine that sundrie occasions moued Frederick to warre on the Venetians: For first, he would reuenge the iniurie that hee had receiued, by the burning of his Barze, and because the Venetians had made a league with the Pope. But that where with he was most moued, was, because hee saw great numbers of Paduans were retired to Venice for refuge, thereby fearing, if they dwelt so neare, the Citie of Padua would not long remaine in the same state it then did. And that which makes this seeme to be true, is, that at his departure from Padua, hee carried thence with him the chiefe and richest Citizens, vnder colour of lending them to the warres, confining them farre from home.

The Genoueses about the same time sent to the Venetians according to their agreement, entreating them speedily to aide them with a nauall Armie, saying; That they vnderstood how the Pisans, assisted by Frederick, had armed more than one hundred Gallies against them, and that their affaires could endure no delay, being well assured that the enimie would soone be with them, with whom they were not resolu'd to fight, without the aide of their Confederates. Hereupon the Venetians speedily let forth three score Gallies; which being giuen in charge to Andrea Tepulo (who was the Dukes sonne likewise) he was commanded to make haft to the succor of their friends. This man saying directly to Pola, condemned the Polans in a pecuniarie fine, for not furnishing a Galley which they were bound to doe, and did besides beate downe a part of their walls. From thence with a faire winde hee sailed to Durazzo, where he vnderstood that the Armie of Frederick, and the Pisans, was defeated by the Genoueses, neare to the Isle of Cyrra. At these newes Andrea returned to Pola. For he had notice that the Polans soone after his departure were reuolted from the Venetians; whereupon, at his arriual hee recovered it, spoiled, and razed it.

Zara likewise remained not long in quiet; for soone after that the Armie was returned to Venice, it reuolted the fifth time, and chased away Giovanni Michaelis their Gouverneur: For the recouerie whereof a mightie Armie was appointed, and five and fortie Vessels were armed, whereof five and twentie were Gallies, and the rest ships of burthen. Rayniero Zeno was made Generall of the Armie, who arriuing with his forces in Dalmatia, came and besieged this so often-rebellious Citie: where after he had staied two whole Moneths, and executed sundrie exploits, the stubbornnesse of the Inhabitants being qualified, at last they yielded.

The Citie being recouered, they concluded to send Ambassadours to the King of Hungarie. Whereupon soone after Stephano Iustiniano, and Pietro Dandolo, were sent thither. These men dealt in such sort with King Bella, as hee renounced and made ouer to the Venetians all the right which himselfe or any other Kings of Hungarie might pretend to that Citie; and because this deede of his might be more firme and authentically, they would haue it to be set downe in writing.

At this stay stood the affaires of the Venetians, when Prince Tepulo deceased, in the twentieth year of his gouernement. He was honourably buried in the Church of S. Iohn and S. Paul the Twinnes.

¶ MARINO MOROSINI, the 44. Duke of Venice.

Marino

MARINO MOROSINI succeeded him, by a new manner of election, according to some Authors. We haue set downe the forme of the Princes election vsed till those daies; which was indeede without deceit, and such, as if they, who liued in those times, had bene ambitious, it would haue easily minnistr'd occasion to them to haue done much euill. But that which hath followed since, is much more certaine than that ancient manner, and much more different. For first of all, when question is of electing a Prince: before the Electors come to any casting of lots, five men, appointed for this purpose, doe in the name of the Common-wealth acquaint the future Prince with that which he is to obserue, as well concerning his owne dignitie, as for the honour and profit of the Common-wealth. For of necessitie the same must bee published in the great Councell, and be approved by them. After his approbation, all those who haue attained to the age of thirtie yeares; are commanded to come to the general assembly: There, as many little round white Balls, as there bee Gentlemen in the Roome, are cast into a great vessell, among which are mingled thirtie that be gilded: I meane, that being so mingled together they make vp the iust number of the assistants, there being neither more nor lesse than they were in number at the beginning. Then being called in order, euery man draweth forth one, and those which haue lighted on the gilded ones, are led into another chamber neare to the same: And this is called the first lot of the thirtie Balls: Then againe they put thirtie Balls into a Vessell, to answer the number of those who first drew, nine whereof are gilded, and those nine who draw the golden ones, doe name fortie men, whereupon these men be called the Electors of the first election. These fortie thus named, returne againe to the lot, after they haue put as many Balls into the Vessell, twelue whereof are gilded: the twelue of this number that draw those are called the second Electors. These men name five and twentie, who againe draw as many Balls, nine whereof are gilded, and the rest white: These nine which haue drawn the gilded ones choose fortie five, who returning againe to the lot, draw out of the whole number eleuen gilded ones, & they which light on them, doe last of all name one and fortie, which haue absolute power to elect the Duke and Soueraigne Magistrate of the Common-wealth.

Sabellicus saith, That he learned this manner of election (for there is no mention hereof left in writing by any Authors) of Benedicto Trevisano, whom he accompanied from Venice, at such time as he was sent to be the Magistrate at Verona. Hee learned then of him, that these one and fortie Authors of the Princes election, doe shut themselves vp in that part of the Pallace, where the Senate doth commonly meete euerie day: and then at their entring in, they choose three among them, exceeding the rest in age and authoritie, as Princes of the whole assemblie, whom they name Priors, vnto whom after they haue giuen the chiefe place, the rest of the companie diuide themselves into foure parts, from whence they are called one by one to giue their voices, and it is lawfull for euerie of them to choose in what place of the foure he will be.

Now those that be called from anie one of the foure parts (for that it is not matteriall) come before these three, euerie one carrying in his hand a little folded scrole, wherein is written the name of him whom they choose for Duke. They lay them all downe in a certaine place, and returning to their seats, two Secretaries who stand before these Priors, doe in their presence read, how many voices euerie of them hath. The names of them that are appointed for voyces are put into a cap, and being well mingled together, they are drawne forth one by one at all aduentures, and according as they are drawne, they are likewise in the same order with their suffrages afterwards committed to lots. But this lot is not so much for the creation of the Duke, as to know how euerie man stands affected. Now, those names being gathered vp in order, are againe put together; then they begin to cast lots for him, who by chance is first drawne, who if he be in the companie, is forthwith commanded to depart, and to withdraw himselfe into a place not farre from thence. But before they come to cast lots, those that be there present are demanded, whether any of them can allledge any matter against him for whom they are ready to cast lots, and it is lawfull for euery man freely to speake his mind. If there be then any one who will taxe him with some crime, he riseth vp, and declareth all that he knowes against him, which may make him vnworthie of such a dignitie: This man as faultie is called forth of that secret place before the Lords, who commaund him to purge himselfe if he can of that which is objected against him, which hauing done, he is sent backe againe to that priuate place. Then they aske againe if any man will impugnethat which he hath spoken, & in the same manner as often as he is taxed with any thing, hee is called to iustifie himselfe. But we haue learned, that vpon one or two iustificacions at the most, the whole matter is concluded.

Thus after he hath made his last excuse, they begin againe to cast lots for him, and they cast into vessels, one for the consent, and the other for the refusal, their smal bals marked with a certaine character to auoid deceit. Then they heedfully reckon the balles of the consent, which if they amount to the number of fise and twentie, he for whom they drew is declared Prince, if they are lesse, they fall to cast lots for him, who was drawne for the second place. Against him likewise, and so the rest, it is lawfull for euery man to speake what he thinketh good, and the like for him to refuse their accusations: and this man shall be Prince, if the number appointed 20 for the voices be full, if not, they proceed to the third, then to the fourth, and so to all the rest. He saith, That it is a rare matter if the Duke be not created at this first Scrutino, as they call it. And therefore if by chance there proue no creation at the first time, the first voices are crossed out, & after proceede to new casting of lots for those which are shut vp in the same manner as we haue said. And the same is reiterated vntill such time as they haue a new Duke.

This is that which Sabellicus hath set downe, vnder the authoritie of so notable a man, concerning the Princes election, which I haue of purpose mentioned, to the end that all men may know what was the ancient manner, and what the new forme now is of electing the Venetian Princes, whereof we haue hitherto spoken, and shal hereafter speake as occasion is offered: As also because that Morosini was the first that was created in this sort. But how fouer this manner of election were then or since inuile, it is certaine that the Venetians haue of a long time obserued it in the creation of their soueraigne Magistrate.

Now to returne to Morosini his gouernment: In his time Philippo Fontano Bishop of Rauenna, came (as some Authors say) to Venice, as Legate from Pope Gregory or (according to others) from Pope Alexander, who vsing spirituall Armour propounded eueralasting life as recompence for all those who should take Armes with him against the tirant Eccelin, who was proclaimed enemie to the Church of Rome. Eccelin at the same time laid straight siege to Mantua: Philippo to breake his forces, 40 determined with such troups as he could leuie to trouble and disquiet those townes which he had possessed. Diuers men being called to so holy an enterprise by so great a recompence, came and met him at Venice: But the Venetians power did greatly further the businesse. For besides the great number of souldiers wherewith they furnished Philippo, they relieued him with Armour, ships, and victuals, and they generally caused all necessaries to be carried speedily to the camp, which they thought to be expedient for the warres and besieging of townes.

The Armie departed from Betia, (which was the Rendez-vous for all the troups) to march against the enemie, and came on a sodaine to Corregiola. Anselm nephew to Eccelin, and gouernour of Padua, was already come thither with certaine troups, who being aduertised of what had passed at Venice, had caused the ordinarie course of the riuers Brente and Bacchillon, to be turned backe, so as he did in a manner draw drie all the lakes which were neere thereabouts being wont to be filled by the flowing of those riuers, to the end the Venetian ships might not come

neere the firme Land to Land the Armie. This did in some sort make the Nauigation more difficult. For when they came to the mouth of Corregiola finding the ancient channell almost without water, and so shallow as it could not beare any great vessels, they were constrained to vse small boates & barks. In them they passed our first the Archers to beate back the enemies which stood vpon the bancks opposite against them; and afterwards they landed the residue of the Armie, which marched directly to the citie of Sacco, which being strengthened by Anselm with a strong Garrison was valiantly defended.

The Bishop of Rauenna did on a sodaine raise his Campe, and seized on some small townes not farre from thence, Anselm being aduertised thereof, after he had committed the guard of Sacco to the Towne-men, came speedily to Padua. Philippo and the Venetians hauing receiued the Saueens vpon their faithfull promise, pursued the enemie. Padua at their arriual was so sodainly assailed, as they had (in a manner) taken all the suburbs of the crooked bridge, ere they in the Citie heard the assault. Philippo and the Venetians, waxing more hardie by this fortunate successe, did more furiously assaile the enemie at the Port Altina. The Paduans blushing to see so excellent a citie, so fully furnished with men and all necessaries, to be loit by their fault, beganne courageously to resist the enemie. The fight was eager on both sides: these men fought for their countrie, the other for renowne: the loue 20 to their countrie did animate the one, and the hope of victorie the others. At the last the obstinacie of the Towne-men being overcome, the citie was entred by force at that gate. Whereupon Anselm thinking all lost, fled with certaine of his friends on the other side of the citie. His flight being knowne, the towne was forthwith yielded. The castle which at this day is to be seene in one part of the citie, within foure daies after did the like.

Eccelin all this while being ignorant of what was done at Padua, and seeing that he lost his time before Mantua, resolved to bring backe his troups to Verona. Hee forthwith therefore raised his siege, and camped on the Riuier Myncia, where hee had determined to tarrie three dayes. But he was constrained to alter his purpose 30 vpon the newes of the losse of Padua, which he little expected. And albeit it did greatly moue him, yet kept he his griefe verie secret, dissembling it vntill he came to Verona, whither after these newes he marched by great iournies. But being entred into it with his troups, he did commit (as it is reported) incredible crueltie. For by sundrie exquisite torments he put twelue thousand Paduans to death which were in his Armie, who were not mercenarie men, or of the common sort, but all Gentlemen, and some of them of great account. We find not that euer any man did the like, (except Cornelius Scilla) in slaughtering at one time so many men subiected vnder his obedience. Of whom it is reported, That at one time and place he put twelue thousand Prentices to death, because they had fauoured 40 Marius partie, not pardoning any one of so great a number, but only one that had bene his Hoste: who perceiving by that meanes the slower and choise of his country to bee extinct, did boldly refuse his mercie; and in saying that he would not thanke him for that curtelie, he cast himselfe into the throng of those who were put to execution.

It is not to be thought strange, or vntrue which we haue deliuered touching so many thousands of men at one time sent forth of Padua to the warres: For it is certaine by the testimony of a verie credible Author, That there hath bene reckoned at times in Padua foure hundred families, all Gentlemen; and that which is more, sixscore thousand men sent thereout to the warres at one time.

Eccelin, after the massacre of the Paduans, hauing shut vp with great Rampiers a little belowe Vincenza the Riuier Bacchillon, diuided it into diuers streames, and by that diuision he made the Citie more stronge, and made diuers vses of it, chiefly for Milles. The Bishop of Rauenna on the other side caused a great ditch to be made round about the walles of Padua, and by that meanes in such sort fortified the the Citie as it needed no more to feare the attempts of Eccelin. Then he marched sodainely being well accompanied, to that place where the River Bacchilion was shut vp: The Gouvernour of Vincenza, equall to the Bishop both in strength and courage, sallied with the troupes which Eccelin had left there in Garrison. The fight beganne speedily and held out long time without certaine knowledge which side had the better. But word being brought in the heat of the skirmishe, that the Ram-piers of the foud were broken downe, and that the River with great force was returned into the ancient channell, the Bishop sodainely founded the retraite. Diuers warlike attempts were afterwards performed on either side, but they are not fitting to be here set downe.

Some Authors affirme that the Pope, in acknowledgement of the aide and succour which the Venetians sent him in his action, graunted them that the Deane of Saint Marks golden Church should in high solemnities, vse a Mitre and pastorall staffe, which none of their predeceffours could euer till then obtaine. HERE was in Phœnicia (one of the Prouinces of the Kingdome of Siria) betwene mount Carmell and Sydon, a Citie in times past verie famous, called at first Ptolomais, afterwards Acon, by a more vsuall name. Some Venetian Historians haue set downe Acre for Acon, following therein the vulgar, who so call it. The Venetians, at such time as the Christians tooke Hierusalem, with a part of Syria, had by an agreement purchased a kinde of tittlein that Citie; and not the Venetians alone, but likewise the Genoueses and Pisans, who sent nauall Armies for the assistance of that warre. Now the Venetians and Genoueses had in the same Citie a Church common to them both, albeit they had otherwise a particular place and street a-part. These being first prouoked with ieaousie and afterward with mortal hatred, beganne to striue about the possession of the same Church.

The Venetians alleged, That by couenant made with Baldwin not onely a street, but the third part of the Citie belonged to them, and so consequently that Church was theirs which was dedicated to Saint Saba. The Genoueses insisted on the contrarie, not yielding either to the couenants or to their fellows; and there was likelihood that some great mischiefe might befall the affaires of the Christians in Syria in regard of that contention. But to take away all occasion of future diuision, the whole matter was referred to Pope Alexander the fourth, who louing equitie as well as peace, did forthwith conclude, That seeing the diuine seruice was common to them both, the Church likewise ought to be so. The Genoueses hauing notice of the Popes sentence sooner than the Venetians, presuming on the good will which Philip of Montfort a French-man by Nation, did beare vnto them, who was Gouvernour of the Citie, they came not staying for the Popes answer, and seized on the place, and speedily fortified it in manner of a Castle. Philip also vnto whome the Venetians complained, was so farre off from redressing the same, as on the contrarie, vpon their speech, That the thild part of the Citie belonged vnto them, he commanded them (to giue the people contentment) to depart thence.

The Venetians, disdaining to digest such an iniurie, made a speedie league with Alfred, King of Sicill, against the Genoueses; But whilst they were busied in preparing their Armie, the Prince of Antioch, and the Patriarke of Ierusalem, did sharply by their letters rebuke Philip, counsailling him to gouerne himselfe more discretely; and assured him, that if the Venetians were not reconciled to the Genoueses, from whom they were seuered by his pride and their owne, the affaires of Christendome were like to receiue a great affront in Syria, by reason of that quarrell. The Venetians vnderstanding the small account that Philip made of those aduertisements, and that it was certaine, that he would not change his determination, either for admonitions or threats, but that he would continue willfull in the hatred which he had already conceiued; They being wholly impatient by reason of the hainousnesse of the matter, set presently forth thirtie Gallies well provided, which they had in readinesse at the same time in the Hauen of Tyre. The Venetian Historians say, That they were sent from Italie, vnder the command of Lorenzo Tepulo; and that coming to the Hauen of Ptolomais, after they had broken the chaine which shut it in, they furiously charged three and twentie Genoueses ships of burthen, and two Gallies, being there by chance in the harbour, which were as easily taken as vnawares assailed; and that afterwards hauing despoiled them of all their tackling, they burnt them all in a moment. With the same violence likewise they came to S. Saba's Church, which the Genoueses had fortified, the which being likewise taken, was for the most part ruined.

the Venetians.

Whereupon the Genoueses, rather incensed than daunted with this losse, hauing armed two and thirtie Gallies at Tyre, came to meete with the Venetian Nauie; but it was in vaine. For the Venetians leauing the Syrian warres, for the care which they had of the affaires of Greece, sailed into the Pontick Sea, to the aide of their Countre-men, which dwelt in Constantinople, whom the warres of Matthias had entangled. In the meane time the newes of that which had bene done in Ptolomais, being come into Italie, did in such sort stirre vp the Genoueses, who alreadie did not greatly affect the Venetians, as they refused to leuie a mightie Armie, to reuenge this wrong: Therefore, after they had armed fortie Gallies, and ten Argozies, they sent them into Syria.

resolution.

The Venetians likewise in Italie fore-seeing the dangerous warre, which they were to make with the Genoueses, did with a mercenious speedie arme fiftene Gallies, and ten ships of burthen, of which Andrea Zeno was made Generall; And with like celeritie, those Venetians which were in Ptolomais made readie about fortie lesser ships, commonly called Vaccetes, and ten Argozies.

At this stay stood the affaires of the Venetians and Genoueses in Syria, when in Italie Pope Alexander, vpon tidings what had passed at Ptolomais, and considering how great either of their forces were, & that by their mortal hatred, some horrible mischiefe was threatened those Christians which at that time were in Syria; had an especiall care to giue audience to both their Ambassadors sent to him for that purpose, and for that cause would needes haue the Pisans to be present at that audience, whose Ambassadors he had sent for out of Talscan, to be as it were Vmpiers, and Procurers of the peace, betwixt these two people. And (without doubt) by the Popes mediation peace would sone haue ensued, if they had not in the meane time fought together in Syria. The newes of this encounter did greatly trouble the leges of the Pope. For so soone as both the Armies arrived in Syria, the Venetians albeit they kept a strong Garrison in Acre, had not forsaken Tyre, where the Genoueses and Philip Montfort remained, who vndoubtedly would haue offered violence to the Venetians which held a part thereof, had not the Gouvernour of the Citie expressly forbidden any attempt whatsoeuer, within the circuit of the Citie, or in the Hauen. But the condition of the Venetians seemed in some sort better: who alone held Acre, and yet neuertheless had not abandoned that which they possessed in Tyre.

defeated by the Venetians.

The Genoueses hereat being more incensed, came on a sodaine forth of the haufen, and sailed directly towards Ptolomais. Andrea Zeno and Lorenzo Tepulo, Generals of the Venetian Armie, being aduertized of the enemies proceeding (for diuers Venetians were in Tyre, as hath beene said, mingled among the enemies) imagined the truth, to wit, That the Genoueses meaning was to come thither, thinking in the same manner to surprize them, as their owne men had bene of late surprized by the Venetians. For which cause on a sodaine they drew all their vessells forth of the haufen, so as these two mightie fleets met one with another. Vpon the first knowing of each other, they quickly put themselves in order of battaile, and then ranne furiously one vpon another, being armed indeed more with hatred than with force, after which ensued a bloudie fight. But the Venetians from the beginning of the fight had the most advantage, as being the stronger, and greatly fortified by the aide of the Pisans, with whom they were then in league; In the end the enemies being broken and defeated, and diuers of their Gallies sunke and taken, to the number of fife and twentie: the rest trembling with feare escaped to Tyre. The Venetian brought backe his victorious Armie to Ptolomais, dragging after him the taken Gallies, and some thousands of Genoueses.

This notable losse of the enemies did not yet appease the Venetians furie, but on the contrarie did the more inflame it: For that soone after this victorie they ouer-threw all the buildings, as well publicke as priuate, which the Genoueses possessed in Acre: they spoiled their store-houses and moueables, and expelled at the last their Criers and Beadles, with their other Officers, and all other signes of their ancient fortunes, which they had till then enjoyed in that Citie.

Moreover, two thousand fixe hundred Genoueses who were taken in the fight, and brought thither (as hath beene said) were by them made Galley-slaves. It is reported that the Pope was greatly troubled with these newes; and that he would not dismisse the Ambassadors of Genoa, who were called home after the losse of the battaile, till the Venetians had granted, that all the Genoueses Souldiers which were taken prisoners, should be set at libertie.

The power of the French much decayed in Greece.

Thus were the Venetians affaires entangled in Syria, whilest in Greece they were little better, being now vexed by the Greekes, then by Vattassus, and another while by Theodore his sonne. For the power of Baldwin was so decayed, as if the Venetians had not at times come into the Pontick Sea to bring him aide, the Greeke Empire would not so long haue remained in the hands of the French-men: which they hauing often done at other times, did not cease to continue, so soone as they were become Masters of Ptolomais, notwithstanding their cruell war with the Genoueses. For they failed into Greece, as forgetting their affaires in Syria, to giue Baldwin timely succours. But vpon newes of the death of Theodore, which was thought to haue happened opportunely for the quiet of Greece, the Venetians returned into Syria, whither they were called by sundrie messengers.

Michael Paleologus.

In the meane time, Michael surnamed Paleologus, who was left Protector of Theodore his children, with the absolute gouernement of the Empire, had at the beginning giuen hope to all men of a happie peace: For he made heed to bee contented, and highly to respect the children, and to preserue and defend that which Theodore had left them. But soone after, hee did not only defeat Baldwin's forces, but wholly chased them thence: whereunto, how, and by what meanes he attained, I will briefly set downe. Yet I will make mention by the way of that which some Authors doe report, to wit, That Theodore did not leaue Paleologus as Protector to his children, but one named Gregorie Imiole, whom Paleologus caused to be slaine, as hee was hearing diuine seruice, and that hauing by his death taken vpon him the charge of the children (for besides his neare kindred, hee had ever shewed himselfe a faithfull friend to the late Theodore) so soone as he had assured his owne estate, hee caused them miserably to be put to death.

William Prince

This man being installed Protector, beganne the warre against William, King of Achaia, Achaia; a French-man by nation; and he ceased not to pursue him till hee had constrained him to fight, wherein being overcome, and taken, he confined him to prison. Being proud of this victorie, hee came & assailed Baldwin. The Emperour being aduertized that his enemy approached with his forces, resolved to guard the streights of the Ponticke sea, and to driue him if it were possible, far from the haufen. So soone therefore as he had prepared a nauall Armie, with the greatest forces that he could leuie, he gaue the command thereof to Marco Gradonico the Venetian, who was then Magistrate in Constantinople, determining either to hazard all or else to diuert that haughtie enemy from his purpose. For being desperat of all aide, he knew not by what inuention else he could bee able to keep Constantinople, hauing beene till then so extremely impoverished, first by John Vattassus, and after by Theodore his successour, as hee was enforced to Pawne Philip his sonne (who had afterwards committed to ward in Venice) to the Merchants of Bruges, who was lent him a great summe of money, & to sell the gutters and coverings of leade of the publicke buildings and the pretious reliques of Saints: so great was his want of money.

To what extre-
was brought.

Thus being compassed with miseries, and almost distracted, he sent all his forces, to the guard of the straits and passages of the Sea, not leauing any garrison in the Citie. But whilest he fought meanes to keepe out a forraigne enemy, he was ouerthrowne by domestick treacherie. For certaine Greekes (who by nature were light-headed and inconstant; being wearied with so many miseries, (or rather as I thinke gluted with the French gouernment) thinking that for want of a garrison in the Citie, they might easily deliuer the same to the enemy, sent diuers whom they might trust to treat with Paleologus, and to will him to come at a certaine houre of the night, with what forces he best pleased, promising that without doubt they would bring him in, and make him master of the Citie without the losse of any one man. Paleologus would not slip such an occasion, but came about midnight, with great troupes of souldiers through by-waies for feare of deserying. Hee was no sooner come to the walles, but the traitors receiued him into the Citie, without the slaughter of any one except of those which had the guard of the gate. Baldwin, and Pantaleon Iustinian the Patriarch, being awaked at the first noyse of the surpris, in great feare fled to Euripus, called at this day the strait of Nigrepont, with certaine of their friends, carrying with them the most rich, and precious things, that so sodaine a nightlie terror would permit them, where taking ship, they sailed thence with a direct course to Nigrepont.

Paleologus taketh
Constantinople.

Some Authors say, that Baldwin and his troupes were absent when Paleologus tooke the Citie. But whether he were there or no, it is certaine that the Citie of Constantinople was lost in this manner the eight and fiftie years, (or as others say) the three-score and third year after it was taken by the Venetians and French-men. The Venetians dispatched messengers with speed to the Pope; and Baldwin sent to Lewis the French King: but no aide was either giuen or denied by any of them both. Yet notwithstanding, in regard it was very likely that Paleologus would not stand still in so faire & euene a way, they concluded to send Marco Michaeli with eightene gallies to guard the Islands, & all the Sea-coasts, with expresse charge not to let slip fit occasion to disturbe Paleologus. The which was so valiantly executed, & with such dexterity, as all men did assuredly beleue, that Paleologus was at the point to leaue Constantinople in despair, had not the Genoueses in hatred to the Venetians readily offered him their aid. For hauing made a league together they sent their whole armie out of Syria into Greece, which of a certain was much more strong and mightie than that wherewith they fought betwixt Tyre and Acre.

The Citie of Epidaurus called at this day

Malassia;

Paleologus trusting to his owne forces, attempted to enlarge the bounds of his Empire towards Morea: And the better to effect it, he let William at libertie, (who as we haue said was by him imprisoned after his defeat) on condition to deliuer the Citie of Epidaurus in Morea into his hands (so was this Citie called in olde time which standeth almost in the midst of Greece, called at this day, by corruption ruption of the language Maluasia) being assured, that with this Citie he would greatly molest the Venetians by sea and land. But the Venetians hauing notice thereof, with little difficultie drew William to their partie, and sware perpetual friendship with him, who serueth them afterward verie faithfully in this warre. They sent moreover eight and thirtie Gallies with supplies, to their Armie which was already in Grecia.

The league of Achaea with the venetians.

But whilest this mightie Armie was preparing against Paleologus, diuers ships of warre at sundrie times departed from Venice; as ships of burthen fit for the fight, and Gallies well appointed, not so much for the guard of their owne frontiers, as to spoile whatsoever they could find belonging to the enemy, & to frustrate his attempts. Which happened at the same time when that great ship called the Lion, which had two hundred mariners, and an hundred souldiers in her departing from Venice with two Gallies, met neere to Tenedos with twentie Gallies of Genoa, which in stead of flying from the gaue chase vnto, & pursued them almost to Constantinople. It was not long after when that great fleet of thirtie seuen Gallies sent with supplies (as aforesaid) arrived in Greece, where they met by chance on the Sea of Theffalonica with three score saile of Greekes and Genoueses, who durst not meddle with them. Neither would the Venetians assaile them, in regard of their great multitudes; but passing quietly by them, they came into the Isle of Nigrepont, the which for the most part was possessed by the Venetians; after they had driuen thence Amosius, 20 bastard (as some say) to Fredericke the third, King of Sicily, who hauing a part thereof by contract of marriage with Marulla, daughter to Boniface of Verona, held the partie of Paleologus.

The venetians in the isle of Negrepont.

The enemies fleet sailing forth of the Sea of Theffalonica met with three Venetian ships of warre neere to the Bosphorus of Thraee, returning from scouring the Seas, almost as farre as Constantinople. These ships being taken, all the prisoners which fell to the Genoueses were forthwith murdered, and they which happened on Paleologus, had their eyes plucked out. The Venetian naue feeling winter draw on, and the enemy not firre, returned to Venice. About the beginning of the next Spring, Gilberto Dandolo departed from Venice with two and thirtie Gallies, and being come into Greece, met vpon the way neere the hauen called the Seauen swine, the same fleet of Genoueses which the Venetians the yeare past durst not deale withall, as they came forth of the Bosphorus to spoile whatsoever they could light on belonging to the Venetians. Being come in sight one of another, they presently put themselves in order of battaile readie to fight, running one vpon another with great furie. The fight was verie sharpe at the encounter, but it lasted not long, by reason of the final number of the vessels, neither was it verie bloudie. For the Genoueses with losse of foure of their ships escaped away by strength of their oares, putting themselves into the hauen of Maluasia. But the Genoueses soone after made their losse good, by the sodaine surprisall of three Venetian ships, laden 40 with vituals and munition.

Now albeit the maine warre was neere to the Islands of the Aegean Sea, and along the coast which runneth from Morea to the straite of Gallipolis, yet the affaires of Syria were not altogether quiet. For all the Italians (in a manner) that were in Ierusalem did so much fauour the Venetians in Acre, as it was plainly seene, that they did more affect them than they did the Genoueses: whereas on the contrarie, thole of Tyre held altogether for the Genoueses. By this meanes all the Christians which were then in Syria, were diuided in factions one against another for the partie of these two mightie people: and those Cities which in times past had bene with so much labour and bloud freed from the cruell Empire of Mahomet, were in an instant by this vnnaturall warre filled with murder and sedition. Neuerthelesse the Venetians that they might not seeme carelesse of what more neerly concerned them the third or fourth yeare (according to some Authors) of this first Genoa war, set forth fiftie Gallies, or (as some say) seuen and thirtie against their enemies the Genoueses.

The Christians in Syria diuided into factions in regard of the venetians and Genoueses.

Genoueses, who being come into the maine directed their course to Sicily where the Genoa fleet was reported to ride. And not finding the enemy there, they sailed into Syria, where neere to Tyre they tooke an Argozie of the enemies. After this they entered the hauen, determining to force the Citie: But Andrea Barosso, a discreet and valiant Capraine was gouernour of the towne, who although the Venetians had sent to Protophais for supplies to girt the Citie with a freightie liege, both by sea and land, did neuerthelesse with the garrison thereof verie brauely defend it.

Tyre besieged by the venetians.

The Genoueses in the meane time were not idle: For vnderstanding by their spies, that a great ship called the Strong Castle, with ten other ships of burthen laden with marchandize, were to come forth of the hauen of Venice, bound for Asia, they lay in ambush for them behinde a Rocke at the issue of the Adriaticke Gulph. But the marchants being thereof aduertized by a small boate which went before for discouerie, affrighted with the newes, made presently to land. And unlading their ships on the shoare, where lay a garrison of Albanians, they left the empty vessels to the enemy, who perceiuing themselves discovered, and knowing the Venetians meaning, forsooke their ambush, and shewed themselves. Some historians affirme that Michael Doria commaunded that Genoa fleet, and how they fought at Sea, as also that the Venetians trusting to the strength and greatnes 20 of an Argozie returned to Venice, after they had lost the other ships laden with marchandize.

The Genoueses ambush discovered.

The Venetians in sted of being discouraged at this losse, were the more animated to reuenge; so as not long after they sent Giacomo Dandolo into Dalmatia with seuen Gallies, with full power (If it should be expedient for the Common-wealth) to ioine with those whom hee should finde there for the guard of the Islands. Whereupon after he had taken three from Zara, hee sailed into the Sea of Sicilie, where receiuing three other Gallies of Candie, and not long after foure from Nigrepont, strengthened with these supplies hee sailed to Ragusa, where hee met 30 Marco Grademio with tenne Gallies; These two fleets being ioined together, sailed into Sicilie; where after they had coasted all that part of the Island, which looketh towards the East, and almost all that which lieth from Mount Pachino toward the South, they tooke neere to Lilibeum three Genoa Gallies conducted by Lanfranc of Bourbon. This losse being reported at Genoa, eight and twentie Gallies were sodainly set forth, to reuenge this iniurie; who sailing into Sicilie with a direct course to meete the enemy, found the Venetians at Ankor in the Hauen of Trapani. Some write, that the two fleets met by chance before Trapani: But whether it were so or no, it is certaine that the Gallies on either side failed in order of battaile readie for fight.

Three Genoueset gallies taken by the venetians

It is reported that the Genoueses came too eagerly to charge, and so by consequence too vnadvisedly. For after their comming from Genoa they feared nothing so much as to misse the Venetian: so that their hatred concurring with their power the fight began sodainly. Hatred on the one side, and desire of glorie on the other, did greatly augment eithers forces: And as well the one as the other, would manifest to the Sicilians, (in whose fight they fought) which of them was best experienced in Martiall discipline, & who were best Sea-men. They fought a long time with vncertainetie of victorie. But the Genoueses fortune at last declining, their wilfulness was such, as rather than to escape with dishonour they chose there to die fighting. In this fight were taken foure and twentie of their Gallies: and the residue burnt or sunke. About two thousand five hundred were taken prisoners, and 50 more than twelue hundred slaine: therest were drowned.

The Genoueses defeated by the venetians before Trapani.

The victorie was not vnbloudie to the Venetians; but their ioy to haue so brauely vanquished the enemy, would not suffer them to thinke on their great losse. And because that by this ouerthrow the Genoueses power was thought to be wholly abated, Paleologus, who till then had taken their partie, made truce with the Veneti-

the Genoueses.

It happened by chance that certaine of the enemies ships being come at the same time as farre as Modon to rob & spoile, so soon as they vnderstood of the Arriuall of the Venetian Armie, presuming on their swiftnesse on a sodain like run-awaies they turned their backs. The Venetians holding themselves not deceived in their enemies flight, forthwith followed them: But the Genoueses being still daunted with their former losse received in Sicilie, and determining from the beginning not to fight, did escape by strength of their oares into the Hauen of Rhodes: from whence soon after departing, they tooke a Venetian ship laden with verie rich Marchandize in the Channell of Nigrepont: some say it was not in the Channell, but in the Hauen of Hiericon. The Genoueses after that, sailed sodainly into Candie, where after they had coasted the greatest part of the Island, they tooke Cydon a seatowne (called at this day Canea by corruption of speech) which for the most part they spoiled and ruined.

During these exploits in Greece, there arose a great commotion in Venice which did threaten the Commonwealth with euident danger. The expences of this long warre had till then so exhausted the publike treasure, as the Senate was constrained to inuent new subsidies for the entertainment of the Armie: Whereupon they laid a new impost on white meates. Which being commanded to bee published, the people at that time wearie of so great burthens, came running to the Palace with great noise and menaces: Wherewith the Senators being amazed, Prince Raynierio came forth, to the end by his soueraigne authoritie, either to dant the popular furie, or else to pacifie their tumultuous spirits by some gentle admonition: But this manie-headed beast, without any respect at all to the ducall dignitie, did forth-with cast stones at the Prince: who being affrighted gaue place to their furie. No sooner was the Duke retired, but the Authors of the sedition hauing found a fit occasion for their theeuish intents, did by force enter into diuers gentlemens houses which they ranfackt, and spoiled. At the last the tumult being appeased, sharpe information was made against those who had done outrage to the Soueraigne dignitie, and were the Authors of this popular sedition; whereupon the delinquents being apprehended were seuerely punished.

It is reported that about the same time all the streets and places of the Citie were paved with bricke, and that the bridge of Rialto was with great cost new builded, with more cunning workmanship than before. All this notwithstanding the ruining of Cydon, and the taking of the ship so richly laden, did greatly discontent the Venetians; Therefore, three and twentie well-furnished Gallies were giuen to Marco Gradonico, to saile to Acre, with expresse commandement to espie a fit time when with most advantage he might fight, and when it should bee offered, to employ all his forces by some warlike enterprize to repress the pride and rashnesse of the enemies, which was of late encreased by reason of some fortunate successe. Some Authors thinke that these Gallies were sent to serue for a conuoy to those, which at the same time went into Asia about traffick of merchandize, and that they met with eight shippes of Genoa, neare to Rhodes, laden with merchandize, which they tooke and sent hometo Venice; of which successe the people were verie ioyfull. I greatly wonder at that which some doe write, touching five ships of Pisa, that were brought to Venice with those of Genoa, seeing that some few yeares before the Venetians, conlorted with the Pisans, fought with the Genoueses in Syria, and that soone after they were comprehended, as friends and allies to the Venetians, in the truce made with the Genoueses by the mediation of king Philip: Others which make mention how the gallies were sent to reuenge the ruine of Cydon and the taking of the rich marchant-ship, affirme that they did not fight neere vnto Rhodes with the Genoueses fleet of eight and twentie gallies, but betwixt Tyre and and Acre, and that they went more courageously to the charge, in regard of the places of retreat which either of them had, though neuertheless at the last the Venetians there likewise got the vpper hand, hauing taken five of the enemies Gallies.

Whilst these exploits were done at Sea, Prince Zeno died in the seuenteenth yeare of his gournment.

Lorenzo Tepulo sonne to Prince Giacomo, succeeded him. At this Princes entrie Pope Clement the fourth after he had discreetly considered how great miseries the French-men, with others who till then were in Syria had endured, and were likely still to endure by means of the wars betwixt these two potent people, he did by his Ambassadours entreat the Venetians and the Genoueses, to listen to a suspension of Armes, if they could not on a sodaine conclude a peace. And the more easily to effect it, he entreated either of them to send their Commissioners to him to Viterbo. The Kings of France and Sicilie, did request the like, offering freely to employ themselves to mediate a firme peace betwixt them. Commissioners were sent to the Pope, but certaine moneths after, they returned to Venice without concludng any thing. About the same time there hapned great scarcitie of victuals in the Citie, by reason that the passages into Sicilie and Apulia for corne were shut vp from the Venetian Marchants: For the Genoueses scouring all the Seas, there was no man that would vndertake to relieue the Common-wealth. There needed a mightie fleet to serue for Conuoy to the Marchants sailing to and fro. But that could not easily be brought to passe in so troublesome a time. Wherefore they determined to haue recourse to their neighbours. They sent to Treuiso, Padua, Ferrara, and to the neighbour Cities, who, besides the great abundance of monie offered vnto them, were entreated, That if euer the Venetians had done any pleasure to their neighbours, as well to others, as to the Paduans of fresh memorie, (as those who not long since by their means had shaken off the yoke of seruitude, when (to all mens knowledge) there were no forces greater or readier than those of the Venetians for the ouerthrowing of Eccelsius tyrannie: They would in so great necessity relieue that Citie which had so well deserved of them. Howbeit if in their present necessitie they would not remember curties recciued, yet at least for humanitie sake to grant their request. But neither intreaties nor monie being able to overcome the ingratitude of their neighbours, provision of corne was in all places denied them.

the neighbours.

The Venetians disdaining to be thus vnworthily dealt with, to the end that all men might know, (and chiefly they who had so wilfully refused them) how gently they had dealt with them in time past, they made a decree which continueth till this day, That all marchandize passing between the Gulphe of Faana, and the mouth of the Riuier Po, should pay a certaine tribute to the Common-wealth; And to this purpose should come to Venice where their merchandize should be rated, if it so pleased the Officers thereunto appointed. And to prevent all deceit herein, they created a new Magistrate, who had certaine ships of warre appointed him, carefully to looke to the Sea-coasts: This caused (for it was likely that the Neighbours at the first report of this new Edict would oppose themselves against it) the league to be renewed with the Pisans for five yeares.

Truce granted
between the Venetians and the Genoueses.

About the same time the Genoueses and the Venetians, as well in their owne name as the Pisans their associates, made a truce by means of Philip the French King, who succeeded Lewis, being then greatly desirous to relecue the distressed French-men in Syria. Wherewith (as it is reported) he was so greatly affected, as he kept with him at Cremona the Ambassadors of either of these people so long, sometimes entreating the one, and anone exhorting the other, appealing and promising so much, as at last all sort to his owne desire: And this was the eleuenth yeare (according to some Authors) since the beginning of the warre against the Genoueses. Now there are some other Venetian Historians, who seeme to augment this number, saying, That Rayniero Zeno ruled seuenteen yeares. Others set downe only sixteene, and affirme, That the warre beganne at Ptolomais in the beginning of his Principallitie, which was the yeare of our saluation 1260. and continued till the time of Lorenzo Tepulo. But in my opinion this incertaintie of times hath chiefly hapned through the negligence of Writers, who for want of due obseruation haue (perhaps) attributed longer time to Zeno than he reigned. Or else it may bee that the warre was not commenced in the beginning of his Principallitie. For their confusion herein is so great, as a man can hardly discern the truth of the matter: wherefore, following the opinion of Blondus, a most exact obseruer of times, I thinke that this first Genoa warre endured but eleuen yeares.

New warre against the Bolognians.

Now truce being concluded with the Genoueses, the Venetians had new warre in Lombardie. Those of Bologna, who at that time possessed the greatest part of the Countrie of Flaminia, being grieved that by the new decree of Impost lately, as aforesaid, made by the Venetians, their Merchants were excluded from their traffick, prepared with all secrecie a new warre, to open them a passage for their nauigation. Being therefore readie to set forward, they sent their Ambassadors before to Venice, who, concealing their warlike preparations, should treat with the Venetians about the abolishing of that Decree, and dismissing of their Garrisons on euery side, to the end that their Merchants might haue free passage. Wherunto if the Venetians should refuse to consent (as it was likely they would) they were without other termes to denounce warre. Tepulo soone discovered the fraude of the Bolognians: Whereupon he fell to his subtilties, which were no lesse politick than theirs, and speedily sent out nine Gallies to prevent the enemy. It was most certaine that he who could soonest discover the others policie, and first seize vpon the place, would make all things after very difficult for his enemy. Wherefore the Venetians came with speede to the mouth of the Po, which is called Primario, neare to Rauenna: where at their arriuall perceiving the Bolognians to build a Fort on the other shore, they likewise with speede seized on S. Alberts, which they instantly fortified by helpe of the Souldiers.

The Bolognians
ered.

Within few daies after, Prince Tepulo came thither with Sea-forces, the better to restrain the enemies attempts: There, and in other places they often fought with great effusion of blood; and the Bolognians did still for the most part preuaile, in regard of their great numbers. For their Armie was reported to be fortie thousand fighting men, and all of the same Prouince: which the Celtique Gaules had in part possessed, possessed, (a most warlike race and almost not to be conquered) and in part the Senonians, (who for certaine Moneths held the Citie of Rome) which was after ward called Flaminia, and at last Romagniola. Whereby may bee coniectured that the same Prouince doth not at these daies bring forth men wholly different from those whom it nourished in former times, but very courageous, and of great spirits, and such (in a word) as it was not said without cause, That a red Italian, a blacke German, and one of Romagniola with his haire of two colours, are commonly froward fellows.

Now, this dangerous warre was drawne out at length, till the third yeare after, when at last they fought with all their forces, vnder the conduct of Marco Gradonico, where the victorious Venetian brake and defeated the enemy with great losse. The Bolognians hereupon being discouraged, sued for peace, which they obtained on these conditions, That hauing ouerthrowne their Fort at Primario, being permitted to carrie thence certaine things with them, they should leaue the entrance of the Po, free to the Venetians.

The Anconitans, by the example of those of Bologna, durst attempt to take arms: and sent to Pope Gregorie the tenth to complaine on the Venetians. The Pope entreated the Venetians not to stop their nauigation: This entreatie they did neither obey nor resist, But because they would not seeme (against their custom) to contemne the Popes commandement, they sent Ambassadors to him, who alleging now one thing, and then another, said, that the Anconitans had not done well, by false reports to traduce the Venetians before the Pope, and that their accusations were vntrue; These and such like allegations of the Venetians, by little and little ended the matter: And the Pope herein was so farre off from conceiuing any displeasure against them, as hee rather procured the truce before then concluded at Cremona betweene them and the Genoueses, to be renewed for two yeares more.

These things thus succeeding in Italie, certaine Lords of Nigrepont, who as yet possessed the third part of the Island, contrary to the will of Andrea Dandolo, Gouernour of the Island, with sixteen Gallies invaded that part of Asia the lesse, which then was vnder obedience of Paleologus: from whence hauing carried away great bootie, they prouoked this Prince to warre vpon them. So soone therefore, as his Armie was readie he came to Nigrepont and besieged Orca. The Lords of the Island, to free their people from the siege, came with twentie Gallies to draw the enemy to fight: wherein being broken and put to flight, Paleologus, in a manner, bereft them of all their fleet, and brought away diuers of the chiefe as prisoners. But five hundred Venetians, found in the fleet of those Lords, hee committed to his Lieutenants, to bee sent home to Venice, with commandement to renew the league for five yeares following.

I cannot but exceedingly meruaile, in that it is said, that those Lords of Nigrepont made warre on Paleologus, against the will of Dandolo. Those of the Island might, perhaps, refuse to obey the Magistrate, but that the five hundred Venetians, who were found (as hath beene said) in the fleet, should so doe, is very vnlkely. Let them, which so report, consider by what means the same could possibly come to passe.

On these termes stood the affaires of Venice at such time as Tepulo deceased, the fifth yeare of his government: who was buried in the Church of the Twinnes, in the monument of his Ancestors. Giacomo Contareni was chosen in his place.

GIACOMO CONTARENI, the
47. Duke of Venice.

The warre like to have beene renewed with the Genoueses.

AT the beginning of his gouernement it was likely that the warre would haue beene renewed with the Genoueses, because an Argozie of Venice laden with merchandize, was taken by two of Genoa. It was supposed to haue beene done by the publike command, and therefore they beganne to prepare a new Armie: yet neuertheless they determined (following the custome of their Ancestors) to demand first of the Genoueses, in the name of the Common-wealth, that which had beene taken from them, which if they refused to doe, it was not questionable, but that the Venetians would vse all manner of hostilitie. The Ambassadors, who for this purpose were sent to Genoa, after they had receiued what had beene taken from them, returned soone after to Venice well satisfied, where finding the whole Citie prepared for a new warre, they freed them from all care, in bringing them home peace from Genoa.

the Anconitans.

The popular sedition which happened in the Citie in the time of Tepulo, by reason of the impost on the Mills, was wholly extinct vnder this Princes gouernment. But things being thus pacified at home, a new warre sprung vp abroad. The inhabitants of the Cape of Histria, of whose affection towards them the Venetians had better conceived than of all the rest in that Prouince, were sodainly reuolted. Whereupon perceiving the Sea and Land to clatter with the sound of the Venetians Armes, they sent to Forli, to entreat the Patriarke of Aquileia, in regard of the mutuall amitie, to come to the succour of a Neighbour-Citie, and to take Armes to repell the Venetian who highly menaced them. He being moued with the request, in hast leuied forces and sent them to their aide. The Histrians at lying on beds succours, attempted by diuers meanes to diuert the Venetian from the siege. But neither those, nor yet their owne forces, did greatly auaille them; for being vanquished, they were constrained to returne to the Venetians obedience; Rayniero Marsino was sent Gouvernour into the Prouince to containe them in their dutie.

The Venetians being freed from the warre of Histria, were sodainly troubled with that of Ancona; and yet I know not whether this beganne before the other was ended. For the Annallists handle this matter so confusedly, as wee can hardly tell what to beleue of it. Besides, very few Historians make mention of this warre of Ancona: And they which doe mention it, say, that the Venetians besieged Ancona in the time of Pope Iohn the one and twentieth, whose Papacie lasted no longer than the first yeare of Prince Contareni his gouernment. They affirme moreover, that the warre beganne vpon occasion of the decree for the new impost, made certaine yeares before, which to abolish they had made meanes to Pope Gregorie, but without effect. The better therefore to annihilate this decree, they caused certaine merchandize to be secretly transported into the Sea of Histria, and to other places neare to the entrance of the Riuer Po. The Venetians being therewith incensed, (for the Anconitans abusing their lenitie and patience, became daily more insolent) forthwith armed sixe and twentie Gallies, to the which they added certaine ships of burthen for carriage of victuals and munition, with all other things necessarie for the siege of a Citie. But before they made this warlike preparation, it is to be supposed that they sent to demand their custome of the Anconitans, which was denied them. The Venetian at his first arriuall did furiously assaile the hauens, from whence being beaten backe, and the fleet hauing no place of safetie to ride in before the Citie; nor being yet come to an Ankor; there arose a terrible tempest, which did cast and beate part of their vessels in peeces vpon the Neighbour-shore. Sixe Gallies striking vpon the Rocks of Senegaillo, were wholly lost, and the residue of the fleet being driven forward by violence of the tempest ranne vp into the maine. Afterwards new forces, with supplies of ships and Gallies, were sent from Venice, for whom (sailing at Sea) the enimie laid a new kinde of Ambush. Hee set vp the Venetian ensignes on his Gallies, which he had taken from them at the assault of the Hauens, framing in the best manner he could, the rest of the tackling after the Venetian fashion. Then from as farre as he might discerne them, he beganne with great ioy and clamour to haile them as their friends and companions. By this policie on a sodain they grappled with two of the foremost which they took, and dragged to the Citie, to the great contentment of the Inhabitants: But we doe not finde who commanded the Armie at the same time. Howbeit, it is certaine that by his negligence and want of experience in martiall matters, the Venetians receiued two great ouerthrowes in short time, and that for his labour, hee was called home from the Armie, and committed to prison.

They did better afterwards than at the first. For they resolved to tame the stubbornesse of the enimie by a siege: whereupon within a few daies after, Ancona was againe besieged. At which time the inhabitants fore-seeing what might happen, and that by the persuerance of their enemies they might fall into some manifest danger, they sent to Pope Nicholas the third, newly elected; to animate him against the Venetians, and to acquaint him chiefly with that which their enemies had till then done to them, and did daily more and more; and besides, to declare vnto him, that they had already by the Venetians means endured all the miseries, which those who were a long time streightly besieged, were wont to sustaine, and they were likely to endure much more, if they were not speedily releued by some foraine aide: In regard whereof they besought his Holinesse to compassionate the miserie of so ancient a Citie, and so affectionate to the Church of Rome, and that it would please him to deliuer them from so great a danger.

The Venetian Ambassadors were come at the same time to Rome, to congratulate his assumption to the Papall dignitie: who, after they had a long time attended there, and not being called, as were others, to the publike congratulation, they doubting the matter, that the Pope by reason of those of the marches was offended with them, sent word thereof to Venice. The Duke and Senate taking it in bad part, did by their letters call home their Ambassadors, who being on their way from Rome, were by the Popes commandement brought backe, who, after he had sharply rebuked the Venetians for so streightly besieging the Anconitans, being feedaries of the Church of Rome, forbade the Ambassadors (who would haue defended the cause) to speake. It is reported, that the same day they returned to Venice, eight Gallies with supplies were sent to the Camp before Ancona: I know not whether it was done vpon necessity, or else in hatred to the Pope, for vising their Ambassadors with so small respect. The enimie thereby perceiuing, that in sted of raising the siege, the Venetian did more sharply oppresse them, abating their courage, they became suiters for peace. The matter being debated without any resolution, the Commissioners returned home without any peace: So soone as they were gone, they resolved to strengthen the Armie with foueteene Gallies; two of which stragling by the way were by the enimie surprisid, who lay in wait to catch what he could: Neuerthelesse, he bought his peace at no meane rate.

The Duke being alreadie old and decayed, not able for his age to attend the publike affaires, by consent of all men deposid himselfe, and soone after died: His funerals were great, and were followed by multitudes of people, to the Church of the Friars Minors, where he was buried. Giovanni Dandolo, then absent, was chosen in his place.

Some Authors affirme that vnder this Prince the peace was concluded with those of the Marches, because (perhaps) this warre ended at the beginning of his gouernment. They say besides, that it was expressly mentioned in the Treatie, that the decree of the impoit should remaine firme without any contradiction.

with the Patri-

About the same time the Sea did in such sort overflow the Citie as it was in a manner held for a prodigie: Whereupon, soone after ensued a great earthquake. They began likewise at the same time to stampe diuers sorts of golden coine in the Citie. A new warre was kindled against the Patriarch of Aquileia in regard of the Histrians, whom he especially maintained against the Venetians. Certaine people of that Prouince were revolted, whom the Venetian would reduce vnder his subiection, and to that purpose had sent an Armie into the Prouince. The Patriarch speedily came to their aide: but considering with himselfe that his forces were not sufficient to hinder the Venetian, he yielded without any further trouble, making shew for a while, that he desired nothing so much as peace: and thus in the meane space the Histrians were by little and little reduced vnder the Venetian gouernment. But this Patriarch so soone as he had ioyned his forces with those of Count Gorician, being strengthened with the new alliance of this Prince, he returned againe to disquiet Hiltia. These new commotions were followed with rebellions of diuers Cities. The Venetians hauing notice hereof were constrained sodainly to arme themselves and to re-inforce their Armie. It was commonly reported that the enemies Armie consisted of six and thirtie thousand men; among whom were great troups of horse. The rumour of so great numbers caused the whole Citie to bee verie carefull for the preparation of this new warre. They provided therefore a great number of ships of speciall choice which were manned with the third part of all such as were able to beare Armes.

H. Iulia.

The Armie being gone from Venice, and arriued in Hiltia, did sodainly encampe before Thrieste. For among others in this insurrection this Citie likewise did revolt. Now the Venetian resolving to besiege it, in few dayes built fundrie Fortes about it, furnishing them with strong Garrisons to hinder the enemies incursions. Afterwards with other Engins they began to batter the Citie; but hauing a strong Garrison within it it could by no meanes bee taken. Whereupon, because it was not for the Common-wealths profit to entertaine so great forces without action before the walls of Thrieste, hauing small hope to take it; and supposing the Fortes builded at their arriual to bee sufficiently furnished with Souldiers and viuals to continew the siege; the residue of the Armie marched into other places. But whether they went, or how they were imploied, the Authours whom we follow make no mention.

The Patriarche

Thrieste.

Not many dayes after, the enimie came thither, and at his arriual assailed the Fortes; which were not only well kept and defended; but those likewise which were within them hauing made a sallie vpon the enimie, skirmished fiercely neere to the Rampier where diuers on both sides were slaine, and among others, the Nephew of Count Gorician, a valliant and braue young man. The retreat being founded, truce was taken for a day. In the meane time Gordiano, a man of authoritie, and who till then had held an honourable place in the Venetian Armie was suspected of treason. The speech was that he had secretly practised with the enimie to yeeld the Forte vp into their hands. Being apprehended and put to the torture he confessed his wicked intent; whereupon the next morning by brake of day, he was tied hand and foot, and put into a warlike engin, wherwith he was throwne into the enemies Campe, who now perceiuing that hee could neither preuaile by force nor cunning, being out of all hope to surpris the Fort, hee returned without effecting any thing.

The enimie being gone, the Venetian troups returned soone after. Now whether they had retired themselves of set purpose because they would not fight with the enimie, whom they knew to be much stronger than themselves, and that in the meane time the fleet rode at anchor in the maine, or else in some haue hard by, vntill they had newes of the enemies retreat; or rather whether after they had left strong Garrisons in the forties to maintaine the siege, the rest of the Armie not willing to spend the time in one only place, went to besiege other townes not farre off; and that at the first reporte of the enemies coming, they returned to relieue their fellows, I cannot certainly determine. But the Venetian being againe returned to assaile the Citie, was beaten from the walls with great losse. The Armie afterwards departing thence, the siege was continued by those who lay in the forties vntill such time as they vnderstood of the enemies returne. Vpon the first tidings wherof they abandoned the same (whether through feare, or wearinesse to tarry so long in a place I know not) and retired themselves to their gallies. This is all (in a manner) that was done for two yeares space in Hiltia.

But in Syria the Venetians which were in Acre, made truce with the King of Babylon for two yeares, who had at the same time ruined Tripolie, a very famous Citie, and had caused Tyre, Sydon, and Berithon to vndergoe the same fortune. It is reported that hee made truce with the Venetians and the other Christians which were in Acre, to the end that his overmuch prosperitie might not stirre vp all Europe

Europe to take Armes against him. Howbeit the same did not keepe them backe: For Pope Nicholas by Letters and Ambassadors excited all the most famous Princes of Europe, to succour the afflicted Christians in Syria. And for his owne part hee made offer of fiftene hundred armed Horse: And for their passage into Asia, the Venetians offered him twentie Gallies, together with victuals for the Mariners, who were to be paid by his Holinesse: for the expedition of which businesse, the Bishop of Tripoli came to Venice.

The Venetians being moued at the Popes instant pursute, added to these twentie Gallies, which were promised, five more, armed at their owne cost, because they would not seeme carelesse of the affaires of Christendome; of the which fleet Giacomo Tepulo was declared Generall, with the Popes Legate. But the other Princes of Christendome not appearing, all this great preparation of Gallies and Armes, was to no purpose. For the time of the truce being expired, the King of Babylon hauing notice of what was done in Europe, sent his sonne with a great Armie to besiege Acre, who sodainly enuirt it on euery side with furious assaults: The Venetians with the Popes Souldiers, for a time did brauely defend it. But no supplies comming out of Europe, those which could escape by Sea slipping away one by one; the Citie was at the last taken by a few, spoiled, and razed downe to the foundation. In this manner was the Christian name wholly extinct in Syria, the year of our saluation 1290. and after that great and notable voyage vnder-taken by the meanes of Pope Urban the second, at that time when Ierusalem with a part of Syria was taken, one hundred ninetie sixe yeares.

Prince Dandolo, after all these miseries happened in his time, deceased (the tenth year of his Gouernment being scarce expired) and was honourably buried in the Church of the Twinnes. It is reported that his funeralls being ended, there arose on a sodaine a great tumult, and how the people flocking on euery side, vsed many threatnings and reprochfull termes to the Senators, and by name demanded Giacomo Tepulo for their Duke. This man being vertuous, and a louer of the publike peace, after he had sharply reprehended the peoples rashnesse, secretly departed the Citie, and came to Marroco; where he remained vnknowne, vntill (the tumult being appeased) Pietro Gradonico was by consent of the Senate declared Prince of the Commonwealth.

PIETRO GRADONICO, the

The Venetians & Genoueses compared to the Romanes and Carthaginians;

IN writing the Venetian Historie, diuers matters offer themselves vnto vs, so conformable to those of the Romanes, as it is not possible to see any thing more like, as well in counsell, traualle, accidents of fortune, as other fundie euents. But among all, which (as I haue said) are verie many, the Venetians warre with the Genoueses, seemes in my iudgement to haue great resemblance with those which the Romanes had in times past with the Carthaginians. For the neere neighbourhood (as it oftentimes happeneth,) did not beget that emulation which was betwixt them, nor was cause of the warre, because they were as farre distant one from the other, as is the spacious breadth of the Tirrhene and Libicke Seas betwixt Italie and Africke, by this meanes farre enough removed the one from the other. These in like manner, are not neighbours. For if we consider the breadth of Italie, we shall find the one to be so farre off from the other, without going forth of Italie, as it may be wondered at. For Italie as (Strabo saith) is a promontorie stretching from the Alpes, whose height on the North side extending towards the South, serues for a Rampier. It is besides watered towards the West with the Ligusticke and Tirrhene Seas, and on the East with the Adriaticke and Ionian Seas. And from thence the waues begin to mingle themselves together; and to make it more strong, they wouldaine shut vp the Alpes more closely, but it cannot be. In this deepe Gulph stands the famous Citie of Venice: On the other side, the Ligusticke Sea laboureth to hold fast the feete of the Appenine hills which it almost doth, and within this turning likewise lieth the Citie of Genoa, enuious of the Venetian greatnesse, in such sort as they are almost one opposite to the other. Prudent nature did set betwixt the two former a great valetnesse of Sea, which might serue for a barre, if they should at any time happen to invade one another, thereby to quench their mortall hatred, and coole their boyling furie: But to these she hath not alone opposed the breadth of Italie, but the very tops of the Appenine hills, stretching from Liguria to Ancona, from whence being beaten backe by the waues of the Sea, they soone turne towards the mount Gargan: then on a suddaine, as if they feared the Sea, they go on to the farthest parts of Italie, to subdue in a manner the waues which they haue so often often thinned. But neither the distance of Sea could restrain the wrath of the former, nor the difficult access of the Appenine hills that of these people.

The situation of Italy.

The distance betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses.

The Romanes held themselves descended from the Troians. The Venetians boast of the same originall. The Libians mingled themselves with the Phoenicians; and the Genoueses were likewise mingled with them. Emulation of great achievements did first stirre vp those men, and afterwards the desire of rule: And on these two points only hath the warre growne betwixt these people: Those for Sicilie, and these (as hath beene said) for the Citie of Acre. The Romanes who were victors, were often times in greater danger than the Carthaginians whom they vanquished. The Venetians haue runne the selfe-same fortune, notwithstanding that they haue wholly defeated the Genoueses. Those two Nations fought about one hundred yeeres together, with equall hatred, and oftentimes with equall forces: These likewise with great care and traualle haue long time fought with one another, so that like those men, these being wearied with the warre, haue at times giuen intermission to their Armes, but not to their enmitie. If the end were not like, yet neuertheless hath it not beene wholly different. That great Carthage was razed downe to the ground, and this proude Genoa, wanting further abilitie, hath at length giuen place to the victorious Venetian.

But the better to continue the discourse of these warres, which the Venetians had afterward with these proud people, we must first of all set down certain matters which some Historians haue formerly mentioned, to the end we may be the better enabled to quote the times which the confusion of Authors maketh otherwise doubtful, and withall to reduce those things to our memorie which haue formerly beene spoken vpon this subiect.

Gradonico at the same time commaunded Histria, when hee was chosen Prince of the Common-wealth. Being called home to Venice hee tooke possession of his charge, which hee beganne with diuine matters, commanding the day and feast of Saint Katherine to be yearly solemnized, vnto whom when he was but a priuate person he was much deuoted. I beleue that the Senat in fauour of the Duke did make a decree for this purpose; by means whereof this holie Virgin was afterward highly reuerenced in Venice, her feast being before that time but a working day. But it may be that he did it not so much for particular deuotion, as because he was (as some thinke) chosen vpon the same day.

It is reported that about the same time, Andrew King of Hungarie sonne to a Venetian woman of the familie of Morofini, and to Stephen the Kings sonne, came to Venice, where he was so farre off from contemning his mothers house, because it was a priuate familie in a free Citie, as hee would needes appropriate to himselfe the ancient Armes of the familie, by adding therunto only a white Crosse with a circle; to the end that by that difference, those of the same familie might be knowne from the other Morofini. Stephen his father was borne in Ferrara, whither his mother, daughter to the Prince of Ferrara after the death of her husband had retired herselfe being left with childe, but being come to age hee could neuer recover his fathers Kingdome, which was possessed by his neere kinsmen. And being desirous (as I thinke) to put himselfe vnder the Venetians protection, he married Therapsina Morofini, by whom he had this Andrew, who in time got title of Governour of the Kingdome; and afterward that of King. Some Authours referre the ruine of Ptolomais to these times; but the greatest part of them affirme that which we haue reported thereof in the precedent booke.

The truce being expired, the warre against the Genoueses was more fiercely renewed. But the Venetians good fortune was not so apparent in the next Ligusticke warre, as disastrous by the occurrences of the yeeres ensuing. For by how much more the power of both these people were alreadie manifest to every eye; by so much greater were the warlike preparations made by either partie. It was likewise euident that this their contention, was not about the simple possession of Ptolomais

From whence the Venetians are descended & from whence the Genoueses.

The Ligusticke and Lybick wars had almost one selfe same end.

Andrew King of Hungarie came with to Venice.

A new warre with the Genoueses.

Ptolomais, nor for a street or Church onely, but to acquire the absolute command or dominion at Sea. In this quarrell the Venetians were the first in field. But I thinke it was not in respect of the Genoueses assailing the Pisans at that time, who after they had taken the haven of Legorne from them, and burnt it, suncke diuers shippes of burthen full of flint stones and grauell in the haven thereby to take the vse of the Sea from them: For the Pisans forces had beene already before that time greatly weakened, chiefly by that notable losse which they sustained in the Isle of Lamel, where twelue thousand of their people were slaine or taken by the Genoueses, with the losse of fiftie and twentie Gallies. Now the Venetians, to draw the Pisans forth of this danger, who had in times past so faithfully releued them in the first Ligullicke warre, and to alter the course of the Genoueses victorie, made hast to get before them, with a great Fleet, (as some say) of three score and six Gallies which sailed to the Ponticke Sea vnder the command of Rogero Morosini, to spoile and destroy whatsoeuer belonged to the Genoueses. Others make mention of fortie six onely: and others affirme that there were no Gallies in this Fleet, but diuers shippes of all sorts. Their first charge was against those of Pera. This place neere to Constantinople, which I thinke was at the same time but a village, had beene fortified by the Genoueses, and was much frequented by Genoa Merchants trafficking the Ponticke Seas, who for the neere neighbour-hood thereof to Constantinople and for transportation of their merchandize to and fro had the commodiousness of the place in singular recommendation. Whether they had then determined to doe that which afterward they did, to wit, to enclose that place with ditches and walles, knowing how fit it was not onely for the vse they then made of it, but likewise for the warre, I confesse my selfe ignorant. This place therefore being not yet fortified, was soone taken by the Venetian and consumed to ashes. From thence the Armie sailed to the old Forts which the Genoueses held, which being take were for the most part burned. The Genoueses in the meane time laie quiet without action. Giovanni Souranza the next year following was commanded to holde the same course with fiftie and twentie Gallies. At his arrival he tooke the Citie of Capha by assault in Cheroneffus of Tauris: where being overtaken by winter he was constrained to tarry. In this countie being extreame cold (for it doth not onely incline to the northward, but lieth directly vnder it) he lost nine companies of Souldiours with the extremitie thereof, and the residue of his Armie likewise was greatly afflicted. The fennes Meotides which are not far thence, together with the Cymerian Bosphorus, are so congealed with extreame cold, as it is most certain that in those places where in Sommer men fight with Gallies, in Winter they combat on horse-backe on the Ice.

A wonderfull winter in the fennes Meotides.

The fleet of the Genoueses in the Adriaticke Sea.

The Genoueses likewise thinking it time to be stirring, sailed into the maine with three score and six Gallies, or three score and ten (according to some Authors) vnder the conduct of Lampadio Doria: who desirous to reuenge the losses receiued on the Pontick Sea, entring tumultuously into the Gulph of Venice, had directly come to the Citie, if vpon report of the coming of so great a Fleet, they had not bin encountered by the Venetians with greater forces than at any time before. The Venetians at the same time hauing foure score and fiftene Gallies, and understanding that the Genoueses were at Corfu, sailed thither with an intent to fight with them. For now being in number of vessells superiour to the Genoueses, they would not refuse the fight, being thereunto also encouraged by remembering what had passed in former expeditions: They knew well enough that they were to fight against the same enemy, whom they had vanquished in the battaile betwixt Tyre and Acre: And the remembrance of that notable victorie at Trapani, did more animate them, where though they were much inferior to the Genoueses, yet in a manner they had broken them: neither did they forget how often the Genoueses (who at that time did so greatly desire the fight) had shamefully fled from them; whereupon they openly said, That the enemies did not shew themselves so desirous desirous of fight, for any assurance they had of their owne forces, or for that they were ignorant of the Venetians valour, but only through their owne naturall obliuion, the which at last, by right or wrong, would overthrow them.

The Genoueses on the other side hardly digested, that in the former warres they had seemed at times to strike faile, and to yeeld to the Venetians, Beides, a frein griefe at wrongs receiued on the Pontick Sea, for the space of two yeares, did greatly moue them; but nothing did so much animate and encourage them, as for that about the same time they had so abated the power and forces of the Pisans, as they (who not long since had been verie mightie) had nothing left them besides the bare shadow of their ancient name. With these hopes and encouragements, both parties came brauely to the fight. Carolo and Andrea Dandolo (as discreet as valiant) commanded the Venetian Armie; who hauing omitted nothing which might helpe to the obtaining of the Victorie, did boldly and valiantly receiue the enemy coming towards them. In the beginning the fight was doubtfull, and the slaughter verie cruell, such indeed as could not but happen at the encounter of two fo mightie armies: There was nothing heard but the frightfull clamours of mariners, and souldiours, encouraging one another: All the Sea rang with the noise of broken vessells clashing together. Thus the battaile lasted a certaine space with great slaughter: but at last the Venetians were defeated. And the victorious Genoueses holding them streightly to it, filled euerie place with blood and ruine. All the Venetian Historians (one only excepted) confesse that the losse of this battaile was verie great, and that the Venetians Nauie was wholly defeated and lost. But all of them iointly conceale the number. Whereby wee may rightly presume, that of so great a Fleet scarce one vessell was saved (which is credible enough) or verie few. The fore-excepted Authour setteth downe the matter somewhat more at large. For hee (quite contrarie to the rest) saith, That the Genoueses, being beleeged by the Venetians in Corfu, would haue deliuered all their shippes of warre to the Dandolo's so they might haue beene suffered to depart thence with liues and baggage; And that vpon deniall, their feare turning to despair, they ioined battaile. At which time the Genoueses ioining pollicie with force, laid fiftene Gallies in ambush, which coming forth vpon the Venetians in the heat of the fight, did (without all doubt) giue them the victorie: moreover, that six Genoa Gallies, and two and thirtie of Venice did not fight, which either for feare, or (according to others) being driuen an other waie by force of the winde, could not come neere the fleet, but that the residue did fight brauely, where manie more Genoueses than Venetians were slaine; so as at the beginning the Genoueses had the worst, and were readie to flee, if the fiftene Genoa Gallies coming forth of their ambush with great noise, had not restored the battaile, & put the Venetians to rout. Four thousand Venetians were taken with Andrea Dandolo one of the Generals of the Armie, who with sorrow and shame; during the time that they carried him prisoner towards Genoa, did strike his head so often against the Gallies side, as hee died by the way. Riccardo of Ferrara writes, That the Genoueses fought there with foure score and eight Gallies, and that thirtie Venetian Gallies escaped from the battaile, hauing kept aloofe from the beginning of the fight: likewise that fiftie thousand prisoners were brought to Genoa: where by reason of the great slaughter of their owne people, they shewed small ioie for the victorie, so as it was reported euerie where, that the Genoueses had lost more at Corfu than the Venetians.

This was the successe of the battaile in Dalmatia. The report of this losse brought great feare and sorrow to the Citie. But the feare of imminent danger caused, that (all griefe being laid apart) they determined speedily to raise new forces, thinking that the victorious enemy (no armie being in readinesse to beat him backe if he should saile towards Venice) would be shortly roaring at their gates: But I thinke hee went forth with into Greece, or rather home, because wee finde not that the Genoueses after the battaile of Corfu, performed any warlike action at Sea, or in Dalmatia.

Now

A new Army of
the Venetians.

Now the Armie being furnished, fearing least the Island: and Sea-towres of the Ionian and Aegean Seas should be vn furnished of Garrisons, five and twentie Gallies were sent thither vnder the command of Marco Bassio. These likewise kuffling with the enemies on the Hellespont, called at this daie the streight of Gallipolis, the issue thereof proved as vnfortunate, as the other at Corfu: The fight is reported to haue bene cruell, and that after great effusion of blood, the Venetians good fortune altered, and how they lost sixteene Gallies, with their boates and mariners, who were taken by the Genoueses, and how the rest scatteringly scaping from the midst of the throng, speedily fled out of the Genoueses sight. This new losse was much lesse than that at Corfu, by reason they did not fight with so great number of vessels. But, like as to an ill-disposed bodie, euerie access of an ague (how little soeuer) is verie dangerous: euen so this new sorrow which followed the other at the heeles, did meruailously afflict the Venetians: and because the publike good fortune should bee else where as successeful, the victorious Genouese loone after the battaile of Hellespont sailed into Candie, where at his arriual heooke the Citie of Cydon. But in the midst of all these misfortunes, the Venetian was not discouraged. For after he had oftentimes renewed his forces, he fought sundrie times with the enemy with different successe.

But neither the Historians whom we follow, nor the Annalists make any mention, in what place, or at what time, or with what successe it happened: so as we may truly saie, that no remarkable thing was done all the rest of this warre, other than that which hath bene heretofore spoken of. All Authors with one voice affirme that after all these reciprocal losses, receiued on either side, hauing in this cruell war (almost) wasted their forces, the minds of either parties inclined to peace, rather of necessitie, than any true affection. For though their Armes were sequestred, their hatred still continued. Albeit the Authors whom we follow make no mention how long this Ligusticke warre lasted, neuertheless I gather by diuers obseruations, that it lasted not halfe so long as the former. Yet sure it is, though it were much shorter, it was more cruell: whereupon (as hath bene said) both parties did willingly listen to a peace, not with an intent wholly to lay by their Armes, but only because at that present they could doe no more. Now the Common-wealth being wearied with so manie garboiles, and scarcely freed from this warre, was assailed by two dangerous conspiracies of her owne Citizens: But as the Authors thereof were different in qualitie; so was the danger nothing like. For as the one was acted by people of meaner condition than the other, it was likewise the more easily broken; Such was that of Buconio, which happened before the other of Tepulo, being much more cruell.

There dwelt in the Citie at the same time one named Marino Bucania, who was neither of the Senators degree, nor yet of meane estate, but holding a middle ranke, and other waies audacious and prompt to all mischief. This man being impatient of the publike libertie, or rather of the quiet which the Citie then enioied, determined with himselfe to kill the Prince, and some other principall persons of the Senate. Being thus resolved (in regard he durst not undertake it alone) he imparted his designe to diuers of his owne qualitie, whom he knew of a long time to haue participated the same discontent, who without any more delaine approued the deed, and freely promised him their assistance. It is most certain that they had determined to kill the Prince and diuers of the Senate. But it is not knowne whether they did it to vsurpe the Segniorie, or else for enuie to see Gradonico in such a dignitie, who some yeares before had been elected by the Senators against their wils, and therefore had determined to smother him with the Authors of his creation. This conspiracie being discovered to the Prince, did greatly amaze him: but the danger neerly concerning him, he had no greater meanes speedily to quench it, than to seize on the body of Marino and his complices, who being taken and conuicted of the deed, were according to their deserts hanging betwixt the two Pillars.

New attention with the Paduans.

There happened againe certaine strife with the Paduans, who had fortified a place in the Lakes, which lie betwixt Chioggia and Albana, named Parabubula. For it is certaine that the Paduans intended to loone as they should haue builded the Fort, and left garrison therein, to make goodly salt-pits thereabouts in despite of the Venetians. But the Senate hauing sent certaine troupes of souldiers thither for the purpose, did forthwith raze the Fort. The Paduans tooke this heinouly, but daring not to stirre at that time, they did for a while shew themselves neither friends nor enemies to the Venetians.

Some Authors write, that at the same time they made warre on Paleologus Emperour of Greece, because he refused to pay the Venetians a great summe of money which he ought them, but they tell not how that money was due: The fleet being readie for this purpose, (the supplies of Candie and Nigrepont being comprized therein) was of seuen and twentie Gallies, whereof Iustiniano was made Generall, who speedily sailed into the Ponticke Sea, where he tooke diuers Grecke ships (I know not whether it were by fight or surprize) and hanged vp all the Greekes that he found in them, because (as I thinke) by their malice the Venetians and Baldwin were certaine yeares before driuen from Constantinople. From thence spoyling all along the Sea-coast, which lieth from Pera to Argire, he put all to fire and sword, whereat the enemy was so amazed, as hauing paid the summe which was due, he returned to Venice with fiftene thousand prisoners.

This victorie had in some sort restored the Common-wealth, which languished after the losses receiued in the second Ligusticke warre, and by her home-bred conspiracie, with hope of better fortune hereafter: at what time the troubles of Ferrara did throw it headlong into a greater danger. It came to passe by the Emperours ouer-long absence out of Italie, that diuers new Lords had seized on the most famous Cities of Cis-alpine Gaule, as those of Escalla on Verona, the Gonsagos on Manua, and those of Este on Ferrara. VVhose ancestors three score yeares before this happened, hauing driuen Salinguerra from them, did in the Popes name gouerne the Cities; then being become masters of Modena, and of the places neere adioyning, their power increased in such sort, as Charles the second, King of Naples, married his daughter Beatrice to Azzon of Este, who at that time was verie famous. This man had a bastard named Frisco, whom he had by another mans wife, who the same yeare that his father married Beatrice, surprized him by ambush, and shut him vp in prison where he died. Azzon being dead, this detestable young man being fauoured by the Bishop of the place, and by certaine Ferrarois, would haue assured to himselfe the principalltie of Ferrara, gotten by parricide, and seizing almost on all, could not make himselfe master of the Castle which was seated on the riuer of Po, on Bologna side. To besiege the which (because that without ships he could not o-uercome the garrison within it for the neere neighbourhood to the riuer) he had recourse to the Venetians: and hauing receiued a fleet from them for his aide, he did straightly besiege the place, so as the Venetians being encamped on the water, there was some likelihood that it would soone yeeld. The Popes Legate who lay then at Bologna, so soone as he vnderstood what had passed at Ferrara, sent speedily to the Venetian General, and earnestly entreated him to desist from his enterprise. And by chance as the Legates messengers arriued, a furious assault was given the Castle, which was the cause, that by means of the noise of Armour and shot, they could haue no audience. The Ferrarois in the meane time being moued (as it is to be thought) by the presence of the messengers of the Popes Legate, and being diuided among themselves, cried out that they would relie vpon the Legates promise, whereupon followed a great tumult of such as fauoured the partie of the Church, and their owne libertie: This sodaine alteration of the inhabitants, did greatly trouble the rest, and principally Frisco: But the Venetians were so farre from being amazed with this new tumult, as on the contrarie hauing on a sodaine fired the Ferra-

rois ships, which the tyrant had assembled to besiege the castle, & given a more sharp assault, they ceased not, till having broken the bridge they entered the Fort of Thealdo : Frisco being incensed against the Ferrarois, for that they had so sodainly forsaken him, sent from the strongest places horsemen into the Citie, who set fire thereon in diuers parts. The townesmen then seeing themselves inuironed with Armes and fire: so soone as the tumult was appeased, they submitted themselves to the Venetians, making no mention of Frisco, whom they hated to the death. So soone as they yeelded, they had no more outrage done to them.

to the venetians.

The Venetians albeit they would willingly haue kept the Citie for themselves, which they had receiued vnder their protection, neuertheless because they would not seeme to breake their promise with Frisco, they kept him in the Citie : Pope Clement who was then in France, after that he had vnderstood the misfortune of Ferrara, being vexed to see a feudatary Citie of the Church of Rome to be so vnworthily handled by a tyrant, and at last made subiect to the Venetians, he forthwith employed spirituall Armes against them, and excommunicated them, publishing ouer all Europe, that it was lawfull for any man to kill the Venetians wherefoeuer they could finde them, as being excluded from the Communion of Christians, and enemies to the Church of Rome. This doe the Annales make mention of. But that which strangers write thereof, as it is more gentle, so is it likely to be more true; That the Venetians were interdicted from the vse of the Sacraments: his Holiness adding that any man should do wel, who hauing any Venetian prisoner, should sell him as a slaue. This was the cause that in all the faires almost of France, the Venetians marchandize of great value, whereby commandement of the Princes and Lords miserably spoiled: As likewise in Calabria, and the marches neere to the Sea. In such fort as the Venetians hauing euerie where lost all that they had, were verie badly intreated, and some of them likewise slaue. Whereupon it happened during that time that they abtained from trafficke with strangers.

The Citie of Ferrara recou-ered by the Popes Legat.

The Popes Legate in the meane time, after he had leuied great troops, and receiued certaine companies of horse from the Florentines, marched to Ferrara against the Venetians and Frisco. The townsmen at the first newes of the coming of the Papall Armie, reuolted from the Venetians, and let the Legates troopes (who were at their gates) into the Citie: The slaughter was great on both sides, but much more on the Venetians, who being chased by the great number of the enemies, did speedily enter the Fort of Thealdo. The towne being recovered, the Legate sodainly commanded to besiege the Castle. The Venetians (notwithstanding that they had already sent to the Pope to treat with him about the yealding vp of Ferrara, and that the businesse could not sodainly be effected in regard of the distance of the places) fearing to receive some greater losse, did freely yeeld vp the Castle which held out with a strong garrison.

The conspiracie of Trepulo.

The Commonwealt being thus afflicted, was assailed by a cruell conspiracie, the which was likely to haue ouerthrowne both the libertie and the state. Baismonti Trepulo, issued from a noble and illustrious family, but bearing a diuelish minde towards his country, and such peradventure as did Catiline in time past to his, making vse (as it is to be thought,) of the times calamitie, wherein he perceived the commonwealt to be tossed vp and down with so many miseries, conspired against it, together with diuers of the same qualitie and meanes, whom he had dealt with, and made partakers of his designe. It is reported that they concluded at a certaine day appointed for the purpose to enter the Pallace by force with all their friends and confederates, and then, the Prince and Senators being in an instant murdered, to make themselves masters of the Commonwealt, and after the diuision betwixt then, selues of the lands and offices of the state, to exercise open tirannie. This mischief was accompanied by another, for that diuers of the common people, wonne by faire promises, or set forward by a desire of noueltie, were in pay with the conspirators, vnto whom it is not likely that so great a designe was euier imparted, but that there was made of some other matter.

Another opinion concerning the issue of the con-

It is reported that vpon the appointed day (as if heauen would be the foreteller of of so damnable an enterprize, there arose a horrible tempest, intermingled with haile and raine, the ayre being filled with lightning and thunder. But the conspirators making vse of this prodigious tempest, instead of being amazed thereat, ranne armed with great noise to the Pallace. The enterprize being a little before reported to the Prince and Senate in great feare, did much amaze them. The alarme was sodainly giuen ouer the whole Citie by men sent for that purpose, who cried out aloud, that it behoued all men to take Armes, and to runne speedily to the Pallace to the rescue of the Prince and Senate, if they desired to preserve the Commonwealt. They ran thither from all parts, but the conspirators in the meane time had filled the great and large market-place of Saint Marke with armed men, & without delay assailed the Pallace. Then the Senators (for diuers were with their weapons already runne to their rescue) did not only sustaine the conspirators assault, but did valiantly repulse them. There was a sore fight. Libertie was the make they aymed it: On the one side, these traitors had their weapons in hand against it: And on the other, the Prince and Senate would either die or preserve it. In troth it was a lamentable spectacle to behold a Citie founded in libertie, growne vp in libertie, to maintaine the which those ancient Venetian Fathers founders of the same, had so often fought with barbarous and cruel nations, and shed so much blood by Sea and Land, to haue at last taken Armes against it selfe, and to desire by those Armes to ruine it selfe, and to call that libertie in question among themselves, which all men esteemed so deare & precious. It is to be thought that this pretence alone held them in awe. The Senators by exhortations to defend it, & the wicked Citizens with shame, and reproche. And the fight ceased not vntill such time as the Senate getting the vpper hand, the conspirators were beaten backe from the Pallace. It is reported that in this tumult Baismont perceiving it not good for him to tarrie there, as he was going home to his owne house through the Mercers streete, a woman forth of a window threw a mortar on his head, with which blow he fell halfe dead to the ground, and being there stayed by his hurt, was slaue outright by those which pursued him, who soone after returned to the Pallace. Some of the conspirators which were Patricians by birth being taken on the Dice-bridge, and brought backe into the Princes presence were forthwith beheaded. Whereupon that place hath ever since borne the name of Maupas. And that the memorie of these wretches might be vterly extinct, it was decreed in all places to deface the Armes of Baismont and his complices: and that on paine of life no man to be so hardie as to keepe or set them vp in any place whatsoever. Their houses were razed to the ground, and all their goods confiscated: Some say that Baismont his Pallace stood in the same place, whereat this day the Hall of the shambles of Rialto stands. There was likewise a pension appointed out of the publicke treasure for the woman and her heires, who with the blow of the mortar slayed Baismont. The Citie was deliuered from this conspiracie (as some say) on the day of Saint Vitis the martyr, whereupon in memorie thereof euerie yeare on the same day, the Cleargie doe go in procession to Saint Vitis Church being accompanied by the Prince and Senate, to giue thanks to God for the preservation of the Commonwealt, and at their returne, a solemne banquet is made in the Pallace. Some Authors say that the issue of this conspiracie was different from that which we haue spoken of, and that the Prince was aduertized of the whole matter before they went to Armes. VWhereupon Michaeli and Guido Canuto were sent from the Senate to Baismont, to entreate him not to attempt any thing against his country, and that the conspirators did hardly suffer these men to returne with their liues. And after they had taken armes, and burnt and spoiled certaine places, they fought openly (as hath bene said) but at last the conspirators being roughly repulsed with great slaughter; the Senates partie proued the stronger: and that after the arriuall of Hagolino Iustiniano (who at the same time was Podestate of Chioggia, who came with troops of souldiers to the rescue of the Prince Baismont & his adherents (who fortified fortified themselves on the other side of Rialto) being daunted, did yeeld themselves vpon the Prince and Senates word, on condition, that all those who were guiltie should depart forth of the Venetian territorie, and by that meanes there was almost no Citie of Cisalpine Gaule, nor village on all the Sea-coast of Flaminia and Forli, wherein some of these banished conspirators were not. But the former opinion is most true.

Those of Zara presuming on these calamities did reuolt the sixth time, hauing chased away Michaeli Morosini the Gouverneur. They forthwith sent forces to recover it vnder the command of Belleto Iustiniano. In the meane time the Prince deceased in the twelfth yeare and ninth moneth of his gouernment. His bodie was honorably buried in Saint Cyprians Church.

Marini Giorgio surnamed the Holy, did for his wisdom succeed him. All the time of his Principallitie which lasted not a full yeare the Venetians were interdicted by the Pope by reason of the affaires of Ferrara, which caused the Common-wealth to receiue many discomforts as well at home as abroad. For we haue already said in what danger the conspiracie of Tegulo had put it: And then soone after, the Armie had no good successe before Zara.

Belleto was gone into Dalmatia with the Venetian troupes, among which were a thousand horse, who by the Senats appointment were commanded by Dalmasio a Spaniard, a valiant man, who being at Ferrara in the Popes paie, had constrained the Venetians to leaue the Citie, and to retire into the Castle with great losse. The Venetian Armie being encamped in the next Island to the Citie, this Dalmasio landed all his Cavallerie on the firme land, & encamped verie neere to Zara, fortifying his campe with good Trenches and Rampiers. Bannus commanded in the Citie with a good Garrison. He coming forth of the Citie likewise with his troupes, did lodge within a mile of Dalmasio. The whole Summer was almost spent without any memorable action: And Haruest already drew nere without any hope at to take the citie, when Bannus propounded certaine triuiall conditions of peace: which taking none effect, he beganne to vse his cunning, and dealt secretly with Dalmasio, to make him leaue the Venetians partie and to enter into the Citie, saying, That so soone as he should come thither, he should receiue ten thousand crownes, and should command

mand therein with great entertainment so long as he would; and that the inhabitants should defray his charges for come and all other necessities for his expence. And that when he should please to returne into Italie or else where, they would furnish him with shippes, for himselfe, his followers and their baggage.

This thus concluded. Dalmasio made shew to be wearie of so long a siege, and determined the next day to giue a generall assault to the Citie: then hauing imparted his deligne to diuers of his trustie friends, hee willed them that when they should come to the assault, they should secretly bring from the Camp whatsoever they made most account of, and should place it and themselves in the foremost rankes, to the end that without any impediment they might retire into the Citie. The next morrow so soone as he had put his troupes in battaile, and was come to the Citie, to enter it at the first signall giuen he, beganne to ride towards the enemies Fort, whereat the Venetians were much amazed, when to the great contentment of the inhabitants, he entred the Citie.

Dalmatio the Spaniard proueth a traitor to the Venetians.

All men did infinitely wonder (as hath beene said) of this sodaine change of Dalmasio, and were afraid least this perfidious Traitor had practized some worse matter against them, whereupon in haste, for that they would receiue no greater losse, (for it was to be feared that those of the Citie ioynd to the troupes which Bannus commanded not farre from thence would make some sallie vpon them) they retired all their Cavallerie to the shippes. Dalmasio being come into the Citie, and to shew that he was no fugitiue, but had some iust occasion to doe what he had done, would needs take vpon him the part of an vmpire to treat of peace betwixt the Dalmatians and Venetians: wherein after he had a while laboured, and perceiuing he could doe no good by reason of the difficultie of the Articles propounded on either side, knowing besides how the Venetians did hate him, for that he had forsaken them, and vnderstanding likewise that the inhabitants did suspect him, leauing off his negotiation of peace, and not desiring to endanger himselfe any longer there, he embarked himselfe in the vessells which were promised him by the agreement, and failed towards Apulia. But being in the maine Sea, a terrible tempest arose on a so daine, by the which being tossed here and there, and part of his shippes being dashed against the rockes, he lost his followers and his goods: receauing by this meanes the deserued guerdon of his treacherie. Hauing escaped ship-wracke, perceiuing all things to be contrarie vnto him, fearing with the losse of his meanes, to incur the danger of his life, without making any long stay there, hee shipt himselfe in a small boat, and went into Italie. The small time that the Principallitie of Marini lasted maketh me thinke, that the siege of Zara was not discontinued, but that it held out till they yeelded: which was (as I finde it) vnder Prince Souuerano. Marini in the meane time builded at his owne coast a great Church and Couent to Saint Dominicke, where he founded a Colledge for students in diuinitie: He built hard by that place an Hospitall which he endued with rich rents, to the end that those who should celebrate diuine seruice there, together with the sicke people, might be releued and entertained by the Procurators of Saint Marke, vnto whom for these purposes he left the managing of all his wealth. After these godly workes accomplished, he deceased the tenth moneth of his gouernment, and was buried in the Church of the Twines.

of Francisco
Dandolo.

GIOVANNI SOVRANZA a man of a verie ancient family, gentle & courteous, was chosen in his place: soone after his election, he receaued those of Zara vnder his obedience, but with such libertie & gentle conditions, as diuers thought, that thereby he ministred matter vnto them of a seauenth reuolt. Vittorio Michaelis was sent thither as Gouernor. About the same time the number of the Procurators of Saint Marke was encreased to six, being before then much lesse. It is said likewise that at the same time the foundations were laid at Capesalina as farre as the Church of the Trinitie: & that at the same time those of Nona, Spalatra, Trahu, and Sacca, returned vnder the Venetians obedience. The Citie, which till then was interdicted by the Pope, was freed from it by the most charitable affection of Francisco Dandolo sent for that purpose to his Holinesse. This man (as it is reported) being with great difficultie admitted to the presence of Pope Clement (who did infinitely hate the Venetians about the Ferrara businesse) by a wonderfull example of pietie towards his countrie, and with zeale to Religion, continued a long time prostrate on the ground before the Popes table, with an Iron chaine about his necke like a dogge, vntill his wrath being appeased, he tooke away that note of infamie from his countrie, whereupon, cuer since, hee was surnamed the Dogge, which title was giuen him abroad and at home, because he wastyed like a dogge with an Iron chaine to the Popes table. But if it be lawfull for Historians, to censure matters iust and vniust, and freely to vtter what they thinke thereof, we say that the act of Dandolo was not so religious, as that of the Popes was bitter, (I will not say proud) to suffer (not being moued therat) anoble man, sent from the most Christian people, the noblest of Italie, to entreate him to blotte out a publike infamie, to couch so long like a dogge at his feet. Sure I am, the example of our heavenly King (whose Vicker and Vicegerent he named himselfe) might haue moued him, who did not denie pardon to the miserable theefe, so soone as he demanded it. It may bee thought that the Venetians had endured miserie enough for seizing on the Castle of a neigh bour citie (though peradventure incited thereunto rather by the law of Nations, Frisco being their Allie, than vpon any promise or desire of bootie) hauing bene lamentably robbed and spoiled in all the faires of Europe, lost a great quantitie of gold, and (which is worse) diuers among them brought into bondage, and diuers likewise murdered. He satisfied his

haughtie wrath, with the infamous estate of this man. But whether he were satisfied or no by this act, politeritie neuertheless shall for euer much more extoll the patience of the one, than the ouer-great seueritie of the other: He dealt hardly with him (as I haue said) because it was in his power so to doe, and this man made a religious vse thereof, for that it so pleased him: Some peradventure, but not verie many, will approue the Popes deed; but assuredly all men will not onely preferre this mans pietie, but highly admire it.

The Citie likewise was not vnthankfull to him, but gaue him publicke demonstration, that it held nothing at so high a rate in her Citizens as meeknesse and clemencie. They were not long ere they recompenced him. For they dealt so carefully, that soone afterward, he who not long since was scene for his countries sake to endure shame and reproach, was inuested with the markes and enignes of the soveraigne magistrate. Clement, his wrath being appeased, shewed himselfe afterward truly meeke and clement. For, besides the abolishing of the interdiction, he decreed likewise, That the Venetians should neuer afterward be excommunicated by the Popes for the like occasion, or for any other whatsoeuer. And his pleasure was that this his declaration should be enregistred.

About the same time Iustiniano surnamed Iustinian, went to Sea with foureteene Gallies: Hee had commission to scoure the Sea and to meeete with elcuen Gallies of Genoa; (who as it was reported) had runne to diuers faires in Europe to reprice, and spoile the Venetians good: But being come to the Ponticke Sea, he drew neere to the Citie of Capha, where diligently enquiring whether the same were true which was reported of the Genoueses, he found it to be a false report giuen out by such as desired noueltie, and to see these two people at odds. The Genoueses who dwelt in that Citie, fearing vnder this pretence that the Venetian would hurt them, promised him by solenne oath all aide and assistance. Iustiniano thinking it most vniust to hurt those who had not offended them, without offering them any hurt brought backe his Armie safely to Venice.

This was done abroad. But in the meane time at home in the Citie, they beganne somewhat to enlarge the olde Arcenall, which being since then greatly augmented, hath bene in our daies so much enlarged, that the circuit thereof, being walled in, seemeth a farre off a little Citie, so that it may be more properly called a Repolitorie of all things, than an Arcenall: For, besides an hundred Gallies, which are there alwaies readie, & haue neuer yet wet Ankor, but are onely supported by their bridges, there is to be scene almost as many halfe made vp, and some of them almost made vp, with an infinite number of other small boates, and so great quantitie of all kind of Armor and munition, as a verie huge Armie may be easily furnished therewith.

Description of the Arcenall.

It is thought that about the same time a nauall Armie was sent forth for the guard of the Islands and Sea-coast of the Ionian and Aegean Seas, which neuertheless performed nothing worthe of memorie. Iustiniano who certaine years before had bene with a Fleet in the Cherfonessus of Tauris, was commanded the twelfth yeare of this Princes government to goe forth with fortie Gallies against the Genoueses: who failed into the Ponticke Sea, where he sunke diuers shippes of warre of Genoa to the number of foure and thirtie, who had invaded the dominions belonging to the Venetians. Those of Pera being danted at the ruine of their fellowes, and desirous quickly to fortifie themselves, filled certaine shippes full of earth and other weightie matter which they sunke before the Citie. Iustiniano neuertheless came and besieged the towne, and caused wooden castles and other engines of warre to be set vp in the shippes, to batter it. Which the Genoueses perceiving, and well weighing the great danger which threatened them, turning their defence to entreaties, they besought the Venetians to cease the batterie; saying that they would recompence the losses which the Venetians had sustained by them, together with the expence of that great Armie. On these conditions peace beeing graunted the Armie returned safely to Venice.

Much about the same time, or soone after, there arose a new rebellion in Candie. Iustiniano, who in the last voiage to Greece made an approach to Pera with the Venetian Gallies, commanded the Island. So soone as hee had leised all his forces against these new tumults, hee used such diligence, as in a moment he suppressed them, and reduced the fearefull Candiot to their former obedience. In the interim of these affaires in Grecia, they treated in Italie with the Paduans, about the turning back of the ordinarie course of the Brent into the Sea. The Paduans were at the same time molested by Maslin of Escalla. Wherefore the Venetians sought by all meanes to free them, as their neighbours, from this warre, quite forgetting the iniuries received from the Paduans in their aduersitie. For during the interdiction of Pope Clement, the Venetians neuer had worse enemies than the Paduans: And because since then, there had been no reconciliation between them, the Paduans, being vanquished by those of Escalla, were brought into bondage: But the Venetians neuer ceased, till they had driuen the Tyrant forth of the Citie, and restored the Paduans to their ancient libertie, committing the government of the Citie to Musilio Carrario, who afterwards did carefully cherish the friendship and alliance of the Venetians. This is all which happened abroad or at home during the Principalltie of Souzanza. Some neuertheless say, that in his time there was a conspiracie against the Common-wealth. But we finde no such matter in the principall Authors. His government lasted sixteene years and six moneths; and hee lieth buried in that Chappell of Saint Markes Church where the Font standeth.

New fires in Candie soone suppressed.

Francisco Dandolo surnamed the Dogge (as hath beene said) was chosen in his sted.

At the beginning of his government, victualls beeing verie deere in the Citie, hee dispatched certaine Gallies and shippes of burthen into Sicilie to fetch Corne vnder the conduct of Nicholas Phalerio, who brought home such quantitie of wheat, as in few daies (to the peoples great contentment) the scarcitie ceased. At the same time eight Gallies of Genoa took two of Venice, returning from France in trade of Marchandize. The goods within them were taken by the Gehoues: but the failers, and mariners (for that they must either die or bee taken prisoners) leapt into the Sea, and by swimming saved themselves on the neighbour-shoares: The Polani and the Valcians, who had bin along time subiect to the Patriark of Aquileia, did voluntarily yeeld themselves to the Venetians: whereat the Patriark being incensed, did speedily leue troupes of Souldiers to surprisethem: The Venetians on the other side (because they would not seeme to abandon those who of their owne motion had lately come to their obedience) sent great forces into Hiltia vnder the command of Iustiniano surnamed Iustinian. The Patriark of Aquileia, knowing himselfe not of force sufficient to withstand the Venetians, did without any memorable fight, resigne vnto them Polia and Valles, vpon certaine conditions whereof the Authours make no mention.

The Polani and Valcians brought under the obedience of the Venetians.

Agreement with the Patriark of Aquileia.

Six Genoa Gallies fought with eight of Venice conducted by Thomaso Viari, deputed for the guard of the Islands and Sea-coastes; in which fight the Venetian was defeated with the losse of five Gallies, and the other three escaped; and came home to Venice. With this losse the Senate was much displeased: who being informed that it hapned by the negligence of Viari, committed him to prison, where (as it is reported) he ended his daies.

Viari confined to perpetual prison. The great incursions of the Turkes.

The Turkes in the meane time not satisfied with driuing the Christians forth of Syria, by their ordinarie incursions became likewise Masters of the Sea, and had so spoiled the coastes of Candie, Ciprus, and Rhodes, as there was no safe sailing into the Levant.

The Venetians at the pursute of Pope Iohn the two and twentieth, had dealt with the French King, vnto whom were sent Philippo Bellegno, Blazio Zeni, and Morofini, to conclude a voiage against the Turkes. Some Annalles in sted of Pope Iohn set downe Pope Nicholas; but they erre greatly therein, seeing that from Pope Nicholas the fourth till that verie time, there was no Pope of that name.

In this Treatie made with the French King concerning the recouerie of Syria, and resisting the attempts of the Turkes, it was concluded, That he should send twentie thousand horse, and fiftene thousand foote; and that the Venetians should furnish an hundred vessells, among which should bee diuers Armed Gallies, with foure thousand Souldiours, and besides, diuers Marchant-shippes to carrie the victualls, munition and other necessaries for the Campe. But the French-men failing (for those Tramontani are held to bee slow and negligent in vndertaking such remote iournies, albeit they are valiant and courageous to execute haughtie enterprizes, and (which is most commendable in this Nation) are verie affectionate to Christian Religion) the preparation of this goodly enterprife by little and little vanished into smoake. The Barbarians waxing more insolent by this slacknesse, and negligence, did in a manner by their ordinarie incursions, keepe the Seas, as it were besieged. The danger neuertheless which daily increased, enforced the Pope and some Christian Princes to take Armes against them. The Venetians first of all set forth a great number of shippes, of which Pietro Zeni was made Generall. This man pursuing the Barbarians in all places, did with meruailous good successe free the whole Sea-coastes and the Islands neere to Syria, from the incursions and spoiles of the Turkes: Diuers others likewise did with good successe fight for Christendome with that cruell Nation; but cheefly the Venetians, who tooke from them an infinite number of shippes, when by Zeni his command all the Prisoners were forthwith hanged. Hauiug thus assured the nauigation, he brought back his victorious Armie to Venice.

at noone-dae for the space of three houres. Prince Dandulo caused a new coine to bee stamped, called Mediani. The power of those of Escalla was at the same time wonderfully encreased, in such sort as all men farre and neere ouer all Lombardie stood in awe of them: For besides Verona, Vincenza, and Bressia, which they before possessed, they had newly seized on Parma, after they had by treacherie driuen thence the Rossi: And they had already surprized Feitre, Beluna, and Ceneda from John King of Boheme. Treuiso likewise (according to some Authors, namely those which haue written the Venetian Historie) did obey them. Blondus neuertheless faith, That Treuiso belonged to the Venetians, at such time as they began the warre against Maſſim of Escalla. But I can hardly approue his opinion, because we do not finde that the Venetians did then possess any Towne of the firme Land: seeing if it were so, it would appeare in some sort, at what time, and in what manner the Venetians had taken so famous a Citie. For my opinion, The contrarie (reported by others) is farre more probable: to witte, That the Venetians tooke it in this warre which they had against Maſſim; whereof wee are to speake. They had likewise (to the end that nothing might bee wanting to their happinesse) subiected the Citie of Padua, a little before the warre began. For Marſilio, named by others Vbertino Carrario, being not able to preferue that Citie in her ancient libertie, by reason of their ciuill dissension, suffered it to fall into bondage; whereunto because hee had so easily consented, Escalla permitted the Carrarians to command the Citie in his name. Maſſim waxing proud with this good successe (following humane couetousnesse, which knowes lesse how to behaue it selfe in prosperitie than in aduersitie) resolving to disturbe the Venetians, speedily built a Fort in the lakes neere to Petabubula, which he manned with a strong Garrison. The Venetians, knowing whereunto his designes tended fortified a place likewise which they held, not farre from thence. Afterwards they consulted by what force or meanes they might tame and daunt this infestuous Tyrant, who hauing ouerthrown the neighbouring forces panted (as it were) with desire to master theirs. And therefore there was some likely-hood, that after he had assured his owne estate, he would forthwith make warre on the Venetians.

the warre with those of Escalla.

To preuent Maſſim of his purpose, (for hee was the eldest of all the familie of Escalla) the Venetians halted the warre. His forces, as they were the greatest of all his neighbours, so were they the most maligned: For worldly matters haue this properie, That there is nothing which so much procureth enuie and hatred, as too great felicitie. Although the number of those who enuied him were verie great, The Venetians neuertheless, had least cause of all men to looke after him, in respect that holding nothing as yet in the firme Land, they had till then satisfied themselves with being strong at Sea, not caring for more, esteeming their fortune great enough, in regard of their Sea-trafficke: This then being truth, the Venetians had no cause to feare the Tyrant, although his forces were terrible to others, as to Obisso of Este, Philippo Gonzaga, Azzo Visconte, and the Florentines in Tuscanie: who because he had taken the Citie of Luca not far from them, stood in great feare of his power.

Pietro Rossi of Parma, with his brethren, all valiant and braue men, were capitall enemies to the house of Escalla, for that Maſſim, vnder pretence of future alliance, had driuen them forth of Parma, & laid plots for their liues, which they hauing notice of, fled to Pontremolla, where Maſſim did straightly besiege them, at such time as the Venetians with others, confedered themselves against him.

familie of Escalla.

After diuers Ambassages sent from partie to partie, the Florentines and all the Princes of Transalpine Gaule, who were iealous of the forces of those of Escalla, joined themselves with the Venetians against Maſſim and his whole familie: But some Authours affirme that the Florentines alone did alie themselves at the beginning, and that the rest came after the warre was begun, John King of Bohem did likewise likewise ioine with them, for the recouerie of the Cities which were taken from him in Italie: Yet for all that the Venetians were the first motiues of the warre. It is reported that they neuer vnderooke warre with more courage, not for feare or enuie to them, being free from both these passions, (as hath beene said) but because they thought it well befitting people, borne in libertie, mightie and rich, to defend as well the libertie of others, and chiefly of their neighbours, as their own.

Were concluded against those of Escalla.

He league against the Tyrants being concluded, the Senate commanded that all those who were able to beare Armes, should be enrolled. It is reported that at the same time, about fortie thousand men, from the age of twentie yeares to threescore, were enrolled, with such willingnesse, as many of all forts and ages, did voluntarily follow the Armie, without any publicke or particular pay, but only pricked forward with a desire to extinguiish this tyrannic which was so neare them. Notwithstanding, they were not of opinion to assaile the enemy with all their forces at the first, but following their ancient custome, to beginne sleightly, and then to continue it feruently. Now, whilst these two mightie people of Italie were preparing their Armies, it is said, That vpon the report of this warre diuers ranne thither, out of France and Italie, to serue them, who being desirous to take the Venetians pay, after they had trauesed Tuscanie and Flaminia (the passages through Lombardie being shut vp) arrived at Rauenna. sooner lieth vnder the Alpes, (Bologna and Ferrara excepted) were against the Venetians. For neither Luchin Visconte who commanded in Milan, nor Philippo Gonzaga, had as yet shewed themselves to bee against Escalla. And albeit the Bolognians were at the same time diuided among themselves, and excommunicated by the Pope, because they had driven the Legate Apostolicall forth of the Citie, they did neuertheless freely suffer the Venetians, to leue Souldiers in their Territories, with whom soone after, they also ioyned their forces.

Ostasio Polentano, at that time Lord of Rauenna, affecting the Venetians, did willingly receiue the French-men, who arrived in the Citie, and sent them speedily in small boats to Venice. There was prouision made in the Citie, neare to the Church of Mendigotis (which is one of the farthest parts of the Citie) of lodging for those which came thither, and of victuals, and other necessaries, vntill such time as the Armie were ready to march against the enemy.

There liued at the same time Pietro Rossis of Parma, accounted among the Noblest families of Italie, a man most skillfull in martiall discipline. The Venetians (notwithstanding he was absent) elected him General of their Armie. This man albeit he was straightly besieged by Mastin, imagining neuertheless that the time was come, with other mens forces to reuenge the wrongs done to himselfe and his brethren, determined because he would not looke such an occasion (for the Venetians had already entreated him by letters to come thither) to passe in disguise through the enemies Campe, (not being able to escape thence by a forcible sallie) and to goe to Florence, and from thence to Venice.

There liued with him his wife, a very vertuous and chaste Ladie, who loued her husband dearly, and was not ignorant of his most secret affaires. Shee considering with her selfe, into what danger he exposed his life, and how great the attempt was which he vnder-tooke, casting her selfe weeping at his feete, entreated him after this manner.

The complaint of Pietro Rossis's Wife.

E Or Gods sake (deare husband) and by the lone and bond of Matrimonie, desist from this dangerous enterprise, and weigh with your selfe how your estate standeth, and in what place you leaue my wretched selfe with your Daughters. (It is reported that he had sixe Daughters, who comming all about him, drenched in teares, made the same request like their Mother.) Alas (said shee) what shall become of me, if thou being taken by the enemies ambush (which God forbid) I should lose thee, and of these poore wretches likewise, who besides God, haue none other hope but in thee? Doe you thinke the arrogant enemy will omit such an opportunity, or will not rather attempt by some sodaine assault, to winne both this place and vs, desist of thine aide? Who doubteth but he will soone winne all? But, alas, what shall then become of me, and these poore Wenches? Doe thou thinke they will spare the honour of thine, who haue not spared thy life? This vnruely enemy will leape for ioy, when he shall haue power to quench his hatred towards thee by the dishonour of thy Daughters; or else hee will command his Souldiers to torment them: He will spoile, robbe, and burne, those poore meanes which Fortune hath left vs. Who doubts but that then their condition will be better, which shall not lue to see any of these mischiefs. I poore wretched and vnhappie creature shall see it. But what did I say? see it? nay, rather shall feele what soeuer poore prisoners are wont to expect from a cruell and mercilesse enemy. If the feare of thine owne life moues thee not; thus at the least which I haue spoken ought to moue thee: All this which I haue spoken, I doe as verily beleuee will come to passe, as I hold that to be true which I see before mine eyes: Tarry then here still, deare husband, and with those small meanes thou hast continue to defend thy selfe and vs, let me entreat thee to put off thy journey till our affaires stand on surer termes. I hope so soone as the enemy shall haue notice that the Venetians haue entred his territories beyond the Po, that he will speedily depart hence, and then thou maist safely go to thy charge. Thus did she speake.

Pietro

clared General of the Venetians
armie.*

Pietro Rossis answered to his wife.

His husband being moved with her teares, albeit he was valiant and courageous, gaue her few words: he knew all that she had said was true, but to comfort her thus afflicted, & to put her in hope. He entreated her to be comforted, to hope the best, telling her that she should shortly see him returne with place of command: overthrow the power of those, who by treason had driven him from his dignitie, and had attempted against his life, and those of his familie. That he did verily beleene that the enimie would soone depart thence, but in the meane time he entreated her to remaine firme and constant, and to looke carefully to his children, and to the affaires of his house: As for the Guard of the Fort, he told her, that he did repose so much trust in the fidelitie and valour of his owne souldiers, as that they would sufficiently defend her, and maintaine the siege so long, as the enimie should at last whether he would or no be enforced to raise his campe: Besides, that he was of necessitie to make hast, lest he should seeme to contemne so honourable a charge. That the passing through the enemies campe was not so dangerous a matter as she thought: For diuers great Captaines had in times past, not onely gone through their enemies campe in disguise, but had likewise stayed there for a time till they had carefully enquired of the state of the enimie: He willed her then to cease weeping and lamenting, and no more to entreate him to the contrarie, because he was of necessitie to depart. He said moreover, that men being incited by vertue, did attempt diuers great enterprizes, but that necessitie made them to execute greater: And thus after he had recommended her, himselfe, his children, & household, to his friends whom he left in Garrison, he gaue order for his departure.

Rossis departeth in disguised habitt.

Rossis first exploit.

Pietro Rossis his first victorie.

Some Authors say, that he left one of his brethren to guard the place, and others thinke that he sent them before to Venice, where after that their brother was chosen General, they were made Gentlemen of Venice. Thus after that he had embraced all his people, about midnight he departed in disguised habite, accompanied with one onely faithfull and valiant friend, and went through the enemies campe to Florence, where he was receiued with great ioy of all men. But being diligent, and so an enimie to sloth, he would needs go vpon some enterprize. Whereupon soone after he marched with the Florentines forces to the countrey of Luca, where putting all to fire and sword, he rode with a few troupes, euen to the gates of the Citie, From whence carrying great bootie, and being come forth of the enemies countrey, into a countrey of safetie, he fell into an Ambuscado.

Fine hundred horse sent by Mastin to guard the Citie, sallied forth on the other side of the towne, and came galloping into a forrest, through which they knew the enimie must passe at his returne, where they ambusht themselves. As he returned, those of the Ambuscado breaking forth with great cries amazed those in the Vanguard, who conducted the bootie, and did defeat and put them to rout: diuers were slaine there, and the ensignes of the Vanguard taken. Newes of this encounter being brought to the Captaine, who led the Rereward, and diuers of those which fled being already come to their fellowes, saying that all was lost, Rossis being very quick and sodaine, after he had sharply rebuked them for their flight stayed them, and commaunded them to follow his ensignes, and take courage; then did he brauely receiue the enimie, who being ioyfull for his imaginarie victorie, came towards him. The fight began verie cruell, but the Captaines presence turned the feare of his souldiers vpon the enemies, who with great slaughter were defeated, and pursued to the Citie, where the bootie and ensignes were not onely rescued, but those of the enemies were taken, the which Pietro returning victorious to Florence, commaunded so to be dragged through the Citie. The victorie did greatly encrease his first reputation; there was nothing spoken but of his valour and prowesse; all men said that the vnbridled boldnesse of those of Escalla should by his conduct be in short time abated, iudging him worthie of the place which was giuen him.

In such reputation was Rossis: who being readie to march towards Venice, tarried for the troupes which the Florentines promised by their agreement to send, when as the Venetians in the meane time had begun the warre, but not with so good success as was done in Tulcan. Gerard Caminensis, an allie of the Venetians, having taken armes against those of Escalla, departed about midnight from the Citie of Metra, (commonly called the Morre) and seiled on Vderza. Mastin vpon report of the taking thereof (some say that it was Albert, who made this iourney) marched speedily with his troupes towards the enimie: and being come into the territorie of the Vderzans, he sent his best armed horse before the Citie, and himselfe with the residue of his troupes followed a farr off, with an intent to enclose the enimie if he came forth vnadvisedly to fight. These forerunners being come neere to the walles, were sodainly repulled by those of the towne, who neuertheless returned againe to the skirmish of set purpose to draw the enimie farr from the Citie. The which having done, and being come to the place of ambush, those of Escalla sodainly issued forth, and enforced the Garrison to flie towards the Citie: Then the horsemen by the tyrants commendement alighted, and assailing the Citie on euerie side, they greatly amazed those that were within, who were few in number, in respect of the largenesse of the place; so soone then as those of Escalla came to the assault, the Garrison distrustful their owne small number, forsooke the walles and fled: Then the assailed lants, after they had broken vp the gates, entred and flue the enimie in all places. There were few prisoners taken, and among others, Gerard made one of the number.

Want of a General.

Vderza being recoucted, the enimie marched towards Camino, which he likewise tooke in few daies, after that he had corrupted the Garrison with money: It is thought that if he had gone to the Morre, he might with ease haue taken it. But by his negligence which commonly followeth a great conquest, the souldiers wanting victuals and a warlike Leader to conduct them, running heere and there without observing martial discipline, forsooke their ensignes. The Venetians in the meane time stirred not. For Marsilio, who at the beginning came to Venice, deputed by his brother, was leauing forces, and being not yet strong enough, he durst not march against the enimie, for feare lest at the first he should commit some error. Some Authors affirme, that Marsilio was left by his brother in Pontremolle to sustain the siege. And the Venetian Annallists write, that he was at the same time in Venice.

Mastin begged peace of the Venetians.

Pietro de Rossis arriveth at Venice.

Mastin of Escalla sent commissioners to Venice to demand a peace, offering to withdraw his Garrison, and to raze the Fort which he had builded in the lake neere to Petrabubula. But they obtaining nothing of the Venetians, returned without any peace. Rossis in the meane time with fiftene hundred horse, namely eight hundred which he had receiued of the Florentines, three hundred from the Bolognians, and the residue of Obisso of Este, passing through the countrey of Ferrara, came to Chioggia, where embarking himselfe with a few of his followers, he came to Venice. A troupe of Senators at his landing went to receiue and gratifie him, and brought him directly to the Prince, who spake thus vnto him.

Enerow Pietro, thine excellent vertue so much renowned euerie where, hath bene the cause, that being to make warre on the Lords of Escalla for diuers injuries receiued from them, we haue esteemed thee alone among all the Captaines of Italie, worthie to assist vs, chiefly in so difficult a businesse. We haue thought it fit from the beginning to elect a General, to whose hands we might commit our forces to fight on the firme land. But according to the common report, we haue found no man, I will not say that surpasseth thee, (for that cannot bee) but that can in any sort equall thee, either in counsell or valour. We therefore haue chosen thee being absent, absent, and busied in a troublesome warre, to command all our forces: Being assured that it will come to passe if thou be such an one as all men report thee, and we hope that thou wilt prove, that so soone as thou shalt haue subiected vnto vs this proud enemy, thou wilt free both thy selfe and thine from this warre, and brauely reuenge all the wrongs which thou hast receiued from him. It is almost incredible to tell how great the hope is which we haue conceiued, that our affaires will prosper, hauing thee for our Generall in this warre, which hath as much reason to fight for vs as for thy selfe. It is no matter whether an enemy be ouerthrowne by reward or hatred. His ruine then being as profitable to thee as to vs, this our exhortation may seeme needlesse. We intreat thee neuertheless well and faithfully to gouerne what shall be committed to thy charge, as becommeth an associate and a good Generall. Opportunitye the mother of all things will shew thee time and place fitter for thy designs: And we on the other side will furnish thee with souldiers, victuals, munition, and abundantly with the principall sinne of warre, which is money. Take then these publike enignes which to thy selfe and to the Commonwealt likewise we pray may proue most fortunate, the which shall follow thee wheresoeuer thou shalt command, and thy souldiers them. And we beseech God to fauour thy proceedings, to the end that thou mayest bring them backe vnto vs, not onely safe, but victorious.

the enignes of Saint Marck.

So soone as Rossis had receiued the signes of his office, he answered in few words the Princes speech, leaving behind him a greater hope of himselfe, than if he had vied many words in his owne praise: and presently he departed with all his troupes. Blondus writeth that he came first to Treviso: thinking thereby that the same Citie was then subiect to the Venetians: Others thinke, that it was on the confines of Padua and Treviso: and some who are most worthie of beliefe (for the enemy then held all those places which they name) affirme that the Rendezous of the whole Armie was at the Montee. In that place he made the generall musters of his Armie, and found that he had, besides the succours of the Allies, foure thousand six hundred horse, and sixe thousand foote, besides great numbers of victuallers, souldiers boyes, and suchlike people which follow a campe. The Earles of Colalra, who before had held the partie of Escalla, came to the campe well accompanied, as did diuers others from the confines of Forli, from beyond the mounts, and out of Germanie, who being come thither vpon the report of this warre did greatly encrease the Venetian Armie.

Maslin, so soone as he vnderstood the departure of Pietro Rossis, and what he had done at the same time before Luca, whilste he remained at Florence, raised his camp from before Pontremolle, and resolved first of all to succour the Luquois, and to put a strong Garrison into the Citie, for he feared least his furious enemy should snatch that towne from him. But hauing notice that he was called to Venice, and learning by his spies what abundant warlike preparations the Venetians made, he speedily came to his Armie at Verona. Albert brother to Maslin, had in the meane time placed a strong Garrison in Padua, and did nothing without the aduice and counsell of Pierino Carrario, whereby we may perceiue that it was Albert, and not Maslin, who was farre from thence (as all authors affirme) which recovered Vderza. Thus Maslin being careful to espie all meanes how to frustrate the Venetians first attempts, or if that could not be, at leastwise to foreflow them by some hindrance, not being able to doe it by open force, had recourse to deceit.

ctised by Maslin

A certaine man called Thomasino commanded at the same time in Mestra, an inward friend of Spineta Malepina, who was in Maslin's campe, in whose name he held that place, situated on the Treuisan territorie neere to the lakes of Venice. This man by the counsell of Spineta, enterprised a villanous act against the Venetians. He agreed and promised to yeeld the Citie to the Venetians, provided that they would giue him fiftethousand crownes, and gaue for assurance thereof his wife and sonne for hostages: And the day of the execution being come, Albert and Spineta entered the towne at midnight with certaine troupes of horse and foote. The Venetians, albeit they held the traitor sufficiently bound vnto them in regard of the hostages hostages, thinking that they ought not to be ouer-credulous, would not suffer any naturall Venetian to be of that night-enterprise. Fieue hundred stranger-Souldiours were sent thither, vpon whom so soone as they entered the Citie a little before daie, the Souldiours of Escalla breaking forth of their Ambush made a furious assault. The number of the prisoners was few: as those whose liues, fortune and danger had rather saued, than the intent of the enemies; all the rest were laine: Then causing his Cauallerie on a sodaine to sallie forth on those which were without, verie few escaped. Albert thinking he had giuen the Venetians a great blowe, leapt for ioy, and mockt the prisoners, as if they had beene naturall Venetians. But when he vnderstood by the prisoners that there was not one Venetian in all the companies, but all mercenarie Souldiours and strangers of farre Countries, he was verie forrie for that which he had done, and blaspheming God and men, being ashamed of the murder he had committed in the night, in a rage with his fellowes he made haste to Padua.

Rossis in the meane time being in the Treuisan territorie, readie to march against the enemy, spake to his Souldiours in few words, exhorting them chiefly to shew themselves in all occurrents, valiant and courageous, and diligently to obserue martiall discipline, saying that he desired no mutinous or careless Souldiour, but such as were valiant vpon the enemy, patient in trauell, and obedient to his command: And therefore if there were any amongst his troupes that would not bee such, hee counselled them to depart and goe on no further, saying that hee had rather ouercome with few, worthie and valiant Souldiours, than to be vanquished in the companie of many cowards: willing those that were such to tarie behind and heare tell of their fellowes braue exploits, rather than by their presence to trouble the whole Campe.

souldiers.

Maslin being aduertized that the enemies were dislodged, fearing least they would seize on the suburbs of Mestra, commanded them all to be burnt vpon a day, to the great griefe of the inhabitants. Rossis after he had passed the Riuer of Anaxus, marching through the Treuisan, and perceiuing a farre off the flames and smoake of those suburbs, said aloud, That hee aspired to greater matters than to lodge in the suburbs of Mestra. At that time some counsellled him to besiege Treviso, but he made answere, That he made haste to fight with the enemy; whome hauing once ouercome he would afterwards obtaine diuers goodly victories.

The Venetian Armie was already on the banks of the Riuer Brente, when newes came sodainly to Padua, that the enemy approached. The Paduans hereupon beganne to murmur, and scorning the Tyrants tolde them, that they should doe well to goe and take armes to hinder the Venetian from passing the Riuer, if they would be accounted so valiant as they made shew for; They on the other side being loath to giue any token of feare, commaunded the Souldiours forthwith to arme themselves. Albert hauing made choise of a selected troupe marched forth of the Citie, to oppose himselfe against the enemy. But Rossis after he had passed the Riuer by night, had raised his Campe before day from the further side thereof; and afterwards marched cheerefully in order of battaile against the enemy, who was said to approach, thinking that the houre was come wherein he should reuenge so many iniuries receiued from those of Escalla, or else in performing the part of a good Capitaine die valiantly fighting. Albert hauing certaine notice of the enemies passage, and that he marched towards him with an intent to fight, being therewith daunted did sodainly turne backe: which being perceiued by those that were with him, dispersing themselves here and there, they forooke their Campe which was newly vitualled in abundance. The Venetian, after hee had made good cheere therewith, ranne furiously to the veriegates of the Citie, burning and spoiling all places neere about, the Generall hauing forbidden his Souldiours to murder or ravish. But whilst they thus so spoiled farre and neere, those of Pieu de Sacco came weeping to the Venetians, beseeching them to take compassion on them, offering to doe whatsoeuer they should command, and freely to furnish the Armie with victuall. The Sacceans being receiued vpon their oath were enioyned to bring victuall to the Campe which laie nere their Citie: From thence Rossis sent an Herald of Armes to Mastin, (who vpon the report of the Venetians march was come to Padua) to acquaint him with his desire to fight with him with displayed ensignes: And that if he were so valiant and experienced in Armes as he boasted of, he would with him not to refuse the battaile, but rather to come forth into the field, and to make prooffe which of them were most valiant. Mastin made no reply to this challenge.

tions of Chioggia*

Rossis perceiuing he could not draw his enimie to fight: without any longer stay raised his Campe, after he had set fire to the towne of Corania; but the Venetians afterwards repaired it speedily, and placed a strong Garrison in it: All this hapned in a Moneths space. But about the fifth of Nouember, the Campe approaching the village of Bouolenta, the Florentine troupes with the other associates, which had tarried at Chioggia, ioynded themselves by litle and litle to the Armie. This place is almost on euery side enuioured with water. It is thought that Antenor the Trojan laid the first foundation thereof.

Diuers report, that so soone as Rossis was knowne to be in the field, the cavallerie which staid at Chioggia was mightily encreased, and that the Rendezvous of the Armie marching on the firme land was at Bouolenta. Rossis resolved not to stirre from thence till he had in some sort discovered the enemies intent, whom hee knew to be so politicke, as he would attempt nothing but vpon found aduise. The Annals asseme that which wee first said, and further adde, that by the aduise of Rossis they builded a Fort at Bubulente, wherein they left a strong Garrison, both by land and water. For hee had obserued that the situation of that place was very commodious for the Warres, as it fell out by experience. For the Venetians from thence did many times make roades on the Territorie of Padua.

besiege the Fort of the Salt pits.*

Rossis departing thence gaue an alarm to Padua, and riding neere to the Gates and Walls of the Citie, hee called the enemies to the fight, and with reproachfull speeches hee taxed their cowardise. But the enimie keeping himselfe within the closure of his Walls, and not daring to come forth, he passed on, and tooke the lower way towards Cap-darger, to goe from thence to besiege the Fort of the Salt-pits; where Mirco Laureano was arriued, with the nauall Armie: whereupon by mutual consent the siege was aduanced. The Garrison within it were first founded, whether they would voluntarily yeeld without enforcement; which they refusing to doe, the Venetians did furiously assaile them. The engines were already planted against the Walls, and the Souldiers mounted on the enemies Rampire, at such time as Spirituello Gouvernour of the place hauing receiued an hurt, sodainly died thereof. They of the Fort being amazed at this accident, craued truce for eight dayes, with determination that if Mastin came within that time to raise the liege, they would still hold it for him, and withall faithfully promising, if they were not releued before the Truce were expired, that they would yeeld it vp to the Venetians. This being graunted, they sent to Padua to intreate Mastin to come himselfe and to raise the liege, or if he could not come, at the least, to send forces sufficient to constrain the enimie to raise his Campe: But he promising them nothing, but willing them rather to seeke their owne safetie, the Castle was yeelred, which was forthwith razed by the Venetians.

*The Fort of the

About the same time those of Cognilian, yeelred to the Venetians, and were the way-leaders to diuers other Cities, and associates of Mastin to revolt from those of Escalla, as it afterwards happened. The tyrants at the beginning had made great leues of Souldiers, and among others, of three thousand Lanquenets. It is said these men did very roughly intreate the Paduans, as well by spoiles and robberies, as by despoiling of maidens and rauishing of wiues: so as it is to be thought that these vilanous actions were the first and principall motives of the Paduans rebell-

on. Mastin being thereby constrained to disperse them here and there, vnder shew of going to Garrisons, sent fiftene hundred of them to Este, who by a meruailous vnuly licence, did outrage the inhabitants thereof. There arose likewise in Padua (for those that remained there continued their old trade of life) a great sedition, and the Townesmen and the Strangers were ready to haue fought in the midst of the Citie, had not Mastin by his timely coming appeased the quarrell already begun. It is certain that the Paduans were by this iniurie meruailously withdrawne from the friendship of those of Escalla, and that by reason thereof, they already tended to rebellion.

the Paduans re-uolted from
those of Escalla*

Mastin was determined to call backe the Garrison at Este to the Citie, had not his brother Albert dissuaded him from it, saying that hee ought not to charge the citie with any more strange Garrisons, and that he had no cause to feare the Paduans nor Marsilio, whose truth and fidelitie he held for assured. Rossis in the meane time fought with good successe against those of the Garrison of Este, and taking three hundred of them, after he had stripped them, he sent them away.

Those of Escalla perceiuing their affaires exceedingly to decline, sent their Ambassadors to demand aide of all their friends and allies, as well within Italy as abroad, and namely to the Duke of Bauiere. But the Paduans because they would not seme altogether to betray the tyrants, sent at the same time their Commissioners to Venice, who (if it were possible) should mediate some good agreement betwixt the Venetians and those of Escalla. This they spake in publike: But they had secret commandement if they could not conclude a peace, to make a league with the Venetians against Mastin. Threescore Ambassadors, from threescore Princes or Commonwealths, came at one time for this purpose to Venice. Marsilio Carrario was sent thither from their enemies, who at his arriual (as it is reported) was pursued by the common people and beaten with stones: But it was not so much in hatred to Marsilio, as to the tyrants whom the people mortally hated: some thinke that it was done of purpose, to the end that those of Escalla should haue no cause to distrust him who came to speake secretly against them to the Venetians, like the other Ambassadors. The Venetians demanded that Padua, Treuifo, and Parma should be restored to their ancient libertie, and Luca in Tuscany yeelred to the Florentines; but those of Escalla thinking these conditions to be too base and ignominious, would not accept of them. Whereupon the Ambassadors were dismissed without any conclusion at all. In the meane time the Ambassadors of Acio Visconte, of Philippo Gonzaga, and others, made a league with the Venetians against those of Escalla. Marsilio dealt secretly with the Prince about the yeelding of Padua, which soone after ensued. Some Authours write that in the presence of all the Ambassadors, hee spake softly to Dandulo, and said, What wilt thou say Prince if we giue thee Padua? And that the Prince dissembling at the same time both in gesture and speech, that which was in question, answered, We will make thee Gouvernour thereof. This I rather beleue, than that which is commonly reported, That a long time afterward an Ambassador from Carrario spake this openly at a banquet on the Feast day of Saint Vitus, (as the manner was) albeit I graunt it might well enough be spoken in a banquet. But the person of the Traitor discovered the error committed therein. For it is certain that the Gouvernment promised at the first, was afterward giuen to Marsilio; but he whom they nominate, had no recompence.

Whilst these things were done at Venice, Rossis tooke certaine Townes in the Territorie of Padua from the enemies, and then bringing his troupes neere to the Citie, he set fire on one of the Gates, called Al-Saints. Moreouer those of Meistra daunted a while after with a new siege, wherewith they were enuioured, yeelred. From thence coming to Treuifo, he burnt in a night two of the Citie gates. The inhabitants were so amazed in this night-assault, as diuers running forth of the Citie in the darke, on that side where the enimie was not, saved themselves by flight, but many of them hauing lost their way, fell into the enemies hands, among whom the noble wife of Cammenis was slaine in the habit of a seruant. This being done, they made no farther attempt against the Citie, I know not whether it were because they despaired of taking it (being ignorant of the great feare and amazement of the Citizens) or rather because they would speedily goe to take Serravalle, which (according to some) came at that time vnder the Venetians obedience.

Maffin and Albert his brother hauing understood that besides the losse of so many Cities in short space, their associates likewise had forsaken them, and taken armes to offend them: (for it was reported that Lucchin Visconte hauing attained to the principallitie of Milan (by the death of Accion his kinsman) and Phillip Gonzaga were already in the field against them, or else in a readinesse so to doe) being enuironed with so many michietes, knew not what to resolute on, nor what they ought chiefly to follow, or in what place to oppose themselves against the enemies designs, or by what meanes to relieue their Cities. But in this great incertaintie of their affaires, not being able to conclude on that which was most expedient for them, Maffin on a sodaine with the greatest part of his forces left Padua, committing the guard of the Citie to his brother Albert, and came to Verona.

In the meane time Marsilio Rossis, after hee had passed the Riuer Adice, marched with those troupes which hee had receiued from his brother directly towards Mantua, where ioyning with Phillip Gonzaga, and Lucchin Visconte, they consulted together of the whole matter, and after marched into the field, resolving first to assaile Verona. Now hauing foraged the Countrey, they entred the Territorie of Verona, where they made great spoyle round about the Citie, which with great clamours they besieged; bringing thither all things necessarie for a siege. It is reported that Charles sonne to the King of Bohemia, lay at the same time before Feltré with a great Armie of Germans, by meanes whereof those of Escalla were at one time assailed in three severall places. Maffin being thus uncertaine by what meanes to oppose himselfe against the enemy, after hee had a while ruminated with himselfe, determined like a mad man to doe it by Armes, and to fight with any that hee should meete with. But before he would give Battell, he Knighted his sonne Francis who was yet very yong, Spineta Marquis, Guido Correggiario, and Paulo Aligerio the Governour of the Citie; after which hee marched with great noyse and furie towards the enemies, and in their view put his Armie in order of battell, being resolved for his part to fight. Rossis made a retreat, so did the rest, not meaning to fight, thinking it more auailable for them to draw the Warre out at length, the which by all likelihood Maffin could not long maintaine, than to hazard the whole by the event of a battell. In this sort making a faire retreat, not giuing shew of any manifest flight, they held on their way towards Mantua.

A wise retreat

eth to shut victuals from the Venetians.*

Maffin as proude of this retreat as if hee had wonne the battaile, returned speedily with three thousand horse and certaine foote companies to Padua, and from thence to Bubulente, where the Venetians Fleete lay. At his arriual hee surprised twenty small Venetian vessels, left for the Guard of the munition, and made an attempt to take the Castle, the which being brauely defended, hee was constrained to depart thence, and hee encamped two miles beneath the Riuer, with an intent to shut vp the passage of the victuals which came from the Citie by water. It is thought that he might with more ease haue executed his determination if hee had encamped betwixt Bubulente and Mesra. Rossis, to cause him dislodge, commanded a great quantitie of wood (an hearbe belonging to Fullers) to be poundd and to be throwne into the Riuer, to make it vsuorie and bitter to be drunke by those of Escalla. But victuals waxing scant in the Venetians Campe, by reason that the enemy lay so nere, the arriual of Marsilio called thither for the purpose (as I so thinke) was cause that the Venetians, strengthened by his comming, had free passage whither they pleased, being little inferior to those of Escalla in strength.

tion of a Generall.*

Pietro Rossis likewise being often prouoked by the enemy to fight, did purposely refuse it: For he perceived that Maffin could not long hold out, and that hee should

doe vndercreetly, to hazard the fortune of a battell, knowing that the enemy was already haife vanquished, and there was no doubt but that he would be ouerthrowne without bloodshed. Whilst he lay in Campe nere to Bubulente, thinking greatly to hinder the enemy by keeping of the passage of the Riuer from them, hee had notice that Lucchin Visconte had sleightly besieged Bresia, which newes he very badly digested, and marched with speede through the Territorie of Padua and Vincenza to releue Bresia, which whilst hee attempted, more fearefull tidings were brought, that Padua was lost & his brother taken prisoner with the whole garrison.

*Brescia besieged by Lucchin Vis-

His losse did in such sort abate the tyrants pride, as hee neuer after hoped for so better successe. Marsilio Carrario, so soone as Maffin was departed from the reliefe of Bresia, had forth with giuen notice thereof to Pietro Rossis, and leauing open the Gate of the crooked Bridge, gaue entrance to him and his whole forces, which they of the Citie perceiuing (for there was no hostile act committed) all men with great ioy ranne to meete him, calling him their deliuerer, and infinitely praised him. But Rossis with the generall consent did in the Venetians name giue the gouernement of the Citie to Marsilio Carrario. Albert, and Risse Foranensis with diuers other friends and seruants of the Tyrants were taken prisoners, and their goods spoyled. Albert was soone after brought to Venice. Rossis gaue leaue to five hundred Almaine horse that were found in the Citie, freely to depart thence with their Armes and

But that which did most of all afflict him, was, when he understood soone after that Bresia whither he had so speedily marched, was taken: and in this sort bad tidings comming daily vnto him, the end of all was, that Lucchin had seized on Bergamo.

Those of Escalla being wholly chafed from Padua, the Venetian Ambassadors came thither, namely, Marco Lauretano, Iustiniano furnished Iustinian, and Andrea 30 Morsolino; who comming into the Market-place where the people were assembled, Lauretano in the name of the Common-wealth, vsed this congratulatory Speech vnto them.

The Venetian Ambassadors Oration to the Paduans.

VE cannot but exceedingly reioyce, that yee being now freed from so cruel an enemy, haue recovered your ancient libertie lost by the malice of Maffin: And therefore by the Senates appointment we conserue the government of the Citie on Marsilio: whose courage and valour, by how much more it is famous and knowne to all men, by so much more doe the Venetians highly esteeme it for the good and commoditie of the Paduans, adding thereunto his singular vertue and wisdom, which cannot but bring great and desired quiet to his fellow-Citizens. For the Venetians verie well know, and namely by experience, that a Commonwealth is most happie which is gouerned by a wise and discreet person. Attend therefore, and perpetually receiue your Citizen Marsilio, to obey his commandements, and heartily to defend iustice, seeing ye are not ignorant how grieuous a thing tyrannie is: And thou likewise Marsilio, albeit we are all well perswaded of thy vertue, thou art neuertheless to thinke that we haue called thee to this place, not only to command a ouer thy country, but to bring 30 it all helpe and succour. If peraduenture thou shalt doubt what course to take for the well-gouerning thereof, and by what meanes to make thy selfe regarded without enie among thine owne people: take example by the Magistrates of our Citie, which will easily teach thee: who whilst they are in office, are respected for the honour of the Commonwealth, and their charge being expired, they liue equally with the meanest, knowing verie well that this equali-tie is the onely bond of a Commonwealth. It remaineth now, that this Citie following this example, doe highly account, honour, and respect the friendship of the Venetians, as well in general as particular. The which duly and religiously to obserue the nouelties happed in your time may incite you, we hauing twice within few yeares freed you from the cruell yoke of bondage. For that man is no lesse foolish, than ingratefull, who cannot be moued by benefites receiued.

Marfilio's answer to the Venetians.

The exhortation of Lauretano being most true, was likewise most pleasing to the people, and chiefly to Marfilio; who after he had giuen great thanks to the Venetians, said. That he would in such fort rule, as no man in time to come should haue occasion to complaine of his government, much lesse to desire (& if he were a louer of the publike peace) any change. And that about all things he would take order, so that the Paduans should alwaies be such towards the Venetians, as those ought to bee who haue receiued benefites and good turnes, namely, with such acknowledgement and good offices as all men should say that the Venetians had well employed their labour and cost. As for the present benefite which he had receiued from them, he would at all times, and in all places confesse, that he held his honour, dignitie, and all the rest of his meanes, onely from them.

This did he speake, which was with a generall consent approued by all the people: Then followed mutuall embracements and congratulations, the whole Citie leapt for ioy, all things on a sodaine were changed. For in stead of feare and enuie, wherewith it was before filled, nothing was then scene, but ioy and contentment.

The death of Marfilio of Rosius.

Orlando Rosius chosen General of the Armie.

A treatie of peace broken.

Marfilio imploreth the aide of the Duke of Bauiera.

But the course of the fortunate successe of the Venetians affaires was interrupted by an accident happed to the two brethren of Rosius, who in few daies died one after another. For Pietro after the taking of Padua being come to the siege of Moncellesse was mortally wounded: whereupon being carried to Padua, he died soone after to the great griefe of all men. He was a man of a goodly stature, a great warrior, and an excellent Capitaine, being an enemy to crueltie, and when hee went to the warres, he forbad his souldiers to murder in cold blood, and to enforce women. He was so well beloved of his souldiers for his gentleness, as the Almaine horsemen, who were verie many in his campe, called him their father, and he was besides so libell, as (his horses and Armour excepted) he gaue all his wealth among his souldiers. Diuers Italians and Almaines cloathed in mourning habite, did follow his funeral, and bewailed him a long time. He died in the prime of his age, being but six and thirtie yeares old. Marfilio his brother, who not long before was sicke of a feuer being brought to Venice, died there within sixe daies after, being fiftie yeares of age.

Their brother Orlando Rosius, who at the same time held Luca straitly besieged, was in his absence chosen General of the Armie, and being sent for, came soone after to the campe at Moncellesse. For the siege was not discontinued, although the General was dead: At his arriual he tooke part of the Armie, and came by the confines of Este, and made roads on the territorie of Verona, where putting all to fire and sword vnto the gates of the Citie, he brought a verie great bootie to the campe: Not long after the Senate called him to Venice whither all the Agents of the associates were come to treat of peace. But because in this assembly the selfe-same conditions were propounded to Marfilio as were in the former, and that he stoutly refused them, all the commissioners departed from Venice without any conclusion. Marfilio perceiving that he was not yet freed from this war crueld aid of the Duke of Bauiera, adding diuers great promises to his entreaties. This duke promised to send him great supplies, provided that he might haue good caution for what he promised. Marfilio deliuered into his hands the Citie of Pescara, with his sonne Francisco, and diuers other children of noble families. But the Duke failing of his promise, so soone as Marfilio perceived himselfe deluded, he came on a sodaine and recouered the Citie, with his sonne and hostages. Marfilio Carrario died in the meane time, leauing (by the consent of the Venetians) Vbertino his neere kinsman for his successor, hauing sent a hundred thousand crownes to Venice to build a Church in a part of the Iury, and to enrich it with diuers inheritances.

At

At the same time the Armie approached Montfort, and from thence diuers roads were made on the territories of Vincenza and Verona. Marfilio in the meane time him thence: Not long after Marfilio came into the field to execute a new enterprize, the which had as bad successe, as that of Montechia. The Paduan and Almaine horsemen were encamped in the Isle of Longare. Marfilio thinking to surprize them, did speedily march thither with his forces. The Island being assailed by land and water, was not onely well defended, but with the losse of his ships hee was ignominiously driuen thence. Vbertino on the other side hauing with money corrupted the

The number of the slaine was great, but that of the prisoners greater, among whom were Guido and 20 Gilberto his brother, and with them two hundred men at Armes. Anatreca Morosino, for that hee had valiantly behaued himselfe in that encounter was afterwards knighted. Orlando was at the same time in Padua, from whence he speedily departed with his troups, and came to Vincenza, where approaching the citie neere to Saint Felix gate, he lodged in the suburbs. The poore inhabitants were then more terrified than before. For being on euerie side shut in by the enemy, they lost all hope of getting any victuals, especially from Verona, by reason the Venetians possessed Brendola and Montechia. Diuers with their wiues and children being driuen forth of their houses by the men at Armes of the Garrison were constrained to begge. At the last the Tyrantes pride being abated, peace ensued very opportunely.

The siege of Vincenza.

It is reported, that being not able to raise the siege before Vincenza, he harkened to a peace, about which hauing sent his Commissioners to Venice, he obtained it on these conditions: That Feltre, Beluna, and Ceneda should remaine to Charles of Boheme; Bergamo, and Bressia to Visconte, who possessed them; Treuifo, with the villages and Castles of the Treuifan, to the Venetians, with the Castles of Balde and Bassan, with free libertie to trafficke on the riuier Adice; and foure Cities of the territorie of Luca to the Florentines.

Marfilio being enforced accept of peace on any conditions.

It is reported that the Florentines being discontented with this agreement, because Luca which they demanded was not yeilded to them, sent to Venice about this businesse, where the matter was rather debated out of wilfulnesse than of any hope they had to obtaine it. But the Venetians inclining to peace, the Florentines consented thereunto. All the associate Lords which had taken part with the Venetians were likewise satisfied. Albert with the rest of the prisoners were set at libertie. The Venetians gaue the Castles of Balde and Bassan to Vbertino Carrario: where by we may see that the Venetians did not seeke by this warre to enlarge their estate. For besides the breaking of the tyrants forces, whom they could wholly haue ouerthrowne, and by armes haue appropriated all that to themselves which they had taken from him, they gaue the renowned Citie of Padua (which they might haue held by right of warre) to Marfilio Carrario a priuate Citizen, and afterwards to Vbertino his successor, two great Castles with their demaines taken from the enemy during the treatie of peace. But Blondus affirms it to be most true, that the Venetians had neuer any desire to increase their dominions, but onely to preuaile so farre (which hapned as they desired) as to be able to abate the tyrants pride, & to make him glad to sue for peace with becaued vp hands, who a little before had disquieted all Italie, and

and who was not satisfied with the command of all which lieth on this side and beyond the Po, within the continent of the Alpes, but would besides haue enthronized himselfe in T ulcanie, and haue attempted at the last not to take away (for that he could not doe) but to molest the quiet possession of the Sea, which the Venetians of a long time had purchased with much labour and trauaile.

This then is the fruite, as pleasing as great, which they reaped by this victorie, thinking that they had done enough and very much, to haue troden the tyrants pride vnder foote, vnto whom in the end being daunted and basely suing for a dishonourable peace, his demand was not onely graunted, but they made him a Gentleman of Venice. Dandulo after he had fortunately abroad and at home gouerned 10 the Commonwealth, deceased, in the eleuenth year of his Gouernment.

apparition to a poore Fisherman*

Moreouer on the five and twentieth of Februarie in the night, there arose a sudden tempest, which caused such an inundation in the Citie, as the waters stood 40 three foote deepe, which was neuer till then seene. This being reputed a prodigie, gaue beleeue to that which a poore Fisherman reported to haue seene the same night: which was thus. So soone as he perceived the storme, in a great feare he drew vp his little Boate neere to Saint Markes Church, and standing not farre from thence out of the raine and wind, three men came to him, who, as if they had some earnest buisnesse, entreated him in all haste to Ferrie them ouer to Saint Nicholas Church on the shoare, which he refusing to doe for feare of the storme, they on a sodaine went into his Boate, as though themselves would guide it: which the Fisherman perceiuing, entred into it, (though against his will) and guided the Boate. But being come to the Church, they turned towards the mouth of the Hauen: where 50 they saw a Ship full of Diuels, which these three men sudainly sunke by the help of God. Whereupon the Seain an instant grew calme. And then, one of them entred into the next Church; the other was caried to Saint Georges; and the third returned to the place where they tooke Boate: of whom the poore old Fisherman (albeit beit in regard of what he had seene, he thought him some Diuine Person) demaunded his hire, who answered him: Thou shalt goe (quoth he) to the Prince and Senate, vnto whom hauing declared in order what thou hast seene this night, they shall liberally reward thee. The Fisherman replied, they will not beleue me, and I know certainly that they will iest of me, and so I shall become the laughing stocke of the people for my rash report: whereunto this diuine personage answered him, and said: Take this pledge (and gaue him a Ring which hee had on his finger) let the Duke and Senate vnderstand, that by our meanes the Citie hath bene this night preferred from a terrible flood: And because thou shalt not faile but doe this, know that he whom thou 10 diddest see enter into his Church, is blessed Saint Nicholas, which yee Mariners doe so highly reuerence; the other is Saint George, who is gone to visite his Churches; and I am Marke the Euangelist the patrone of your Citie. This being said he vanished.

The poore Fisherman, emboldned by this pledge, so soone as it was day came to the Palace, where saying that hee would speake to the Prince concerning some important buisnesse, he was presently brought into his presence, who was accompanied by the Senate, where he declared in order all that hee had seene and heard; then for a witness to his speech, he drew forth of his bosome the Ring which the holy Saint had giuen him ouer night: They were all greatly amazed at this miracle: then they caused diuers solemne Prayers to be made, as well in priuate as in publicke in the Churches of these holy personages, by whose helpe the Citie had bene defended from the present danger: Besides, they appointed the poore Fisherman a yearly pension out of the publike Treasurie.

About the same time the Ambassadors of Edward King of England arrived at Venice, crauing aide by Sea against Philip the French King, whom the Genoueses fauoured with all their power, but notwithstanding all their promises on their Kings behalfe, they could obtaine nothing: Their excuse was, in what great danger their affaires stood at Sea, which they were constrained to defend from the ordinarie incursions of the Turkes, who by the carelesnesse of the Christians were growne so mightie, as they could in a moment Arme two or three hundred Gallies if neede 30 were.

At the same time certaine Lords of Candie revolted, who being retired into some Fortes and Castles in the mountaines, did disquiet the greatest part of the Island. Nicholas Phalerio, Iustiniano surnamed Iustinian, and Andrea Morosino, with good forces were sent against these men; who were embarked in the Gallies which went to traffique in Ciprus. Being arrived in Candie they assailed the enimie in three places, and giuing them in a maner no time to breath, they tooke from them all meanes to robbe and spoile. They did moreover propound great rewards to any whoeuer should kill any one of those Rebels; or could bring him aliuie to the Venetian Magistrate, hauing set downe a certaine rate for every head; but the 40 Authours whom we follow mention not how much. They being by this meanes in few dayes reduced vnder the Venetians obedience, were punished according to their deserts, diuers of them were throwne into the Sea, but the most of them were hanged, which caused those of the Island, being terrified by the punishment of those Lords, to returne on a sodaine to their due obedience. The Island being quiet, the Generals of the Armie (Nicholas Phalerio excepted who died there) returned to Venice. Victuals were very deare in the Citie, during the principallitie of Gradonico, which was very short; for it lasted but two yeares and nine Moneths, which time being expired he died.

Andrea

Andrea Dandolo succeeded Gradonico, a man certainly of rare and singular learning, and as eloquent as could be wished, in one of his yeares: For it is reported that he wrote the Venetian Historie in two styles; the one more amply, and it may be therefore lesse eloquent, and the other more succinctly, and thereby (as saith Carosini) more beautified and adorned. Hee was besides of a meeke and liberrall disposition, whereby hee purchased the surname of Comisino: And that was the reason (as I thinke) why before he was of competent age, they made him Procurator of S. Marke, and soone afterwards Prince. For the manner was, not to name any one to that dignitie, but such as were already of good yeares; and all Authors (almost) are of opinion, that he was not aboute fixe and thirtie yeares of age, when hee was named for the soveraigne Magistrat. We finde in some Authors, that at the beginning of his Principallitie, according to the league made with Pope Clement, & other Christian Princes against the Turke, the Venetians armed sixtene Gallies, and gaue the command of them to Pietro Zeno, who after he had sunke diuers ships of the Barbarians, did by a sodaine assault take the Citie of Smyrna, and where hauing slaine the Inhabitants, he left a good Garrison, and that soone afterward, not farre from those confines, the Venetians accompanied with those of Rhodes, and Cyprus, did oftentimes fight with the Turkes, where diuers of both sides were slaine. But at the last the Venetians with their Allies being defeated and put to flight, part of them being affrighted escaped into the Citie, the rest being enclosed by the Barbarians, were all slaine.

At the same time Nicholas surnamed Giouanni, was sent by the Senate to the King of Babylon, to treat with him concerning the Venetian Merchants free traffick into Egypt. The Barbarian granted their request, but on certaine conditions; the which seeming not to be allowed of, without the Popes permission, it was not thought lawfull to trafficke with the enemies of the Christian faith, Marini Phalerio Knight, and Andrea Cornario, were sent to his Holinesse, who granted that the Venetians should for five yeares following traffick to Alexandria with fixe Gallies: Souran, by vertue of this permission, was the first that vnder-tooke that voiage with two Gallies, wherein Pietro Iustiniano went Confull.

Two yeares after, Iustiniano surnamed Iustinian, obtained of the Pope in the name of the Common-wealth to traffick into Syria, and the time of these two trafficks was prolonged for ten yeares. At the same time they beganne in the Citie to build St. Anthony's Church, (the beginning whereof is attributed to one Iennotto a Florentine, of the familie of Abbi) vpon a little Rocke, where was first builded a little Chapell of wood: In the same place at this day is to be scene a great void place, or rather an Island, made by a continuall heaping together of earth, which the water in proceesse of time hath brought thither; It hath a delightfull prospect towards the Lakes, and besides the Church which is faire and large, there stands neare to it a new sumptuous building, which serueth for an Hospitall.

The seventh rebellion of Zara.

About the same time those of Zara revolted from the Venetians the seventh time. Their report was, That they had sent to Lewis King of Hungarie, to certifie him, if he would come into Dalmatia, they would deliuer their Citie, Hauen, Lands, persons and meanes, as well publike as priuate into his hands.

The Senate presently vpon these newes, gaue five armed Gallies to Pietro Canalis, who sailed into Dalmatia. Being come neere to Zara, hee received Marco Cornari the gouernour with all his familie, and diuers other Venetians, into his vessells, who were in the Citie when it revolted, from whence hee presently departed: For, to haue besieged the Citie with so few vessells, and by Sea only, would haue bene as foolish as vprofitable. He first retired to Pague; the inhabitants whereof hauing receiued him into their Citie, deliuered the Gouernour into his hands which those of Zara had sent thither not long before, together with all those which had aided or assisted him, whom Canalis sent to Venice. Soone after hauing fortified the place, he tooke with those few Gallies which he had, diuers vessells of the enemies which lay neere to the Islands; But whilst by these meanes hee went about to hinder the Zaratinas: Marco Iustiniano came by Land with his Armie, and encamped at the Fountaine next to the Citie, where he sodainly caused his Souldiers to build a Fort. Then, from thence, he did with his engins batter the Citie, beat downe the walls, ouerthrow the houses, and made all things verie incommodious to the enemies. If the Zaratinas were straightly besieged by Land, by Sea they were no lesse: For the Venetians hauing taken from them the Towne of Damiana, they did at times approach verie neere to the Citie, then they speedily returned, and after some stay, came back with more furie to assaile the Hauen.

giuen to Zara.

Thus stood the affaires of the Zaratinas, when Andrea Morosino and Simon Dandolo, the Princes brother, arriued at the Campe to provide and take order for whatsoeuer should be expedient for the Common-wealth: and I thinke, this was the cause, why from the beginning they called these Magistrates Providers; but we will alwaies call them Providatori. At their arriuall it was resolved to giue a general assault to the Citie by Sea and Land. It may be they had notice that Lewis King of Hungarie was not farre off with great forces. The Citie being assailed with great furie, the Sea-forces threw bridges from the Gallies vpon the walls, seeking by that meane to enter the Citie. On the other side the Land-Armie drew neere the walls with their engins and other wallike instruments; But both sides had no great success. Some were gotten vpon the walls, on the bridges from the shippes, who did greatly affright the inhabitants, & slew diuers of them. But soon after, the Townesmen waxing desperate, did furiously fall vpon them and beat them from the walls, breaking the bridges, whereupon the Souldiours on that side were constrained to make a base retreat. The fight on the Land-side was vnfortunate. For the engins of batterie breaking at their first approach, made all the Venetians attempts bootlesse, which the Generall perceiuing, commanded to found the retreat. After this assault King Lewis arriued with six score thousand men, and encamped not farre from Zara; who, to free the Citie which was giuen vnto him from the siege, gaue a sodain assault to the Venetian Campe. The Hungarians with fearefull cries made an attempt on the Venetians Fort, not thinking to meet with trenches and rampiers that that were able to keepe them out. The Zaratinas likewise made a sallie, and together with them assailed the Fort. The Venetians did not only valiantly defend it, but repulsed the enemies farre from thence with great effusion of blood. In the meane time those in the Gallies hearing the noise, and fearing that their fellowes were assailed, leauing a sufficient number of Souldiours for the guard of their vessells, they came on shore, and marched in a close battalion to the reliefe of their countrymen: which they in the Fort perceiuing, presently issued forth vpon the enemy. There was on either side a cruell fight neere to the Fort and much blood-shed: But the Hungarians who at the Venetians first comming had begun by little and little to disorder their owne ranks, being overcome by this sodain sallie, betooke themselves to flight, who were pursued and slaine heere and there by the Victorious Venetian. The Dalmatians perceiuing the bad successe of the Hungarians retired with great amazement into the Citie. The King thus repulsed, with losse of a great part of his Armie, returned (in manner of a flight) into Hungarie. But because it was scarce credible (to speake truly) that so great an Armie should be defeated by so small a number: It is most likely that Lewis brought but twentie thousand men into Dalmatia, and that the Printers and not the Historians haue greatly erred in the number: yet whatsoeuer their Armie was (for vndoubtedly it was great) the Venetians got that day a glorious victorie of the enemies: And besides, the slaughter of the enemies was so great, as the aire being corrupted with the infection of so manie dead bodies, did in short space cause great mortalitie in the Campe. The siege neuerthelesse was not discontinued, but the Venetians on the contrary did more sharply vex those Rebels by Sea and Land. In the end, the Venetians hauing broken the chaine of the Hauen, the Zaratinas despairing of all forraing aid, and distrusting their owne forces, craued leaue to send to Venice, the which was freely granted them: The messengers being come to the Citie, craued mercie, committing themselves and their Citie to the mercie of the Senate. Zara being recovered Iustiniano was made Gouernour: The chiefe of the Citie who had bene the Authours of this seventh Rebellion, were by the Senate for euer banished the Citie.

Zara.

We may by this gentle punishment perceiue how great the Venetians clemency hath still bene, who were contented to punish a Citie that had so often Rebelled, and been thereby so troublesome to the Common-wealth, by the only banishment of a few of her inhabitants.

The ordinarie iudges of the Citie of Venice not being able in regard of the multitude of causes which was daile pleaded before them, to haue any fit leisure to intend the appeales sent vp by inferior iudges to their audience: The Senate created three Auditors to looke to that businesse, who according to the large extent of their iurisdiction, were called the Ancients. Three others were likewise created to heare the causes of strangers.

New magistrates created.

Besides, Prince Dandolo caused all that which had bene abolished from the ancient customes to be reduced into one volume, together with all the decrees made by the Senate, since the principality of Giacomo Tepulo, vntill that present, and hauing diuided them into Chapters, with a large Table, he named it The sixth Booke of the Cities decrees. And hauing moreouer whilst he was Procurator of Saint Marke carefully gathered together all the iudiciall acts and decrees of the great Councell, he set them downe in order, and noted, who had bene the Authour of euerie of them, and vnder whose Gouernment each of them had bene received and allowed.

This Prince causeth all the decrees of the Citie to be gathered into one forme.

There was at the same time great scarcitie of victualls in the Citie, which began in Gradonico his time, by reason whereof Gallies and other vessells were sent into Apulia and Sicily to fetch corne vnder the command of Marco Iustiniano. We may heereby easily perceiue that this voiage for corne, was before the siege of Zara, the which likewise some Authors do not denie. For it is certaine that this Iustiniano in that warre of Dalmatia was generall of the Land-Armeie, and that after Zara was recovered, he was made Gouvernour of the Citie. Now (as all men know) it could not bee that one man alone could at one selfe same time execute two so different offices. It is reported that two shippes of those which went for Corne were lost by a sodaine tempest as they returned homeward, and that they were neuer after heard of. Others say that foure only escaped out of this forme. The residue of the ships laden with Corne, did fortunately arrive in the Haven: by means whereof the dearth ceased.

A wonderfull Maritime. But this mischief being taken away, an other presently ensued: For vpon the day of Saint Paul his conversion, about one of the clocke after noone, there hapned a great Earthquake, which did in such sort shake the Citie, as diuers publike and priuate buildings were thereby throwne to the ground. The Steeples of Saint Siluester, Vitalis, Saint Giacomo de Lorio fell downe, together with the top of Saint Angelo his Church, and the left side of that of Saint Basil. The Babylonians thought, (for I see diuers that demaund from whence this fearefull motion of the Earth doth proceede) that it happeneth by the force of some Planet, meeting with the Sunne in the Region of the Earth. Anaxagoras hath thought that it is engendred in the Earth by proceesse of time, and restraining of Aire. Possidonius affirms that it is a winde that closeth vp in the bowells and concavities

Sundry opinions on Earthquakes. of the earth. Plinie saith, that the earth neuer quaketh, but when the Sea is very calme, and the aire so still and cleare as birds can hardly beare themselves vp therein, and at such time as the winds are inclosed in the veines and entrails of the earth. By this speech of Plinie it seemeth that the windes are the cause of this shaking, the which diuers Philosophers doe likewise affirme. Hee addeth by and by after; An earthquake (saith he) is nothing else but as the thunder in the aire, or an ouerture or creuise in the earth, or as the lightning breaking forth violently from the middle of the cloudes, the wind encloseth therein striving to burst forth by force. The Stoicks set downe diuers sorts of earthquakes, opening of the earth, swelling of the water, and the boiling vp of the same, the which is very true. For at some time the earth falleth downe very low, at other times it is much lifted vp, and putteth forth great Mountaines; in this the Riuer doe ouer-flow on a sodaine, in the other sparkes of fire are seene to rebound, the waters to boile ouer, and sometimes Riuer to leaue their ordinarie course. A fearefull sound goeth before, and accompanieth this quaking, sometimes like to the roaring of a Bull, and then like to the lamentable cry of some humane creature, or like the clattering noise of Armour, according to the qualitie of the matter which is inclosed, or according to the fashion of the caue and hole through which this winde passeth, which resoundeth (as it is said) in vaulted and hollow places, waxeth hot in sharp and drie places, and causeth great defluxions in moist and humide places.

Of all Earth-quakes the agitation on the waters is most dangerous. The Citie of Venice is not so much subiect to earthquakes, as some doe imagine, seeing among all the motions of the earth, that of the waues and flouds is the most dangerous: For lightning is not so hurtfull, nor the shaking of buildings, nor namely when the earth is pushed vp, or falleth downe by an interchangeable motion, because the one keepeth backe the other. The safest buildings are those vpon vaults, the corners of walls, and on bridges, leaning one against another. Besides, bricke buildings are lesse dangerous in such accidents than are others: Those which are at Sea can foretell these earthquakes, at such time as they perceiue the waues to swell on a sodaine without any winde, and those which are on Land may likewise foretell them, when they see birds, as it were, in amaze to stay their flight, or when the water in Wells is more troubled than ordinarie, hauing a bad taste and stinking smell, for these are (as it is reported) the true signes and prelates of future motions. Pherecydes the Syrian, drawing water out of a Well, foretold an earthquake which hapned there. Anaximander Milesius did by these signes declare to the Lacedemonians, that an earthquake was at hand, for otherwise, hee was no God to know things that come:

come: And the truest signes of all are, when the windes blow not, or when the Sea is meruailous calme. For an earthquake neuer happeneth, when the wind bloweth, or when the Sea swelleth with waues: for when it blowes, the motion ceaseth, otherwise it lasteth fortie daies, and some times longer, sometime lasted two yeares. But this earthquake whereof wee speake lasted fifteene daies more or lesse, where vpon all Women that were with child, being touched therewith miscarried, and died soone after of the contagious sicknes that forthwith ensued.

How long the Earthquake lasted at Venice. His dangerous sicknesse (as it is reported) came from Scythia, and from thence glided along the Pontick Sea, and the Hellespont; and at last at the same time that this great earthquake happened, it infected, in a manner, all the West. Some Authors call this disease, the euill of the groine, and I thinke the reason was, because the first signes of that disease were small kernells in the groine, then there followed an extreame heate with griefe and heauinesse in the head, which caused losse of memorie, so as in three daies they died. And this infection was so sharpe, as of one hundred that had this disease, fourescore and ten died. At the beginning thereof there was nothing heard nor seene in Venice (which about all other Cities was greatly afflicted therewith) but teares and sighes, euery where where burials, Phisitions looking to their patients, Friends and Kinsfolks visiting those that were sicke, Priests comforting them and doing their dutie. But afterward, this cruell disease encreasing more and more, those that were infected therewith, of what age and condition soeuer, fell downe euery where one vpon another, and sodainly died, the Kinsman refused to succour his Kinsman, the Friend to helpe his Friend, the Brother to visit his Brother, the Sister to releue the Sister, Parents forooke their Children, and Children in the like manner their Parents, there was no more Phisitions nor Medicines, euery man fled one from another, and in what place soeuer a man was stricken therewith, he there died without any helpe at all: Funerall Pompe was no more knowne; it was enough to dragge a dead body out of his own house, by reason of the stench, and to lay it in some poore boate which carried it without pompe or ceremonie, to be throwne hastily into some pit: and it is thought that diuers were burned, who were not fully dead. This corruption of the aire begunne at the beginning of the Spring, and encreased daily till May-day, being then at the Prime, and so lasted to the great losse of all men till the Moneth of Iune, and then it beganne by little and little to decreasse, namely when the number of the liuing was so few, as it found no more matter to worke on.

Great desolation in the Citie of Venice. The Citie being thus bare of Inhabitants (for there were none to be seene in the streets) for the repeopleing of the empty and void places, which did greatly deforme the Citie, the Senate made a decree, That as many as would come and dwell at Venice, after they had remained there two yeares, should bee held for Citizens of the same. The Senate moreover fearing that Lewis King of Hungarie making vse of this miserie of theirs, would againe invade Dalmatia (for he was come at the same time into Italie with a great Armie, to reuenge the death of his brother, whom Queene Ioane his wife, had put to death) sent three Ambassadors to him, Marco Iustiniano, Andrea Morosini Knights, and Nicolas Gradonico: who either by intreaties, or faire promises, did so alter the Hungarians, as he not only promised, not to attempt any thing against the Venetians, during their aduersitie, but made a truce with them for ten yeares (as some say) or for eight according to other Authors.

At what time the infection beganne and ended in Venice. But because the Venetians should be neuer freed from some forraigne war, those of Cape-Histrin revolted soone after the recouerie of Zara. The Venetians, though it were in a very vnfit season, did neuertheless leue forces, and vnder the command of Pancratius Iustiniano, sent both by Sea and Land into Histrin, to reduce them vnto their obedience, the which, so soone as he arrived in the Prouince, hee easily did. The Authors of the rebellion were sent to Venice, and commanded on paine of life not to depart thence without the Senates leaue, because they should no more raise any new stirre in their Citie.

At the same time likewise, Albert Prince of Croatia, robbing, and spoiling the Prouince of Hiltia, constrained the Venetians to take Armes against him. New forces were raised for that purpose, and the warre being thus proclaimed against Albert, two Senators were sent thither for Generalls of the Armie. The Croatian being daunted at the first report of the marching of the Armie, demaunded safe conduct of the Generalls, and obtained it, that hee might goe to Venice to the Prince and Senate, where being arriued, he threw himselfe prostrate at his feete, who although they had iust cause to bee offended with him, yet neuerthelesse observing their ancient custome, they pardoned him, after they had first taken certaine places from him, which by the Senats commandement were razed, to the end they should be no more a retreat for theues and robbers. Carosino (who onely makes mention of this Dalmatian warre) saith, that those two Generals at their returne to Venice, were condemned and deprived of their place of Senators, because they had not in the same warre followed those directions which were commaunded them.

Soone after ensued the third warre with the Genoueses, but it is thought that the cause of the warre proceeded (as oftentimes before) from them. They possessed certaine Cities on the Ponticke Sea, and therefore euer since Paleologus drave the Venetians from Constantinople, they attempted by all meanes to deprive the Venetian marchants of the trafficke of those Seas. Whereupon there and else where, they offered them sundrie wrongs, but especially neere to the Citie of Protospera, which they held on the same coast. Meeting in that place with certaine Venetian and Candiot ships, they fel vpon them, & having taken them, they constrained them to returne by Capra to the great hinderance, and more shame of the marchants. Carosino saith they were taken and spoiled in the haue of Capra. The Senate sent to the Genoueses to demand restitution of that which had bene taken from them: which being denied, they provided a mightie Armie against the Genoueses: Some gallies were armed in Dalmatia, Candie, and Nigrepont, and diuers were likewise stayed at Venice, who were readie to go forth for trafficke, and Marco Morosino the Admirall of the Adriaticke Sea being called home from Ragusa where he remained with certaine gallies, they made vp the number of fise and thirtie, the which were giuen to Marco Rucino: but diuers Authors in steed of Rucino set downe Nicolaso Pisano.

This man leauing Venice with an intent to assaile the enemies, who were reported to be abroad at Sea, was constrained by a sodaine tempest to enter into the Haue of Cariste, which lieth towards Nigrepont. It fell out fortu nately for the Venetians, that fourteene Gallies of Genoa rode there at the same time at an Ankor, laden with marchandize, and store of Armour, with diuers souldiers, who were bound for Pera, to fortifie it, to the end that their countymen who dwelt there, might be no more surprized (as at other times) by the Venetians: Others say that those gallies returning homewards into Italie, entred that haue. The Venetian Generall hauing desired them, commaunded his souldiers forthwith to prepare themselves to fight: All of them speedily obeying his commaundement, tooke their weapons, and turned the prowes of their gallies towards the enemy, and did shut in the issues and passages on all sides sauing towards the land, fearing to fall vpon the rocks. The Genoueses resolved to trie all meanes, rather than to yeeld. The Venetian then landed part of his forces, and speedily fortified a place neere to the enemies, from whence with his engines he began to batter them, whilest the gallies likewise shot continually vpon them. The Genoueses being assailed on euery side (perceiuing all things to fall out vnclukely on their sides) watching the time, began to make their saile-yards in readinesse. The Venetian perceiuing their intent, was at the first amazed at the strangenesse of the matter: But vnderstanding that the enemy went sodainly to flie, did with great attention marke which way he would escape. They on the other side making shew as if they intended some other matter, ha-

uing turned their prowes to that side which the Venetians had left without any guard, being aided by their sailes and oares they tooke themselves to flight: And ioure of the Gallies had in this sort escaped one after another, when Marco Morosino Admirall of the Adriaticke Sea, being vexed therewith, commanded one of those Gallies which he had receiued the year before, for the guard of the Gulph, to run athwart the fift Genoa Gallie which was readie to escape, which was so speedily done, as the same being taken, the residue which were readie to follow being amazed ranne vpon the next rocks, and were easily taken: And because they were laden with rich marchandize the souldiers & sailers boorded them, & being bulied in pillage suffered the other foure to escape with ease (who were already in the maine Sea) not caring for the Generals commandement: who being angric for loosing so goodly an opportunitie through the couetousnesse of his people, commanded to set fier on fise of the Gallies which were taken, and had not bene yet pillaged. He did it to the end to enforce his Souldiours, (who were thereby deprived of their hope of more spoile) to pursue the enemies. For so soone as they left off to spoile, they followed the chase.

The Genoueses in the meane time were farre enough off, yet neuerthelesse, tenne of their Gallies, with the Generall of their Armie, and threecore and tenne Gentlemen were taken, not accounting those of meaner qualitie, who were many in regard to the number of the Gallies. The victorious Venetian after this victorie at Chariste, failed towards Nigrepont, where he left the Genoa Gentlemen with a thousand of the chiefeest prisoners to be kept: the residue to the number of foure hundred or thereabout, were sent into Candie, and there put to the chaine and oare. The newes of this victorie brought great ioy to the Citie. The Senate in the midst of this mirth, being mindfull of Religious matters, decreed That the same day that the Genoueses were overcome at Chariste, should for euer bee solemnized among the holidays at Venice. It is thought that vpon this occasion; the day of the decollation of S. Iohn is till this day celebrated, which before then was no holiday. Others say that it was vpon S. Victors day the Martyr.

The Venetians making no long abode at Nigrepont, after they had scoured the Egean and Ionian Seas, came on a sodaine to haue besieged Pera: But the enemy hauing notice of his comming by their spies who had brought newes of their late losse at Chariste, and how the Venetian Gallies were at hand, had fortified all places round about the Citie, and chained the shippes together which lay in the Haue with their Masts and saileyards in manner of a Fort and Rampier, and provided so carefully for all other matters, as the Venetians (who came thither soon after with great shoutes) perceiuing what the enemy had done durst not assaile them: But tarrying certaine daies in the streight of Gallipolis, they surprized diuers vessels of Genoa.

In the meane time, those foure Genoa-Gallies which had escaped from Chariste, hauing ioined themselves to six others which were conducted by Philippo Doria, hauing notice of the departure of the Venetian Armie, came with all speed to assaile Nigrepont. Thomaso Viari who at the same time was Gouvernour of the Citie being affrighted so soon as he desired the enemy a farre off, fled, with the Providatori out on the other side of the Citie which lieth towards the Channell. The Genouefe at his arriuall, hauing assailed the Citie, wondered at the sodaine flight of the officers, and did in a moment take and spoile it; then after he had set the prisoners at libertie, and brought thence great numbers of the inhabitants, he burnt the Citie. Doria being exceeding glad to haue in this sort reuenged their losse lately received, departed from Nigrepont, and from thence came soone after and seized on the Isle of Chyos. The Generall of the Venetians after he had bene abroad fortie daies on this iourne, and being out of hope to take any greater prize, returned toward Venice: but on the coast of Dalmatia he met with tenne Venetian Gallies, which the Senate sent vnto him, whom he there staid, and caused them to returne with him to Venice. The report of the great bootie which the Armie brought home, and answered all mens expectation, made his returne most welcome. Some Authors affirme that the spoile which was brought to Venice, amounted to the valew of foure hundred thousand crownes, and others say three hundred thousand.

The same year that the warre began, the King of Arragon, vnto whom the Venetians had sent Mihachi Steno, joined his forces to theirs against the Genoueses. The Senate being strengthened by the alliance of such a Prince, hoping to execute some great designe, commanded a very mightie Armie to be set forth, and appointed five and twentie of the chiefe among them to make prouision in the Citie of all things necessarie for the warre. Nicolas Pisani being chosen Generall of the Armie, departed from Venice with twelve Gallies, and with him Giuonanni Delfino, who went to Constantinople to make a League with the Greeke Emperour against the Genoueses. Pisani being arrived in Dalmatia, receiued one Gallie from the Covitzani, an other from those of Ragusa; then he commanded three others of Venice to follow him, who met him at Nigrepont; Giuonanni Delfino, who came from Venice with him went on his Ambassade to the Greeke Emperour, who allied himselfe with the Venetians against the Genoueses.

But whilst the Greekes prepared their shippes of warre, thirtie Venetian Gallies departed from Venice vnder the command of Pancratio Insuliniano, Admirall of the Gulph, who failed towards Sicilie to ioinie with the Armie of the Arragonois which was said to be at hand: These two Armies being there ioined together left Sicilie, and failed directly towards Greece intending to passe beyond Morea: But being on the maine, such an horrible tempest arose, as in the memorie of man was neuer the like scene. The Fleet was meruailously beaten, and in great danger, one of the Gallies was drowned, and diuers others striking on the shoare were split in peeces, but without any great losse of men, by reason they were so neere Land. At the last the tempest ceasing, they failed towards Modon, whither Nicolas Pisani came within a while after from Nigrepont. The Genoueses a few daies before had giuen him chase with fortie Gallies, from the maine euen almost to Nigrepont, whither he speedily retired himselfe, and sunke certaine shippes at the entrie of the Hauen, to barre the enemies entrance, being resolute to defend that place with all his forces. The Genoueses failed not, but came with great shoutes and assailed the Citie, which being manfully defended by the Venetian, all their attempts poued vaine: who being repulsed from Nigrepont, went and tooke the Citie of Philotea by force.

But whilst these exploits were done about Nigrepont, a Gallie of Genoa left the Fleet and went before to discouer, who meeting with a Venetian Gallie which was commanded by Giuonanni Moro (or Memo as some say) assailed one another, but the Venetian was ouercome, by whom the Genoueses vnderstood, that the Venetian and Arragonois forces were not far from thence, whereupon returning with speed toward Nigrepont, they aduertized their Countymen; That two nauall Armies ioined together were at Morea; the one of Venetians, and the other of Arragonois; that they were already vnder saile to come & meet them, or else that they would be with them very shortly. Pagano the Generall of the Genoueses Armie being troubled with these news, left Nigrepont, and speedily failed with all his forces to Pera.

It is reported that before his departure thence heereuened his Armie, & found fifteene hundred men to be wanting, who for the most part had bene slaine before Nigrepont. Pisani being freed from the siege came (as hath bene said) to Modon, where after he had conferred with Pancratio Insuliniano, & with Ponce Generall to the King of Arragon, concerning the state of the war, & giuen order that all things necessarie for their iourne should be in readinesse, they came to Nigrepont: And from thence after they had fortified the Citie with men and victuals they failed towards Constantinople: But being yet on the Egean sea, by reason of the violence of the wind (for

(for it was in the midst of winter) they were constrained to remaine for a time in the same place, where the winde had staid them. But victuals beginning to wax scarce, they returned toward Candie; from whence, fortie dayes after, about the beginning of the spring, being furnished with victuals and other necessarie munitions, they failed against the enemies.

The Venetian Historians say, That the two Armies passed on to Constantinople without any tempest; that being there ioynd with the Greekes forces, they went furiously against the enemies; that there was a bloudie fight neere to Pera; and that they departed one from another with equal vantage. But in this they haue verie negligently, (I say not licentious) spoken against the Venetians reputation. For the most credible Authors affirme that the issue of this battaile was verie different, saying That they fought neere to the Bosphorus of Thrace, which is a freight three miles distant from Constantinople, hauing Europe on the one side, and Asia on the other, looking one vpon another by reason of their neighbour shoares, so as they may be perceived to haue bene in times past but one Land, being diuided by an earth-quake, which made a verie freight passage to the Sea. So Plato thought That Atlas hauing cut through Calpe opened the passage of the Ocean to the Mediterranean Sea.

Now at the mouth of this freight, (which in regard of the narrow space thereof that Oxen doe easily passe ouer, is called Bosphorus, surnamed of Thrace, by the name of the Province which lieth on the one side thereof) the Genoueses so soone as they had intelligence of the enemies comming, who were newly departed from Gallipolis, did of purpose plant themselves: fearing if they should fight on the maine Sea, and at one time with three great Fleets, they should be enforced to fight in a round forme, & therefore they thought it safest for them to receiue the Venetians and Spaniards in front at the entrie of a freight, where it was impossible for so many shippes to fight altogether in front, and the Greekes Armie on their sides whose forces they hoped to sustaine with more ease and abilitie, if on their first approach they could but put them to flight as it afterward hapned. For the Greek Armie consisting of forty Gallies, so soone as the fight beganne, at the verie first shock of the enemy, basely gaue place, and in a maze returned home. The Genoueses being quit from them, turned all their forces vpon the Venetians and Arragonois, who fought in the front. They fought there (according to all mens sayings) verie fiercely, & for two hours space it was not discerned vnto which side fortune inclined: But at Sunne-set the winde arose, which greatly troubled the Genoueses, who notwithstanding would not giue ouer, but fought more courageously; and for all it was night they would not leaue the battaile, choosing rather to dye than to giue place. The Venetians on the other side being mindefull of their reputation, were afflamed that they had not at the first ouercome them, being the stronger in shippes: For besides fortie Gallies of their owne, the Arragonois had thirtie. Other Authors neuertheless speake not of so many, but say, That diuers Gallies being carried away by force of the winde, could not come to fight. Now this bloudie conflict lasted all night euen till day. The night made the dangers of the fight more terrible. There was nothing to be heard but groanes and pittifull cries, clashing together of Gallies, and clattering of armour; and both the shoares echoed with the horrible noyse. All that darke night as, hath bene said, (and that which is most to be admired) in winter, the fight continued. It is thought that in the darke, the Genoueses ranne vpon their owne fellowes, the Venetians on Venetians, and the Arragonois, on their owne countymen. But when it was daie, the Sea being dyed red with blood of the dead bodies, made manifest how bloudie that night-encounter had bene on either side. The channell of Nigrepont was covered with bloudie carcases. with the furniture of suncke Gallies, and with a great quantitie of arrowes and darts, and with diuers abandoned Gallies which hulled vp and downe without Souldiours or conductors. At the last, Ponce Generall of the Arragonois being slaine and they by reason thereof being retired, the Venetians likewise, (because they were able to doe no more) quitted the place to the Genouefes.

The enimie likewise being fatished that they had giuen him place, reputing it for great honour, and imputing the victorie to himselfe, did in like manner with his people retire to his Campe. In this battaile were slaine Stephano Contareni Procurator of Saint Marke, Giuanni Steno, Benedicto Bembo, and Pancrazio Admirall of the Gulphe, dyed within few daies after of his hurtes. The Venetian Annallists affirme, That the one halfe onely of the Venetian Fleet fought at this battaile: which makes mee think that the streightnesse of the place was the cause thereof; and that therefore the Genouefes would not stirre from thence. It seemes likewise the victorie was as bloudie to him; for the Venetian afterward, challenging him to fight, he durst not accept it.

Giuanni Delfino who was present at this battaile (according to some Authors) reported at Venice, That the Venetians in this fight had the better; that they took eight and twenty of the enemies Gallies; that the Soldiours and Sailers in them were all slaine, with great numbers of others who diuersly perished: & that the Venetians had lost but foure Gallies. But forraigne Historians report the matter to haue hapned in the same manner as wee haue already mentioned at the Bosphorus of Thrace. But because no man should thinke that wee haue concealed or dissembled ought, chiefly in that we said that they fought all the night: Françisco Petrarcha the famous Poet, speaking of this cruell battaile, makes mention of it in these words. You haue overcome (saith he, writing to the Genouefes) content your selues least it be thought that ye haue forgotten your ancient customes. Wee haue seene the Bosphorus to swell with the blood of the Venetians your enemies, when at night a strong wind arising, yee were assailed by three mightie Nations, betweene Constantinople and Nigre-pont, fighting with the enemics against wind and tide. This is that which he writeth, with other matters to the same purpose. Blondus besides saith That the battaile continued all night euen till day without any intermission, and that which is most to be admired, in the midst of winter. Soone after this battaile, Pisani surpris'd two Genoa shippes laden with victuall which were going to Pera. Then perceiving that he could not draw the enimie to fight, after hee had staied there a while (victuall beginning to faile) he retired with the Armie of Arragon into Candie, where at leisure hee trimmed and repaired his Gallies. The Genouefes in like manner brought backe his halfe-broken to Genoa. The newes of that which hapned at the Bosphorus being reported at Venice, did greatly afflict the Citie: But the Senators were more alhamed than forrie, being highly displeased with the rashnesse of those who would fight in so discommodious a place, being accompanied with the forces of two mightie Princes, and yet could not vanquish the Genouefes whom they alone had so often overcome, and which is worst of all, they had quitted the place as though they had been vanquished, with great losse. Wherefore, because in time to come no more such rash faults might be committed, they decreed to send foure Prouidatori to euerie Armie, who should in all matters assist the Generall, and with him giue order for whatsoeuer should be expedient for the Common-wealth. Giuanni Delfino, Marco Cornari, Marini Grimaldo, and Murini Phalerio were sent thither in the same nature. These men being come into Candie, certaine Gallies were sent to scoure the Ponticke Seas, who hauing surpris'd certaine of the enemies shippes laden with corne and other merchandize, returned into the Island. After whose returne Paulo Lauretano, surnamed the Great, was commanded to goe to Cyprus with nine Gallies, from whence he brought to Venice diuers Marchants with rich merchandize.

Whilest these things were done neere to the Illands, foure Genoa Gallies entring the Gulphe, came on boote-haling euen to Histria: vpon these newes Marco Michale was commanded to hasten speedily thither with five Gallies to take them if it were possible: but whilest he made preparations for his journey the enimie went backe as speedily as he came. Much about the same time eight Gallies were sent to Sea vnder the command of Giuanni Sanuto, and not long after, nine others; of both which Pisani was made Generall. Who after he had sailed the Aegean and Ionian Seas, and being come as farre as Pera, did with admirable speede surpris'd diuers ships of Genoa, among whom were two Barzes, laden with rich merchandize, which were iudged to bee worth two hundred thousand Crownes, wherein were nine Gentlemen of Genoa with diuers Merchants. This being fortunately atchieued, vpon report that the Genoa fleet was coming, Pisani thought it euer better to go and assault the enimie, than to waite for him, and to make warre, rather in a forraigne Country than at home. Wherefore hauing chosen out of the whole fleet twentie Gallies he left Marco Michale with the residue for the garde of the Gulphe, and came with a prosperous winde into Sardinia, where he ioyned with the Armie of Arragon, which was of fortie Gallies and three Barzes, vnder the command of Bernardo Caprari. The Arragonois did at the same time besiege Algiers: the two fleets being there ioyned together, came to the Sea of Caralitana.

The Genouefes being puffed vp with pride for the battaile at the Bosphorus, departing from Genoa with three and fortie Gallies, commanded by Antonio Grimaldi went to seeke the enimie. Some say they fought neare to Cyrra; and others, at Callaris, which is a part of the Isle of Sardinia, from whence it is thought that the Gulphe tooke the name, and some say at Congeria. But wheresoeuer they fought, it is certaine, that so soone as the two Armies got sight one of another, they forthwith fell into order of battaile, and set forward with great courage to the encounter. The Genouefes calling to minde how that not long before they had vanquished them, albeit they were stronger than they, thereby promised to themselves the victorie: The Venetians attributed it to the incommodioufnesse of the place, rather than to the enemies valour; all of them resolving, that day to rvenge the disgrace and losse which they had sustained, or else to die in that place. Their Allies were of the like minde: whereupon they fought with as great courage as force. Some say that the Genouefes hauing descried the Venetian ensignes, were afraide: For hearing that the Venetian was coming to ioine with the Arragonois, they were desirous to fight with the Spaniards, before the Venetians should arriue. Now the Venetians with their Allies being ready to fight, determined to tie and make fast all their Gallies together, (ten choise Venetian Gallies excepted) which were committed to Giuanni Sanuto, to execute some enterprize, if neede should be. By this wee may easily imagine with what courage the Venetians fought that day. For hauing in this sort chained their Gallies together, they had determined either to vanquish, or die there, hauing taken from themselves all hope of flight. Some say that Giuanni Sanuto did first receiue the enimie with his ten Gallies, and that the maine Armie with the Barzes followed after, But it is not credible that such a battaile was so slightly begonne, or that ten Venetian Gallies would oppose themselves to three and fortie of Genoa, which would in an instant haue been inuicted by so great a number. It is more probable that these ten were set apart to come to the rescue, and that their Generall was commanded to runne a-thwart the enimie, when he should perceiue him most busied in the fight, and that by this meanes it fell out, that the Genouefes being assailed in front and in flanke, were the more easily vanquished. But how focuer it was done either by pollicie or force, or rather by both of them together, it is not certainly knowne. Yet it is most certaine, that they fought the same day very fiercely, and that at last the Genoa forces being wholly broken, after they had vanquished Grimaldi their Generall, out of the thickest of the presse, they fled as vanquished, and lost fiftie ships of warre; which being in possession of the Venetians and their Allies, were all (according to some Authors) with all their tackling, Mariners and Souldiers funke: because they meant altogether, if it were possible, to extirpe the name of Genoa; which they affirme to haue read in the Genouefes Histories. But in regard the quarrell betwixt them was not about mens liues, but only for for enlarging of their Dominions; and that in all the time past it was neuer seen, that either of these people did inhumanly murder their prisoners, it is hard to beleeue, that they did put them to death, as is reported; but that rather they fought to couer their owne disgrace by other mens faults.

The Venetian Histories make mention of two and thirtie Gallies taken from the enemy, and of great numbers of men slaine in the fight: And as for the prisoners, among whom were diuers Gentlemen, That some of them were sent to Venice, and therest of them into Spaine by the Arragonois.

Grimaldi with those vessells which he could gather together, retired with all speed to Genoa, where the report of that losse, being spread abroad through the Citie, caused so great sorrow and desolation, as though the Citie it selfe had bene taken. The two victorious Armies after the battaile, came and assailed Sardinia, where by force they tooke two Cities from the Genoueses; and afterwards departed the one from the other, they returned to their owne homes.

The Genoueses being daunted by this only ouerthrow, which was exceeding great, not being able of themselves to vp-hold their estate, had recourse to forraigne forces. They sent their Ambassadors to Giuovanni Visconte, who at the same time gouerned both Spirituall and Temporal matters at Milan. The summe of the Oration with the chiefe of the Ambassade made, was in a manner such as followeth: That the Genoueses fortune by one only defeat, was in such sort altered, as being in times past most great flourishing, was now weak and feeble, by being at last ouercome by a mightier enemy, whom they had in time past often vanquished: by means whereof they were no longer able to make resistance. But, notwithstanding that all things failed them with their fortune, yet neuertheless their hatred to the Venetians, was no whit diminished, but rather on the contrarie encreased: That they had rather hazard their ancient libertie, than to yeeld to the force of their capital enemy. And therefore they besought him (both for his profit and happie fortune) to accept of the Citie of Genoa her Inhabitants, Territorie, Sea, Hauen, Townes, and all other her Faculties, as well publike as priuate, and generally, all matters Diuine and Humane; All which they were commanded by the Genoueses to commend to his power and trust: earnestly beseeching him, that hee would be pleased to preferue by speedy aide his Genoa, her Citizens, with all that which belonged to them, and by his power to defend from the wrongs of the Venetians, those whom he had once accepted for his subiects; who would euer so continue, to the end that all men might see that they had not in vaine requested his aide and fauour.

We cannot sufficiently admire and grieve, to behold the mightiest people of Italie nexed after the Venetians, and those who had purchased so much honour and reputation at Sea, thus on a sodaine through despair, not only foolishly, but shamefully to haue subiected themselves, loosing their ancient libertie, which from the beginning they had so carefully kept and maintained. But, of a certaine, the Stoicks opinion is most true, who say, That all other passions disquiet humane vnderstanding, but that choller alone doth wholly ouerthrow it: in such manner as it happened at the same time to the Genoueses, who through hatred and wrath became mad distracted.

Visconte did willingly accept of their offer, and hauing courteously entertained the Ambassadors, hee entreated them to bee of good cheare, and told them that hee with his Allies would take an order, that so long as the Viscontes should prosper, the Genoueses should neuer repent to haue implored their aide: with this hope then he dismissed them, saying, That the assistance and aide of that familie, which they had so humbly craued, should neuer fail to beate back all forraigne iniuries which should threaten them: And so the Ambassadors tooke their leaue.

These newes being brought to Venice, (there being some likelihood of great warre with the Viscontes, by reason of the Genoueses) the Venetians beganne forthwith with to fortifie whatsoeuer they possessed in the firme Land; and allied themselves with the Carrarians, those of Escalla, of Aeste, the Gonzagues, and the Florentines in Tuscany. Some Authors say, that Visconte, as well in his owne name, as on the behalfe of the Genoueses, did by his Ambassadors seeke to procure a peace, in which negotiation they nominated Francisco Petrarca for the chiefe Ambassador, and that he could not obtaine it, though vpon great conditions; and they think that it so happened by the will of God, in regard of the famous and memorable victorie, which the Venetians soone after obtained of the Genoueses in Morea. The Genoueses, albeit that they had so unfortunately fought, would neuertheless persist in their obstinacie; For four of their Gallies did within a while after enter the Venetian Gulphe, and on a sodaine spoiled Fara, and Corfu, with certaine Islands of Dalmatia; where they surprized the Cities, spoiled and burnt them, being forthwith seconded by four others.

The Senate being moued at these newes, commanded fourteene Gallies to bee speedily armed, and Nicholao Pisani to hasten with them to meete the enemy: But the Genouefe was gone forth of the Gulphe, before this Arme arrived.

Pisani, to the end his journey should not bee altogether vnprofitable; failed towards the Pontick Sea, where meeting with no memorable action, hee retired into Dalmatia. Ten Gallies which were armed at Arbi came to him thither, which being ioyned to the residue, made vp the number of foure and twentie. It was reported euery where in the meane time, that the Genoueses hauing renewed their Arme (for a whole yeare was past since their losse on the lower Sea) had set forth fiue and twentie Gallies vnder the conduct of Pagano Doria; and that they were already departed from Genoa. Pisani hauing ioyned ten other Gallies of Giuovanni Sanuto to the foure and twentie of his owne, failed speedily into Sardinia to preient the enemy. Doria, (whether it were that fortune would not haue the two Armies meet, or whether hee did it of set purpose, which I rather beleeue) hauing thinned the Venetian Arme, so soone as the Venetians were gone from home, entered furiously into the Adriatick Gulphe, to waite rather on other mens streames, than on their owne, where in few daies hee surprized diuers vessells, who met him vnlookt for. From thence failing into Histria, hee tooke Parenza, which hee spoiled, and hauing taken thence the bodies of S. Mauro, and S. Charles, he burnt it.

The enemies comming into the Gulphe, with the taking of Parenza, occasioned a great feare and amazement in the Citie, no less than if the Genoueses had bene at their gates. Therefore, they speedily chained vp their Hauen, and placed a strong Garrison there, because they thought that the enemy would come directly to the Citie, who knew that their maine Arme was abroad. They planted Sentinells and Corps-de-guard ouer all the Citie, and sent forth light boats to discover the enemies designe; and this feare lasted till certaine newes was brought that the Genoa Arme was dislodged. Doria departing from Histria, met with a Venetian Barce on the maine, he sent three Gallies to encounter it, who became Masters thereof; the Merchants were taken with their merchandize, which was a very great bootie; for it was esteemed worth an hundred and eight and fortie thousand crownes. Within a while after, three Venetian Gallies were likewise taken going to Candie, to beearmed there with men and munition.

The Senate were greatly vexed that the Genoueses after so notable a losse received the yeare before, had in so short time raised themselves againe, in such manner, as the Venetians could hardly assure any place abroad, nor yet their Gulphe at home. And because they knew that the Genoueses were thus strengthened by the aide of Visconte, they resolved to wrap him in a Domestick warre, to cause him to forsake them. They determined then to renew their alliance with Charles King of Bohemia, with whom not long before they were allied against Maxim of Escalla. That being done, it was concluded, that he should passe with a mightie Arme into Itali against Visconte. And in the meane time the Venetians exchanged prisoners with the Genoueses.

Andrea Dandolo having gouerned the Common-wealth almost twelue yeares, deceased. After his death the Common-wealth was greatly afflicted abroade, and at home, during the most dangerous gouernment of Phalerio who succeeded him. For besides the sundry losses which it sustained at Sea in his time, it was assailed by two insupportable mischiefs, famine, and pestilence, and with terrible Earthquakes: And it escaped narrowly from loosing her liberty likewise, by his Devilish conspiracie. Dandolo died the sixt of September, and was honourably buried in S. Marks Church, neare to the Font.

M*arini Phalerio* Knight, and Earle of Val-Marine, being absent, was declared Prince. He was at the same time Ambassador for the Common-wealth, to the Pope: At the same time as the Senate were busied about the election of a new Prince, newes came that three Genoa Gallies were taken by the Venetians, neare to the Islands of Greece: The enemies Armie likewise entering the Adriatick Gulph tooke certaine Merchant ships, and hauing in a short space gotten a great bootie, departed as speedily as they came.

After the election of Phalerio, Pisani who commanded abroade for the Common-wealth, and did alone at that time conduct that mightie Venetian Sea-Armie of five and thirtie Gallies, and two and twentie lesser vessels, hauing notice that the enemies were abroade came and cast Anchor, and waited for them in the Isle of Sapiatia, neare to Morea. Doria, General of the Genoueses came thither so soone as hee, with an intent to fight. Blondus saith, that they fought at Sea neare to the Island, and that after a long and dangerous combat, the Genoueses got the victorie: Pisani being taken prisoner with five thousand beside. If they did fight, and imploied their whole forces, the fortune of Pisani and the rest is to be excused, because the euents of warre are diuers and vncertaine, and in mine opinion he is to be praised, in that he rather chose to die, or to be taken, than basely to flie. But the Venetian Histories say, that the whole Armie was lost that day without fight or slaughter, one Galley excepted, which escaped. If it be so, wee may assuredly thinke that the Venetians were surprised by the Genoueses in the same manner, as the Venetians did the Genoueses certaine yeares before at Chariste, vnder the command of the same

Pisani,

Pisani, (as some say) and that he was taken in his owne snare, and that the losse was much greater to the Common-wealth than the enemy knew of.

It is reported that the day before this unfortunate losse, diuers prodigies appeared to them, and among the rest a great number of Crows fought ouer the fleet, part of which were so beaten by their aduersie partie, as the fethers and blood dropped downe abundantly into the Venetian gallies: Besides, a fayler leaping out of one gallie into another, was on a sodaine swallowed vp by a sea-monster. The Citie being troubled at the report of this losse, the people said that they neuer received a greater: and they did beleue that their state would haue bene wholly ouerthrowne, if the 10 victorious Genoueses should at that instant haue come directly to the Citie. Where was their Capitaine? where their Gallies? where were their forces readie to haue beaten him forth of the haven, and to haue defended the Citizens? They would haue bene wholly ruined, if the enemy (as it often happeneth, not knowing how to make vse of his victorie) had not failed some where else, as of a certaine it fell so
 20 out. For victorious Doria satisfying himselfe with his fortunate exploit, returned with his whole Armie to Genoa: where being no lesse admired for this notable victorie, than for the bootie of which he brought home, he was welcomed with great ioy, and general applause of all men.

But the Venetians (as their constancie in aduersities hath euer bene admirable) did not spend this small time of relaxation from warre in idleness, but did forthwith 20 leue new forces, and in a short space did set forth foure armed gallies to guard the Gulph. Yet neuertheless they were not so soone readie, but that three of the en-mies gallies hauing before entred the Gulph, tooke certaine ships of burthen returning from Candie to Venice, which would haue greatly molested the inhabitants of Histria and Dalmatia, if their attempts had not bene speedily refuted.

In this state stood their affaires, when as on the land side truce was taken for foure monethes with Visconte. But in the meane time a galley of Genoa called Grimaldi meeting on the coast of Morea with the same Venetian galley, which as we said did 30 escape from Sapia, tooke it, then soone after another wherein was Guido Trenti- jano the Gouernour of Candie, and soone after, another in the haven of Frascan-
 And the boldnesse of the galley was such, as it failed from thence to get bootie euen as farre as Grada. The Venetians not being able to endure so great a disgrace sent forth three gallies, not onely to hinder her from committing any further harme, but to be reuenged for what had bene already done. The charge thereof was committed to Nicholao Iustiniano, who with those forces went to expulse the enemy.

Phalerio in the meane time hauing gouerned the Common-wealth nine whole moneths, was possessed with a desire to make himselfe king thereof, whereunto this wicked man had almost opened the way. This enemy to his owne countrey, and to 40 the Senate who had elected him to the dignitie, did determine to seize vpon the sei-gnorie, and to kill the chiefe of the Senate: And the more easily to effect it, hee had hired diuers of the common sort to exhort this wretched murder, and some likewise (which is to be admired) of the nobilitie, so as mischiefe doth euer find fauourers. The murder was committed to sixtene euill disposed persons, who were of the chiefe of the conspiracie, all which had a day appointed them to come to the Pallace with threecore more well armed. They concluded among themselves that on the fourteenth day of April, they would cast false reports about the Citie, That the enemy was at hand, and that his gallies were already before the haven, at which 50 rumour the Prince should forthwith command all men to take Armes, and cause the great bell of the high Tower to be rung. At which signall, those of the conspi-racie coming forth of their houses well armed, should by sundrie waies come to the Pallace to receive the Prince and Senates commandement, where seizing on the gates, they should kill all the Senators, with as many as were come thither to debate on matters concerning the Common-wealth, and generally the whole Nobilitie

bilirie, and then Phalerio should no more be called Duke but Lord. Some say that they refused so soone as they should have disannulled the order of the Senators, to commit the government of the Citie to the people.

pales the bull of

But it is most certaine that a Commonwealth well governed hath still benee beloved of God, and much more when it is governed by iustice, so, as of all earthly governments, I thinke the same to be most pleasing vnto him which Plato calleth Aristocratie, which doth not obey the commaundement of one alone, and which being most good, (as well in opinion of that learned man, as in the iudgement of all wise men,) hath euer beene esteemed most worthe of praise: Because it is a true agreement and vniion of the chiefe fort, and such is the government of the state of Venice, which hauing benee oftentimes preferred before by the diuine providence, was of a certaine much more at this instant. For succour came to the Senators from thence where they least of all expected it. There was a man called Beltrand a popular person, and one of the chiefe of the conspiracie. He the verie night before this massacre should haue benee committed, being prouoked (as it is to be thought) with repentance for so horrible a crime, came secretly the euening of the same night to the house of Nicholas Leon one of the Senators, and his gossip, and hauing taken him aside, discouered the whole matter: telling him, That being stirred vp with loue to his country, and with an exceeding great affection to the Senate, he could not conceale such a mischief. And after he had named the chiefe of the conspiracie with Phalerio,

*By what means

he besought him that he would haue him in remembrance, that it might not be imputed to him for a fault, that hee had at the beginning consented to the conspiracie against the Senate and his country. Leon was amazed, and with the heinousness of the matter, could not for a time make him an answer, but the feare of the publike and particular danger awaked him. Beltrand being gone home, he speedily sent for the chiefe of the Senat, those of the councill of the ten, and other officers of the Citie to come to speak with him. So soone then as the Senators were come to his house, and such of the common sort as had not bene named by the accuser to haue bene acquainted with the plot: those sixteen which were chiefe of the conspiracie, were the same very night apprehended, and being conuicted of the crime, were murdered, and with ropes let downe from the top of the Pallace vpon the Columns. It is reported that Philippa Calandriero was one of the number, who was one of the best architects and engrauers of his time, whose skill the Senate had vsed in their publike buildings. It is thought that the new buildings as well in the duall Pallace as in the market-place, which doth much exceed the old, was of his workmanship. I would haue concealed his name, if I had not thought it a cruell deed to deprive so excellent a wit of his praise. For in this matter, whereof we now speake, I am so farr from mentioning the names of the conspirators, as on the contrarie, I thinke those that haue named them, to haue done indifferently, who in thinking thereby to shame them, haue for euer made them inrolled. For there is no man how wicked soeuer, but doth in some sort desire to leaue some remembrance of himselfe to posteritie: witness that vnknoone fellow, who of set purpose did burne the Temple of Diana in Ephesus, who being demanded wherefore he did it, answered that he determined by some notable villanie (seeing by vertue he could not) to leaue some memorie behinde him after his death. It is said, that for to raze out his remembrance, it was decreed that none should set downe his name in histories: The which was wisely done. For it was a greater punishment to quench his memorie, than to take away his life. Domestick examples might haue remembered our Citizens of their dutie: For after Tepulo his conspiracie, the Senate expressly forbade, that none should dare to write, paint, or engrauce, the name or armes of Biancamano, nor of any of his complices. And besides, whereas our ancestors would haue the effigies of all the Princes from the beginning of the Citie vntill that present time, to be represented in order in the hall of the great councill: to the end that the picture of wicked Phalerio should not be seene in the ranke of Princes, they decreede that his place should should remaine void, and be covered with a blacke vail. Their opinion was that they could no sharper punish those who had transgressed against the Commonwealth, than wholly to blot out their remembrance. And we in like manner, hauing named the authors of the conspiracy, because it should be knowne who had in times past conspired against the country, haue expressly concealed the name of the rest for to punish them thereby, as we haue done others.

Phalerio likewise was by the Senates commaundement the same day punished with death, his bodie was carried into a little boate to the Church of the Twinnes, being accompanied by eight Sergeants, who carried torches. It is reported that 10 commissioners who were appointed to enquire of this matter, did discouer in eight daies space aboute foure hundred: A great many of them were put to death, some were hanged, others beheaded, and some were flung into the Sea. Diuers were pardoned, who had promised to aide the conspirators, but they were not made acquainted with their practise: but they were so noted, as some for shame, and for feare, forsooke the Citie with their wiues and children, the number of whom was about fife hundred: Phalerio his Pallace was giuen to the Church of the holy Apostles.

He which discouered the conspiracie was not onely pardoned, but they gaue him a yearely pension of a thousand ducates, and besides, a Senators place: But he thinking it a meane recompence for such a peece of seruice, did publiquely accuse them of ingratitude, detracting from them in euery place. The Senate being prouoked at his impudencie, had like to haue put him to death, but the remembrance of his late good seruice made them to abstaine: whereupon, hauing taken from him the publike recompence, he was banished for ten yeares to Ragusa. From whence departing before the prefixed time, hee died in his iourney towards Hungarie. During these troubles Mario Cornari governed the Commonwealth as Vice-Prince. Then at the next assembly Giovanni Gradonico surnamed Naso, was chosen Duke.

Bout the same time Bernardo Insimiano, departed from Venice with seven gallies: He hauing fortunately scoured the Seas for a time, did greatly molest the Genoueses, and would haue done much more, if peace had not opportunely ensued for the good of either people, this warre hauing lasted fife yeares. of them, and with their allies, and Armes were laid aside, as well by Sea as Land, against Bernabo and Galeas Viscount who succeeded John. Then the prisoners taken in the warres were on each side set at libertie: whereupon the Genoueses to the number of two thousand being deliuered on the feast day of Marie Magdalen, went by couples, carrying each of them a burning taper in his hand to giue thanks vnto God at the Church of the same Saint. This spectacle moued the whole Citie to deuotion, so as ever since, that feast-day hath bene solemnized, which before then was not obserued.

Armes being laid aside by Sea and by Land, and the Citie restored to her ordinarie trafficke, diuers shippes failed to Cyprus and to other Faïres and Martes of the Aegean Sea, who for their more safetie (for albeit they feared not the Genoueses, yet the incursions of the Barbarians kept them in much awe) had certaine armed Gallies for their conuoy commanded by Bernardo Infianin, who hauing brought them to a safe Port, returned speedily into Dalmatia: from whence hauing taken order for the affaires of the Prouince he brought backe his Armie in safetie to Venice. Giovanni Baldo was the first that was sent to gouerne Val-marín: that Earldome being fallen to the Venetians by the death of Phalerio.

Hungarie made preparations against the Venetians) Marco Cornari, and Marin Grimani were sent into Hungarie, from whence they returned within a while after, hauing found the Hungarian disposed to Warres. Some Authors ascribe that the cause of the Kings hatred to the Venetians, was, because they denied him shipping for the passage of his Armie into Italic, at such time as hee would haue made warre on Queene Ioune. But it is most certaine that this King was vanquished by the Venetians at Zara, before that he beganne any warre in Italic. But whether it were on this occasion, or for any other, as some say (for wee know not herein whom to follow) without all doubt the Ambassadors were sent into Apulia to the Hungarian who (as some Authors say) made truce with him for eight yeares, and as others say for ten. But at the beginning of the Genoueses warre, (albeit the time of the truce was not yet fully expired) he beganne to quarrell with the Venetians about Dalmatia, and there were presumptions that hee would forth-with make warre vpon them, had not the mediation of the Emperour Charles the fourth caused him to giue ouer, who commanded him to itay till the truce was ended: whereupon he deferred the warre till this present: which the Senate plainly foreseeing, made them (as it is thought) to hasten the peace with the Genoueses, the which they had before denied them, when they stubbornly craued it: to the end that being freed from the Genoan warre, they might with more ease intend the other, as they had done.

King of Hungarie demanded of the Venetians.

Some Annales make mention how that Cornari and Grimani the Ambassadors, might at the same time haue easily thinned that warre, if they would in the Common-wealths name haue promised him, a white horse, as a yearely tribute for Dalmatia. The Venetians not intending thereby to wrong their right to Dalmatia refused it, whereupon so soone as the truce was expired, hee entred furiously into Dalmatia, without farther denouncing of warre. It is reported that at his first coming, he brought so great an Armie, as at one time he besieged Zara, Scia, Spalatra, Trabu, and Nona. The Venetians (who doe nothing rashly) measuring the enemy by themselves, did not imagine that he would so soone haue bene in the field, by reason whereof they had not furnished the Prouince with necessaries. But when they heard how that all the Cities almost of Dalmatia were besieged by the Hungarians, they speedily provided shipping, Souldiers, munition, and victualls, and therewith furnished all those Cities, and hauing taken this order, they thought that the Cities, Islands, and Castles, should be so sufficiently and faithfully defended by those whom they had sent thither, as in the end, the warre should be tedious to the Hungarians: when on a sodaine, because he would keepe the Venetians occupied in sundrie places, hauing secretly allied himselfe with Francisco Carrario, he passed into Italic with a hundred thousand fighting men, without the great supplies of the Duke of Austria, and the Patriarch of Aquileia, and came and encamped on the Treuisani. The Earles of Colalta with diuers other Lordes, did on a sodaine take part with the Hungarian, who in a short space tooke Coniglian by composition, where Zacharie Costareno was Gouernour, after that Sacilla, and from thence he came and besieged Treuiso. The Venetians albeit they were sufficiently busied in Dalmatia, yet neuertheless vpon the first newes of the Kings comming into Italic, they fortified Treuiso with victualls and munition, and sent thither Marco Iustiniano, Gionanni Delfino, and Pauo Loretano, that they might together prouide for the affaires of the warre. The King in the meane time hauing published the alliance with Prince Carrario, forbade on paine of life that none should forrage or spoile the Territorie of Padua vpon any occasion whatsoeuer.

Gionanni

Giovanni Delfino being absent was subrogated in his sted. He being called from Treuiso, where he executed his Office, could not obtaine any safe conduct from the King, who lay in Camp not far from thence, for his free passage. We may hereby easily perceiue, how much this King was incensed against the Venetians: yet neuertheless hee came forth of the Citie at the same time, on the back-side thereof, being well accompanied. It is not certainly knowne whether the Citie were assailed before or after the Dukes departure: Those whom we follow doe greatly varie herein: All Authors agree in this, that the King hauing made an approach, with his engines of batterie did furiously assaile the Citie; and that at this assault diuers of his Captaines died there, and among the rest, one of his owne neare Kinsmen, and that the Citie was brauely defended by the Venetians.

The King being wearied that his affaires went no better forward, and out of hope at that time to take the Citie, leaving certaine troupes to continue the siege, hee returned into Hungarie. The Venetians being incensed against Carrario, called home Marino Morosino their Magistrate from Padua, (for that Citie euer since it was freed from the Tyrannie of Alastin, had still a Venetian Magistrate), they commanded moreover that none should carrie them any salt, and the Citizens were forbidden to traffick any more with the Paduans. Then they leuied forces in Germanie, the which being come through the territorie of Vincenza, were incamped on the banks of the Riuer Brente. This Riuer was swelled by reason of the raine, and growne so deepe, as it could by no means be foorded, whereby the Almaine troupes were constrained to tarrie on the banks, till such time as the water being fallen, that they might passe ouer and ioyne with the Venetians, whereof those of the Camp being aduertized by their Spies, speedily sent certaine troupes of theirs to surprize the Almaines, who dreamed on no such matter. Their attempt was not vaine: For the whole companie by the unexpected coming of the enemies, was broken and put to flight, and the greatest part of them slaine on the place.

In the meane time Marco Iustiniano, furnished the Great, was sent to Treuiso to command there in Gionanni Delfino's sted. Not long after, fūue and twentie Senators were appointed to ouer-see the affaires of the Warre: And shortly after truce being taken with the enemy for fūue Moneths, Ambassadors were sent into Hungarie to the King, to treat of peace, namely, Andrea Contareni, Michael Phalerio, and Beni- tendio.

ten to the Secretarie: But they returned without effecting what they went for. In this interim, the truce being expired, the enemy tooke Serrauall. But the Commonwealth received a great losse in Dalmatia. For the maine warre being in Italie, the Senate were constrained to draw the greatest part of their forces forth of the Province, and not being able by reason of their Domestick warre, to raise the siege of Spalatra, Sacco, Tribu, and of diuers other small Townes not far from thence, they were all yielded to the King. Enona wherein Giovanni Iustimano commanded was bravely defended, and famine it selfe could not daunt the courage of the generous Venetian, to cause him in any sort consent to yeeld. It is reported that the scarcity of all necessaries was so great in Enona, as the Souldiers abstained not from eating all manner of meates, how vile and vnwholesome soeuer. The enemy likewise surprized Zara, and it was supposed to be done by the practise of Carraro, yet nevertheless the Castle held still out for the Venetian.

Now the Venetians holding the affaires of Dalmatia for lost, and those of Treviso having bene a long time in great hazard, they resolved againe to send Ambassadors to the King to conclude a peace with him on such conditions as they could. Pietro Trevisano, Giovanni Gradonico, and the Secretarie Bontenlio were sent thither, who obtained peace on these conditions, That whatsoever the Venetians had till then possessed from the Fanaticke Gulph, euen to Durazzo, should remaine to King Lewis: and that the Venetians should wholly giue ouer their right to Dalmatia: As concerning the other Lands which lay neare to the Gulphe, and on the hither side thereof, the Venetians should haue the one halfe thereof, and that the King should redeliver to the Venetians whatsoever hee had taken from them in Histria, in the Treuisan, and in the Countie of Ceneda: promising, not to suffer any Dalmatian to vse the trade of a Pyrate, nor to come into their Ports, & Islands, and that he would take order that the navigation should be as free and safe along the coast of Dalmatia for the Venetians, as it had bene in times past. By reason of this peace more necessarie than Honourable, the Venetian Princes left Dalmatia forth of their Titles. Their Officers, which they had there, being called home, were not permitted to bring thence their goods, albeit it was expressely mentioned in the treatie of peace, that it should be lawfull for all Venetians who were then dwelling in Dalmatia, to ship away their goods and mouebles, which they held in the Province. Herein the Hungarian infringed the Articles of peace, by not fulfilling the contents thereof: But the Venetians thought it best, in so dangerous a season, to dissemble that wrong, rather than to reuenge it by a new Warre.

Peace then being made with Lewis, three Ambassadors were sent into Germanie to the Emperour Charles, Marco Cornari, Giovanni Gradonico, and Lorenzo Celfo. The Historians make no mention why they were sent. Two of them, having left Celfo with the Emperour, returning home-wards without effecting what they went for, and passing through Germanie, were surprized by a Prince of the Countrie, and basely carried away by force into a Castle, an absolute place of retreat for thees. Celfo vnderstanding what had hapned to his fellowes, came by another way to Seigna, and from thence to the Sea-side, from whence hee safely sailed to Venice. Within a while after he was sent with an Armie for the guard of the Gulphe: About the spring-time of this yeare, the contagious sicknesse began againe: The Sommer following, Prince Delfino died, the fifth yeare of his Government scarcely expired: and was buried in the Church of the Typpines.

Lorenzo

Lorenzo Celfo being absent was chosen in his place. Twelve of the Senate were speedily in the Commonwealths name sent to congratulate him, and to bring him in a Galley to Venice. When he drew neare to the Citie, the whole Senate went to meet him, and receiued him in the Bucentauro. Vittor Pisani was sent in his stead to guard the Gulph. It is reported that the Princes Father did for a time forbear to come and see his Sonne, because he would not be enforced to salute him bare-headed; as though it had beene an vnseemely and vnheard-off matter, to see a Father inferior to his Sonne in dignitie. But hee behaued himselfe herein, I will not say vndiscreetly, though like an ignorant person: he was so vnskillfull in the affaires of the world, and customes of his owne Countrie, that hee did not vnderstand that the same Honour was not giuen to his Sonne, but to the Majestic of the Commonwealth represented in him. It may be that he had heard (and so he was the more to be excused) the discourses of morall Philosophers, which make a question, Whether a Father ought to giue place to his Sonne, being inuited with soueraigne dignitie. Those which are best learned in that discipline, say, That in publike he ought to doe so, but that at home and in priuate, the Sonne ought chiefly to honour and respect the Father.

About the same time, the Duke of Austria came to Venice with the Ambassadors, which were (as hath bene said) surprized in Germanie. His coming thither was reported to be but only to see the Citie, which as hee had heard was builded on the marishes. The Prince with diuers of the Senate did honourably receiue him in the Bucentauro, and brought him to the Pallace of the Cornari, neare to Saint Lucies Church, prepared for him by the Commonwealth: who so soone as hee had seen the singularities of the Citie, and giuen them thanks both in generall and particular, for the curtesies which he had receiued, he returned into Germanie.

In the Winter-time of the same yeare, the King of Cyprus attended by a Roiall traine, arrived with three Gallies at Venice; who being receiued likewise by the Commonwealth, and brought to the same lodging, where some few Moneths before the Duke of Austria had laine, did the morrow after in S. Marks Church Knight Andreas, surnamed Giovanni, who was appointed Gouverneur of Treviso: Then departing for France, he was accompanied by Prince Celfo, with the most part of the Senate as farre as Marghera.

had beene at Venice, a great rebellion hapned in Candie by the Venetians, who dwelled in the Island, whereby the Commonwealt had like to have lost it. The Senate had decreed in regard of their excessive charge for the warre to raise a certaine tribute on the Candioti. At the publishing of this decree, all the Gentlemen almost (a few excepted) did on a sodaine revolt, who laying hands on Leonardo Dandulo the Gouvernour of the Island, and the Prosidatori, they surprized all the ships of burthen that were in the Haven, which were come thither for the vintage, with all the merchants that were in it. In this tumulte they hastily chose Marco Gradonico surnamed Bayardo for their Captaine, who was (othetwize) a verie discrete person.

Dominico Michaeli, who at that time guarded the Gulph, having notice of this tumult of the Candioti, did speedily send a Galley to aduertize the Prince and Senate thereof. These newes did greatly grieve the whole Citie, and that worthily, because the report was, that the Authors of the rebellion were of the chiefest families of Venice. What worse act could the Greeks and the Islanders haue committed, which were neither borne at Venice, nor issued from the Venetians? It was to be feared that they would haue kindled a greater flame, and would become execrations of other mens furie, being glad to behold the dominion and state of the Venetians to be dissolved by their quarrels and dissensions, seeing by other meanes they could not effect it. It was decreed to send three of the Senate to the chiefe of the Colonie, who should by exhortations and aduertisements put them in mind of their dutie due to their countrey, and thrust them from their wicked designs, with ample authoritie to reduce them to their obedience, on such conditions as they should thinke most expedient. Pietro Souranza, Andrea Zeno, and Marco Marosino were sent thither.

It is reported that five more did soone after follow them: but the first and last Ambassadors were to no purpose, those of the Island not onely refusing to give them audience, but to receive them. The Ambassadors perceiving that warre must needs end the businesse, determined to depart thence in the Venetian galleys, who returning from the Faiges of Grecia, were by chance arrived there. The Captaine of the galleys being readie to hoist saile, did furiously seize upon the inhabitants whom he found in the Haven, and at Sea, and brought away three hundred of them prisoners to Venice.

The Senate vpon the returne of the Commissioners, resolved by a generall consent, to make warre vpon those perfidious Colonies, and the residue of the Island, who had openly revolted from their obedience, and did particularly banish diuers of the chiefe of the rebellion, whom they had proclaimed enemies to the Commonwealth: But first of all, they dispatched messengers to the Pope, the Emperour Charles, Leuis King of Hungarie, Isabel Queene of Sicily, and to all Christian Princes and peopell almost, to let them vnderstand of the treacherous and vnworthie rebellion of their Colonie in Candie, & to entreate them if they would not give them aide and assistance to reuenge such an iniurie, at the leastwise not to hinder them from doing it; and that they would not aide their rebels, though they should request it; That they knew well enough that it was notorious to the whole world, that the Citie of Candace in Candie was a Colonie of the Venetians; and that the Venetians were scattered ouer the whole Island. That it was lawfull for Fathers when their children are stubborne and disobedient, and that they cannot by entreaties nor threatnings reduce them to their obedience, to vse the rod to chastise them: That the Venetians meaning was, seeing they could not by gentlenesse and faire meanes bring the Candioti to the remembrance of their dutie, to attempt to doe it by Armes: the which they did soone hope to doe, if they were not aided by some forraigne power. And that they should performe the parts of good Princes and true friends to the Venetians, if they would permit that perfidious Colonie, to receive from their mother, vnto whom they owe their being, the chastisement which it had deserved.

The Ambassadors were in all places friendly heard and entertained, and there was no man, but in detestation of the Candioti fact, did liberally offer them all assistance. In the meane time they leuied a mightie Armie, and made Dominico Michaeli General thereof, who was before, Prouditor of the Gulph; and the land-Armie was committed to Luchin Vermio of Verona who was expressly sent for to Venice for the same purpose: He hauing receiued his oath from the Prince well and faithfully to serue the Commonwealt, did forthwith receiue the publike ensignes: Great summes of money were leuied on the Citizens, as well to begin the warre as to continue it. Vermio, so soone as all the troups were assembled, and the fleet readie, to the end he might not be ignorant with what forces he fought, made a general muster of his Armie, and found that he had a thousand horse, and two thousand foote, not accounting the sailers, and those that rowed in the galleies.

The fleet which consisted of three and thirtie galleies, and eight ships of burthen, leaving Venice on the ninth of Aprill, arrived about the seventh of May at Frefca, a place verie neere to Candace. But during these preparations, certaine Gentlemen of Candace, hauing by chance vnderstood what had beene concluded at Venice after the returne of the Commissioners, and being certified that they were not of the number of the banished, hoping of pardon began secretly to fauor those which remained faithfull and obedient to the Venetians. For diuers at the beginning not allowing of such a wicked practise absented themselves from the Citie, and retired to their Castles and Houses of pleasure in the Island. The chiefe Authors of the revolt, considering the great danger which threatened them, not onely from their enemies, but from their owne Citizens, were afraid least those whom they perceived to wauer, would by some good offices practise somewhat against them by the aide of those which were absent. For there was likelihood that those who at the beginning had opposed themselves against their designs, would forthwith vpon the arrival of the Venetian Armie fall vpon them: And notwithstanding that many of them were of fundrie opinions, yet no man durst propound that which one alone by the aduice of one particular person must presume to execute.

This man whosoever he was, dealt with one named Calergo, the Pneumaticke, and hauing set before him the entire dominion of the Island, perswaded him to kill all those, who did continue in the Venetians obedience; and for this purpose to draw great numbers of Greeks to his partie. This Calergo consented thereunto, and came first of all to Mopilla, a pleasant countrey house, where he assailed Andrea Cornari, and slew him. It is reported that Calergo had in times past bene his guest, and had bene euer succored and defended by him: And that so soone as Cornari saw him come armed, he did on a sodaine demand wherefore he came: who made answer that he was sent to kill him. Whereupon he put him in minde of his ancient hospitalitie, and other good turnes which he had receiued from him, for which, he entreated him not to kill the man vnto whom he was so infinitely bound. The murthrer extolling libertie, said: That for it he would forget all hospitalitie and other bonds of friendship, and that he was come to deliuer his countrey (which men so deeply affect) from cruell bondage.

After Cornari his death, he did in fundrie places pursue diuers other faithfull seruants to the Venetians. Gabriel Veniero, Marini and Lorenzo Pascali were slaine, one at his farme at Pulla, and the other at Melissa. Lorenzo Gritti, at Pestrin, then Zannabio Iustiano, & Leonardo Abraham with diuers others, who tasted the furious crueltie of the murthrer.

The Greeks waxing more bold by meanes of Calergo his executions, came with great arrogancie, & assailed the Nobilitie, saying, That they would haue ten naturall Greeks to be of the Senate, and that in their absence nothing should be determined or concluded. But this base multitude, who at the beginning were foolish, hauing at the last lost all sence and reason, did by their continuall clamors affright the Senate, and threatened to breake open the prisons, if they did not deliuer them all the Venetian prisoners that were there, that they might murder them.

In the meantime he that suborned Calergo, intending wholly to raze out the Latine name in the Island, sent for his murderer to come to a certaine place two miles distant from the Citie to conferre with him about the betraying of the Citie: willing rather that the government of the Island should fall to Calergo and the Greeks than to the Venetians. Vpon the way he fell into the hands of those whom Marco Gradonico the Gouvernour had sent for to take him. For the Gouvernour with others, so soone as they heard tell that they had slaine the Venetian Gentlemen, whereunto not any but one man had consented, did presently send to seize vpon Calergo. For they feared that this Greeke hauing committed such a villainous deede, would still practise greater crueltie. This wicked man being taken, and brought to the Citie, in reuenge of the Venetian blood which he had spilt, was thrown downe from the top of the Pallace vpon the point of swords, and his bodie being cut into diuers pieces, was cast vpon the Citie dunghill.

The lightnesse
of the multitude

This spectacle was verie pleasing to the people. Whereby we may obserue, how great the inconstancie of a multitude is, which dependeth on the verie least motions: and that their loue or hatred respecteth not the deed, but onely the fortune of him whom they follow. A little before, those of Candace fauoured Calergo, but so soone as they saw him drawne to execution, they wholly forsooke him, and iudged him worthe of death. The nobilitie being daunted with those mischiefs and with the great warlike preparations which were made, the authors of the rebellion perceiving that they could not of themselves long hold Candie at that stay, and though they could, yet were not their forces sufficient to resist the Venetians, they began to consult (for they resolved not to returne to the Venetians obedience) into whose hands they should commit the entire possession of the Island. The Genoueses alone were held fittest for it, as well for their power by Sea, as for the ancient enuie which they did beare to the Venetian greatnesse. And therefore they concluded to send ten Ambassadors to Genoa, the one halfe Italians, and the other Greeks. Two of these being intreated to deliuer their opinion, did boldly answer that they thought it fittest to send to Venice to the Prince and Senate, offering (if so they thought good) that they would not onely be of the Ambassade, but rather to take the whole charge vpon themselves if need were, assuring them in so doing they should obtaine a generall pardon, to their great profit, and for the honour and dignitie of the Commonwealt.

On the contrary, others being moued with enuie said, that it behoued them to send to Genoa. It is reported that Marco Gradonico, one of those who was of opinion to send to Venice, being called into the Senate, vnder pretence of some publicke matter, was murdered by some of the contrarie party, who were hidden in the Chappell of the Pallace. And the residue who did in any sort seeme to leane to his opinion, were in danger likewise to haue beene murdered. They were diuers daies consulting about this businesse, but at last the contrarie faction preuailling, the Ambassade was resolved on for Genoa. VVherefore hauing made readie a galley for the Ambassadors, it hapned by chance that Georgio Molino, Bishop of Coron, a man of singular affection towards his countrey, was at the same time in the Island, who hauing vnderstood of the Candioti reuolt, was come thither to procure (if he could) a peace, and as he was returning thence, (by reason he could not doe that he came for) one of those who at the beginning were of opinion to send to Venice, did secretly with him to aduertize the Prince and Senate, that they had sent to Genoa to deliuer the Island into their hands.

Candioti.

This being knowne at Venice by *Molino*s letters, Ambassadors were speedily dispatched to Genoa, to entreate them not to meddle with the Isle of Candie, according as they had before time promised. The letters being read in open Senate, they answered the Candioti, That the Genoueses could not grant their request without breach of their publicke faith; that they were verie forie both in generall and and particular, that it was not lawfull for them to succour so noble an Island, and (as they vnderstood by that Ambassade) which did greatly affect the Genoueses. They wished them therefore to depart, and to seeke aide elsewhere, and not to expect any from them: in regard they had sworn to the contrary.

The Candioti being dismissed without any hope of aide, returned home to their houses. The Venetians in the meane time had made haft, and were come (as hath beene said) about the seuenth of May to Frefca. Betwene that place, and the Citie, there is a verie high hill, called Strombula, and neere to it two others, so neere the one to the other, as a farre off you would not thinke them to be three hills, but one.

Armie at Frefca.

Towards the East there is in it a rough way, but so narrow as two armed souldiers can hardly march in front, and on each side are deepe downefalls, and so vneasie to passe through, as the entrie of those places being stopped, a few men are able to keepe out many thousands. In one part of the mountaine which lieth beneath those narrow waies, great abundance of salt water issueth forth of a caue, which commeth (as it is thought) by secret condaits from the Sea, which is not farre from thence: which place the Islanders call Almiron. Those waters are reported in Winter to be somewhat fresh, in regard of the streames which fall downe into them from the neighbour mountaines, which make a small river (seruing for the vse of certain miles) which a mile thence on the North side entereth into the Sea. From the mouth of the river to the Citie by Sea, is but an open shallow Road. The Armie peraduenture landing at this place, an hundred souldiers comming rashly as farre as the milles were surprized by the enemy, and cut in peeces; from whom being dead, the Greeks pluckt out their tongues, and cut off their priuie members, tearing the one with their teeth, and wiping their hinder parts with the other. This reproach did more incense the Venetians against the Greeks, than the slaughter.

I Perswade my selfe that yee are not ignorant (hauing sailed so large a distance of Sea) of the cause why at this time yee are sent into this Island. We are come hither to punish the disloyaltie of the new inhabitants of Candace, who haue strayed from the naturall condition of Venetians, & also to chastise the audacious rashnesse of certaine Greekes. Now therefore by how much more the Venetians cause is most iust, by so much the more ought we to strue to get the victory for feare (which I would be forie) least if we be ouer come through our owne negligence the Venetians cause will be reported to be no better than their Armie. Yee are to fight with an enemy, who by nature is no souldier, nor experienced in Armes, who hath not throwne himselfe headlong into this warre for any trust he hath to his owne forces, but by his owne retchlesse conseruie. Besides, they haue neither caudlerie, Armour, nor fortaine aide, nor indeed anything wherein they may hope, sauing in their owne folly, by which they will be easily ouerthrowne, as they haue inconsiderately cast themselves into this danger. One thing we may feare, which is, that being shut up in their walles, they will thereby for a while deprive vs of our victorie. But being as they are proud and presumptuous, I hope they will silit forth, which if they doe, and you being such as you ought to be, the victorie is ours. The place besides where we are, doth constraime vs to fight: for this Promie is enuironed with the Sea, and in it we haue no place of retreat. Our fleet so soone as we were landed, hoisted their sails, and is gone to besiege the Citie. We must then either die betwixt the shore and these mountaines, or with victorie march to the Citie, to meeete againe with our fleet. And yet I doubt not, if any gallies were heere, and should see vs fight vpon the shore, they would not receive our fugitive souldiers, but would rather put to Sea, and suffer vs to be slaine heere as base and cowardly people. I thought good to speake this vnto you, to the end ye may vnder-stand, that we must not onely fight valiantly, (for our cause is better, and we are valiantier than they) but, whether we will or no, if we desire to liue, we must shew our selues courageous in regard of the difficultie of these places. Moreover the wealth of this Island doth exhort us to winne the victorie, whereof if we become masters, we may hope for a most rich bootie. Furthermore, the Venetians are, and haue alwaies bene rewards of brave and valorous men, when being mindful of your worth, will ordaine perpetuall pensions for the best amongst you, and indeed for all, if you doe all shew your selues worthie men. To conclude, if no other thing inuite you to play the men, yet ought the example of your Capitaine to prouoke you therunto. I commaund you then to goe out with the selfe same courage as ye shall see me your Capitaine to march with. He is not worthie to be termed a souldier, but a base Bissonian, who whilest his Capitaine shall fight, doth shamefully retire from the battell. For my owne part, if I shall perceive anyone to march fearefully to the fight, I will be as great an enemy vnto him, as to the Greekes against whom wee fight.

Vermio hauing spoken thus to his Souldiers, commaunded every one to bee in a readinesse to march against the enemy. The Greekes in the meane time who were sent to guard the streights of the mountaines, waxing more proud for their last victorie (as I thinke) leaving the hilles with a desire to fight, came downe into the bottome to assaile the Venetians. Vermio would not loose so faire an aduantage, but sodainly set his forces in order of battaile. The Candiot were at the first brunt in a manner broken, and so narrowly pursued by the victorious Venetian, who would not giue them time to knit their forces together (which they attempted to doe in those streights) as they sought to escape by manifest flight. The Italians followed them at the heeles and slew them euery where, so that more were slaine in the flight than in combat: diuers hauing throwne away their Armes escaped into the mountaines, but greater numbers did with an head-long race draw the enemy neere to the walles. It is reported that the Venetians followed them so courageously as they lost many of their people at the Citie gates. Those of Candace being daunted with this losse, and perceiving themselves to be besieged by Sea and Land, despairing of faine aide, began forthwith to treat of yeelding. Wherefore after they had taken the Venetians faithfull promise, that the poore inhabitants should not be molested either in bodies or goods, they sent by night the keyes of the Citie to Michaels and to the Prouidator. Vermio being commaunded to enter with a few troupes, the gates were shut after him, so as the Souldiers were deceived of the bootie they hoped for. There had like to haue bene a mutinie in the Campe; and there wanted no setters on to cause them not only to mutinie but absolutely to reuolt, accusing Vermio, and Michaels the Generall of the Sea-Armie, for depriving the Soldiours of the bootie which they had wonne by their valour. But Vermio hauing vnderstood their discontentment, came amongst them, and after he had sharply rebuked the Authours of the mutinie, he so faire preuailed with the Prouidator, as they presently gaue them double paie, and by this means the matter was appeased. Diuers of the enemies finding themselves guiltie of this rebellion, and despairing of pardon, would in this tumult haue taken Armes, but they were in a moment apprehended: The new Gouernour lost his head, so did all the Authours of the rebellion and diuers others fled. The Ambassadors who at the same time were returned by chance from Genoa, falling into the Venetians hands, were punished according to their deserts.

The newes, first of the victorie and then of the taking of the Citie of Candace, did greatly reioyce the Senate and the whole Citie. Thanks was giuen to Almighty God in the Churches. prisoners were set at libertie, and diuers poore maides were married with the publique purse. Tilts and Tournaments continued for certaine dayes in the Market-place of Saint Marke by young Gentlemen, with sumptuous preparation, who were five and twentie in number, each of them furnishing five hundred crownes for the scaffoldes and other expences. The King of Cyprus being returned forth of France was present at it, and fought at Barriers with the sonne of Vermio, a braue young man, and of great hope. Some say that Vermio himselfe was one of the Iudges at the Tilt. If it were so wee must not beleue that this publike shewe was so soone made. It is reported that one named Pascals Mpret, who came with the sonne of Vermio, wanne the glorie of the turney, and that the victorie was adiudged to him: which was a Crowne of gold, of the value of three hundred and threescore Crownes.

The Island being quiet and reduced vnder the Venetians obedience, the victorious Armie returned to Venice. But the alliance made with the King of Cyprus, was the occasion of setting forth a new Armie, wherewith the Cypriot soone after surprised and spoiled the famous Citie of Alexandria in Egypt. But hee could not tarry long there, by reason of the great numbers of Barbarians which daily ranne thither, whereupon the third day after his entrie, hee was constrained to dislodge and brought backe his Armie to Cyprus, laden with spoile. Prince Celso after he had gouerned three yeares and tenn moneths died. His bodie was buried in the Cathedrales. Marco Cornari was chosen in his place.

At the beginning almost of his gouernment a new reuolt happened in Candie, fiercer than that whereof wee now spake. Diuers Greeke Gentlemen, who in the last stirres had in some sorte fauoured the rebels, were quiet till Vermio his troupes, and the nauall Armie were gone forth of the Island. For hauing then fortified the places which belonged to either partie, and then from day to day practising other nouelties, they did not cease to disturbe the peace of the Island, vntill they had caused all places to Arme against the Venetians.

It is reported that John Calergo was the Authour of the troubles who was one of the noblest families of the Island. He hauing set vp the ensignes of the Greeke Empire proclaimed euery where, That it was done for the protection of the Isle of Candie, exhorting all those who loued their libertie to follow him. Diuers being amazed, tooke Armes. Those which followed him, first of all sware to destroy the nobilitie; after they came on the sodaine and furiously assailed Nicholao Dandilo, and his brother, and hauing murdered them they seized on their Castles. Nicholao Infimiano Prouidator, and Dominico Molino, leaving the Citie, to resist Calergo his attempts, tooke certaine places from the rebels which they burnt. his faction on the other side being sodainly come to the Suburbes of Castell-nouo which belonged to the Venetians, which were newly inhabited, burnt them to althes. But the Towne being brauely defended by Pietro Treusano the Prouidator, they were shamefully put to flight; and from thence they came and seized on Rehimma: Those which were within it for the garde thereof, despairing of abilitie to defend it in regard of their small number, leauing their horses behinde them, went to Sea and came to Candie. The Greekes after they had driuen away the Venetians from diuers places who had newly inhabited the Island, pursued the course of their victorie, and ceased not till they had made all that which lieth towards the West from Thalis vnto the Promontorie of Spatha, to reuolt from the Venetians: the Townes and certaine Castles excepted. This reuolt being reported at Venice put the Senate in meruailous care to begin the warre againe; which was the more grieuous vnto them, by how much they had thought the affaires of Candie to be safer than at any time before. The Prince and Senate commaunded those who were in the Island to leuie forces from all partes, and to procure horsemen out of Licia, Caria, and Ionis, if they could get none elsewhere. They sent likewise to the Pope (the which they easily obtained) to intreate him to grant plenary Indulgences of all sinnes committed till that time, to all those, who would take Armes against those perfidious Candioti.

This was done in Italie, whilst the Islanders being vanquished by Nicholao Iustiniano at the foote of the hilles Lafithes, with the losse of diuers of their troupes they were diuerted from their attempts. For their meaning was to haue seized on the mountaines; but I know not whether it were to saue and defend themselves, or rather from thence to assaile their enemies by a sodaine and vnexpected comming vpon them. Moreouer, the Greekes all the winter made sundrie and different attempts, against which the Prouidatori did with great diligence opportunely oppose themselves. Giacomo Bragadino, Paula Loretano, Pietro Mocenigo, Lorenzo Dandule, and Andrea Zeno were sent into the Island as new Prouidatori: They had commaundement likewise to leuie Souldiers as well horse as foote from all places.

Hauiing received the old bands, and added new supplies to them, they were ready to march against the enemy, when newes was brought them, that after they had leuied great numbers of Souldiers, and attempted in vaine to take the Citie of Maluicina, they had scattered themselves ouer the Territorie of Cydon, and had put all to fire and sword which they knew to belong to the Venetians, and to bee newly inhabited. This was done on the Sea-coast, whilst in the midst of the Island, five and twentie hundred of the enemies, came and incamped themselves at one time neere to Agatia and Melissa. Giacomo Bragadino speedily marched against them with foure hundred horse and fifteene hundred foote; they fought there verie fiercely: where those of the Island being broken and defeated, diuers were slaine in the battaile, but the number of the Prisoners exceeded who were all hanged; some few which fled in great feare, got into the next mountaines. The Venetian departed and set fire on the Farme-houses and villages of the enemies spoiling euery where round about.

Thus stood the state of the Island when on a sodaine the inhabitants of fifteene Villages reuolted, who fearing to be defeated in open field retired with their wives and children into the mountaines of Lafithes where they were forthwith assisted by the cheefest of the Rebellion. Diuers others did the like, who for their more safetie betooke themselves to those mountaines.

The forces of the Greekes being thus augmented, they were not satisfied with defending themselves, but trusting to their great numbers, they came cherefully and spoiled the Countrey of those who had continued faithfull to the Venetians: and entring into the bonnds of the Citie of Candace, they filled all the places round about with feare and terrour. Pietro Mocenigo perceiving the whole Island almost to be infected with this furie, and to tend to a generall reuolt, and that he could by no meanes fight with the enemy who kept still in the mountaines, brought backe his troupes to Candace, intending to keep the Citie and to repress the enemies violent eruptions. Then he certified the Prince and Senate of the state of the Island, and requested them to send more forces if they desired to see the enemies trecherie daunted; that his fellowes and himselfe had, with much adoe gotten five hundred horse out of Asia; that they wanted greater numbers both of horse and foot, which of necessitie must be sent to them, if they intended to reduce the Island vnder their obedience. And therefore he besought them to take speedie order that supplies might be forth with sent from Italie.

Before Mocenigo his letters came to Venice. Pantaleon Barba, Giouanni Zeno, Nicholao Treusano, Andrea Zeno, & Nicholao Iustiniano, departed from the Citie with certaine troupes of footmen, who came into the Island as new Prouidatori. They being arrived the old ones returned home (Pietro Mocenigo excepted) who remained still Gouverneur. Those that came last hauing received the old troupes and assembled all the forces which were in the Island, caused them to be imbarked in three Gallies and two shippes of burthen, and sailed to Milopotamus. From thence they forthwith marched towards the enemy, against whom, being shut vp in strong and inaccessible places, Andrea Zeno, one of the Prouidators, being courageously provoked with a desire to fight, and entring with his forces into a dangerous place, was slaine by those who defended the passage from above. Hee being dead, they made a retreat and brought backe the troupes to Milopotamus.

In this manner the new Prouidatori began the warre with the enemy, when a great number of footmen being come from Italie, in three shippes of burthen, did maruelously strengthen the Venetian Armie. Whereupon, the Prouidatori made diuers attempts vpon the enemy, but of small moment, for the Venetian could by no meanes drawe the enemy to fight. But the spoiles and burning vp of houses heere and there in the Island, was the cause of a great dearth. Howbeit at last the scarcitie of victuals was much greater in the Candioti Campe than in that of the Venetian, because the Venetian Gallies did from all partes bring them plenty of corne and all other kind of victuals. Whereupon, those in the mountaines enforced by famine, hauing deliuered the Authours of the reuolt to Iustiniano, who lay incamped not farre from thence, they submitted themselves vnto the Venetians obedience. Those that were guiltie were forthwith punished. The reduction of these men did in such sorte daunt the courage of the Greekes, as all that which lieth from mount Strombulo stretching Eastward euen to the middelt of the Island, did in short space yeeld to the Venetians: whereupon the whole burthen of the warre fell on a sodaine on that part of the Island which lieth towards the West. Diuers Venetians who had bene Authours of those reuolts, to make themselves more acceptable to the Greekes, renounced the Latine name and promised to obserue the Greeke ceremonies.

Iustiniano hoping to doe some exploit, in regard of the enemies amazement, tooke on a sodaine foure hundred Horse and foote, of those who had continued faithfull to the Venetians; and departing with them from Candace, he marched against the Suerits, where hauing beaten downe the enemies Fortes and defences, which they had incompassed with a high Wall made without mortar, the euent was fortunate. They fought with the like good successe at the same time at Milopotamus and in other places: The Lithernians being provoked by these attempts, did deliuer Alexis Calergo, with his brother and his children, to Cressio Molino, who after Zeno his death at Milopotamus, came into the Island: Hee caused them to be safely conducted to Candace, with Zannachio Molino a kinsman of his owne, who was thought to be one of the Authours of the rebellion, where they were all executed. The wife likewise of Georgio Calergo, and his children, falling at the same time into the Venetians hands, had the like end.

The situation of Anopolis.

The rescue of a rebel.

A merrie answer of a soldier to one of the rebels.

Iustimiano, and Nicholao Trevisano, desirous to pursue the enemy who was halfe broken, ioynd their forces together nere to Anopolis, where were diuers enemies both Greeks and Latines. The place was strong by nature, and the situation thereof inaccessible. There was but one way to come to it; and but one onely meane to batter the enemy: Namely, for the Venetians to seize on the Hill which commandeth the Towne. The which being soone done by the Prouidatori, in few dayes they became masters of the place: Giuanni and Georgio Calergo with diuers Venetians of the number of the Rebels, were there taken and brought to Candace. It is reported that Georgio being found with his brother Giuanni hid in a Caeue, did attempt by the shot of an arrow to kill him, who came foremost to surpris him; but that his bow brake. It is great folly to anger him in whose hands a man is sure to fall. It was likewise a merrie answer which a simple Souldier mou'd to one of the chiefe of the Rebellion who was taken prisoner; and being fore hurt, was caried to Candace to be put to death, who craued that hee might haue some Chyrurgion to looke to his wounds; the Souldier who was next him, told him that his wounds needed neither Chyrurgion nor plaister, iesting openly at the poore prisoner, who was shortly to loose his head.

The enemies being euery where put to flight, Candie became quiet, whither came Giuanni Dandulo, Paulo Loretano, Pietro Morosini, Giuanni Fucareno, and Theodo Iustimiano, being sent by the Senate to enquire of the state of the Island, and to settle the affaires thereof: These men hauing disannulled certaine Lawes, established new, and hauing razed certaine Fortes, they builded others. They commaunded likewise the inhabitants of Anopolis, to leaue the Towne and to dwell some where else, leauing the Towne desolate and forsaken; forbidding on paine of life that none should dare to goe thither to inhabit. Like prohibitions were made, not to build or till the earth on the mountaines of Lafithes. And after they had put some of the Rebels to death, who were here and there scattered in the Island, and banished the residue for euer, they restored the Island to her ancient quiet. Such was the issue of the rash reuolts of the Candioti. Prince Cornari being oppressed with age, hauing gouerned two yeares and eight moneths, died, and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes.

Andrea

Nicola Contareni succeeded him, who by some apprehension of future matter did for a time refuse this dignitie, and had of purpose retired himselfe to a house of his owne in the territorie of Padua; resolving not to returne to the Citie vntill they had chosen a new Duke. But by no meane yielding to come to the Citie neither by the Senates letters, nor yet by those of his familiar friends, certaine of his kinsmen were commaunded to goe and tell him, That if hee continued in his wilfulnesse, the Senate determined to confiscate his goods, and to banish him for euer from the Common-wealth. It is reported that then, the feare of his owne particular losse made him obey and returne to Venice. If he did this feeling himselfe not to be fit for such a charge, it was (as all men may perceiue) a verie profitable example: to the end that no man should presumptuously thrust himselfe into the gouernment of a Common-wealth: the profit whereof he ought chiefly to respect whoeuer he be that is called to such a dignitie. For it ought not to be accepted so much for a mans owne particular gaines as for the common good. They therefore which occupie publique honours, ought to examine themselves what they are, and what their sufficiency is; and if they feele themselves vnfit for such place, let them know, that it shalbe as profitable for themselves, as for the Common-wealth to make an honest excuse. But Contareni was not guiltie of such a fault who wanted neither wisdom, nor skill to gouerne. But if he did it (as I perceiue) to auoide the labour and trouble which accompanies such dignities, he did not well; and I know not whether hee erred more in so doing, than if hee had rashly thrust himselfe into the Throne. For that would haue bene accounted a folie, and this malice. It is certaine that in his time the Common-wealth was much afflicted by forraigne warre, and that there was great dearth in the Citie.

So soone as he had accepted the charge, the Thyrestines reuolted. The Venetians kept an Armed Gallie in Histria for the guard of the Toll. The Thyrestines, who a long time before had hatched alterations, fell on a sodaine vpon the Venetians who were there by chance, and picking quarrells with them, slew the Committie of the Gallie, and hauing hurt some others they would haue murdered the residue, if the Gallie had not presently put to Sea. But not satisfied with this brauado they came on an holiday into the Market-place, and threw downe the Venetian ensignes which were set vp there (as the custome was) tearing and treading them vnder fete, with reprochfull speeches.

The Senate perceiuing whereunto the Thyrestines dealings tended, and knowing that they ought no longer to temporize, did speedily send an Armie thither; which besieged those mutinous people both by Sea and Land. The Land-Armie was committed to Dominico Michaeli; and that by Sea to Crescio Molino. It was then the midst of winter. And because it was to be feared that if the Venetians should procrastinate, the enemies might fortifie themselves with some forraigne aide, all that which was necessarie for the warre, was forth with in a readinesse. The Citie being at their first arriuall assailed, the Thyrestines with the helpe of the Forlani did brauely defend it, and making a sodaine fallie, they did greatly trouble the Venetians nere to the walles with an vnexpected fight. Afterwardes likewise they fought diuers times with different successe: but the Venetians perceiuing that it behooued them to haue greater forces, supplies were sent thither, and new Prouidatori; Paulo Loretano succeeded Dominico Michaeli; and Thaddaeo Iustimiano, Crescio Molino: who brought two thousand Treuisians to the Campe.

The Thyrestines being daunted to see the Venetian forces daily to encrease beganne to bethinke themselves whence they might bee releued. They resolved to haue recourse to the Duke of Austria, to implore his fauour and assistance, and to deliuer their Citie, meane, and estate into his hands. To this purpose they sent Ambassadors to him, by whom they yielded themselves to his protection, and on a sodaine they let vpon the toppes of the highest tower the Dukes ensignes. The Duke soone afterward came thither with ten thousand horse, and great numbers of foote. The Venetian in the meane time hauing spoiled round about, had brought all the townes neare to the Citie vnder their subiection. The Almaines at their first arriuall came and besieged the Venetians Campe with such vehemencie as in a moment they seized on the trenches. The Campe would hardly haue sustained this assault had not the Souldiers and Marriners who were a farre off hearing the noise ranne to the rescue of their fellows. Those of the campe were so encouraged by their arriuall as they did not only driue the enemies forth of their trenches but with great losse constrained them to retire. Truce for a day was granted to the Almaines to burie the dead. Being afterwards put to flight in a skirmish, and perceiving their bad successe in releuing Thyracte, and that it was an hard matter to diuert the Venetian from his purpose, with great griefe he brought backe his troups into Germanie. The Thyractines when hee was gone, despairing of all other foraine aide, did on certaine conditions returne to the Venetians obedience, which being done, the victorious Armie returned to Venice.

The Citie was not long at rest. For a new war was raised against Francisco Carrario: the cause thereof proceeded (as is said) from Carrario, who vsurped a certaine place neare to the lakes, the which belonged to the Venetian. The Venetians being moued with this iniurie did forbid the Paduans the trafficke and commerce of their Citie, which is (as all men knowe) an euident signe of future warre. The neighbour Princes being highly displeased that by the Paduans meanes the trafficke was likewise forbidden to their subiects, did endeavour all they might to quench this strife and to make them friends. But all their attempts proued vaine. The King of Hungaries Ambassadors came afterwards for the Carrarians: (for they said that they were vnder the protection of King Lewis) and those of Florence and Pisa for the Venetians; and by their meanes truce was taken for two moneths. The Venetians deputed five commissioners; and the Carrarians as many, who should debate the matter, and search out their bounds in friendly sort and afterwards marke their limits. But they could effect nothing.

At the same time the Venetians were informed that the Tyrant had practised with certain bad persons to murder diuers of the Senate. Diligent search was made for them ouer all the Citie, and some of them were found and taken in the house of a poore woman named Gobba. The womans life was saued, because shee had freely confessed the truth; but she was confined to prison for ten yeares. All the rest were punished according to their deserts being drawn through the Citie with horses, and then cut in quarters at the Colummes. Their hostesse Iohne who had promised to shew the murderers those whom they should kill, was hanged in the same place. Not long after, others being convicted of the same crime were punished in the same manner. The Senate fearing, that by these murderers the Common-wealth might receiue some great mischief, appointed that all those who were known to be hated by Carrario, should bee guarded by Armed men from their houses to the Pallace. They commanded besides to looke carefully to the welles, for the report was, that he intended to poison them, and by that meanes to vndoe the whole Citie.

The Senate were not yet freed from care, when as a new feare surprized them. For they suspected that some of their owne companie did by close intelligence aduertise Carrario, of whatsoeuer was secretly done in the Senate. Enquire hereof being made, they found certaine Senators to be guiltie of that fact. Whereupon those who were found least faultie were dismissed from the Senate, and were declared to be for ever vnworthie to execute any publicke charge, the others were condemned to perpetual prison. In the meane time the Ambassadors who had beene sent vp and downe from all sides, could not prevent a future warre, which the Venetians perceiving, they made speedie preparations for the same.

PISANI hauing lost his Armie at Pola, is imprisoned at Venice. The Genoueses being proude of this victorie, hauing greatly augmented their Armie, lay siege to Chioggia.

I was very likely that in these great warlike preparations by land, there was neede of some one man who should be well experienced, diligent, and a trustie friend to the Venetians, vnto whom they might (as very often in former times they had done in the like troubles) safely commit the charge of their Armie. Whereupon they concluded for this purpose to send for Raynierio Vasco forth of Tulfanie, one of the best Captaines of his time; and in the meane time to send Dominico Michaeli to the Armie to command there vntill his arriuall. They sent with him Andrea Zeno and Thaddeo Iustiniano for Prouidatori. The Rendez-vous of all the troups was at an appointed day, assigned at Meltra. From thence the Armie first marched against against the Paduans. The Venetians entred the enemies Countrey, and hauing made diuers skirmishes with good successe, they filled all places where they came with feare and terror.

In this meane time Raynierio arriued at Venice, where hauing receiued the publike Ensignes, he hastned with greater forces to the Campe, which he forthwith caused to march; and hauing passed the riuer Brente, he foraged and spoiled the Paduans Territory which was next him, vnto the riuer of Brentello. Carroffino saith, that he could not foord that riuer, because it was greatly swelled with the raine, and that therefore he led his Armie through the Territorie of Vincenza towards Padua, from whence the Souldiours brought back great bootie: And that from thence hee went and encamped neere to the Fountaines of Abana; but that victualls waxing scant, and strife arising betwixt him and the Prouidatori, hee retired in manner of a flight towards Meltra. Some Authours say, That being desirous to passe the Brentello to bee the neerer to assaile the enemy, the Prouidatori would by no means suffer him to doe so: whereupon hee being moued with choller, that hee might not manage the warre as he pleased (saying that the ignorance of the Prouidatori did snatch a goodly occasion forth of his hands) gaue over his charge, calling God and men to witness, That their wilfulnesse did hinder him from obtaining the victorie.

The Prouidatori were suspected to haue bene corrupted by the enemy, and by that means to haue endamaged the Common-wealth. Yet neuertheless the Venetians affaires prospering, and hauing taken certaine Townes from the enemy, that suspition ceased. The enemy perceiuing that without forraigne aide he could not long resist the Venetians, called the King of Hungarie to his aide, with whom euer since the siege of Treuif he had bene in league: Some Authours thinke that this league was sworn at the beginning of the warre. But the Venetians hauing notice that the Hungarian made preparations both by Land and Sea (which hee might easily do hauing taken Dalmatia from them) the Senate decreed to set forth besides the Land-Armie, a fleet by Sea, whereof Michaeli Delfino was made General, and the Prouidatori were Pietro Iustiniano, Procurator of S. Marke, and Pietro Cornari. This fleet being gone to Sea, kept all the Sea-coasts safe for the Venetians during this warre.

The Paduans affaires stood at the same stay as I haue said, at such time as great numbers of Hungarians came to their succour. Their first arriuall was on the Treuifan, where they put all to fier and sword, respecting neither age nor sex, and their murder still encreasing, they fought at times with bad successe. For Thaddeo Iustiniano at the first report of the enemies coming, to resist their attempts did speedily encampe on the riuer of Piaua: But the Venetians discouersers being surprized by the enemies, the Hungarians were sooner seene than heard of: whereupon they fell vnlookt for to the fight neere to the riuer, and at the first, (because the bodie of the enemies Armie was not yet arriued) the Hungarian was put to flight and pursued by the victorious Venetian euen to the riuers side, whither all the Souldiours did not follow Iustiniano, who hastned after the fugitiue enemy, who hauing put themselves in order on the riuer banks, the fight began more cruell than before: whereupon the Hungarians became victors, and the Venetians being vanquished, verie few of them escaped from the battaile: the number of the dead was great, and that of the prisoners small.

On the report of this losse, the residue of the Armie retired on a foraine to the Treuifan: The enemy soone followed him thither, and in his view presented him the battaile. But the Venetians keeping themselves in their Fort, and the enemy not being able to constrain them to come forth, returned towards the Forlani, first through the confines of the Bellunois, and then of those of Feltré, and encamped before Bassano a Citie belonging to the Vincentines. Belluna and Feltré did at the same time belong to Albert Duke of Austria, an Associate of King Leuis in that war.

Some

Some Authors say that Carrario gaue those Townes to Albert, to procure him to take Armes against the Venetians: wherein the German shewed himselfe verie vndiscreet, seeing that a while before, the Paduan in the treatie of peace had offered them to the Venetians, who refused them, because they would not doe any thing to displease the German.

Delfino General of the nauall Armie, hauing gone round about the Lakes in certaine light boates, commonly called Ganzarioles, came and builded a Fort at Lupa Podoana, and then an other neere to the same: by means of which, the Venetians might more commodiously breake the enemy, and offend him neere hand. The greatest part of the Venetians Armie laie on the Treuifan, where certain warlike exploits were executed, but vnworthy of mention. Diuers Souldiours were caressed, and enforced to leaue the Campe, who by their thefts did more molest their own people than the enemy. Some Authors say that Raynierio Vafco who (as we haue said) did voluntarily giue ouer his place, was shamefully driuen from it. Giacomo Delfino being sent to command the fleet, hauing staid a while at the Forts which Delfino had builded, fell sick, and was carried hometo Venice.

Raynierio being gon, Alberto Carrario came to command the Land Armie: At his arriuall with Leonardo and Andrea Dandolo, and Pietro Fontano Prouidatori, they fought in the Lakes with no great successe. They fortified a place which was verie commodious for the Venetians verie neere to Delfino his Forts. Carrario came vnlookt-for, and draue them thence who wrought in those works. Diuers Gentlemen were slaine at the first brunt, and with them diuers Archers, the rest fled speedily to the shippes: But the losse was not so great there, as the fight was afterwards fortunate to those of the Campe; For both Armies being come in view one of another, the Venetians attempting to fortifie a place which lay betwixt the two Camps: Stephano the Transiluanian, General of the Hungarian horse-men, marched in battaile against the Venetians to hinder their work: Leonardo Dandolo went forth to meete him, resolving to fight with him if he had bene so contented: But the Transiluanian as if it had beene of set purpose did the same day abstaîne from the fight. The morrow after, Pietro Fontano whose lot was that day to command (for he and Carrario commanded the Armie by turnes) did by the breake of day verie courageously embattaile the Armie, the enemy for his part did the like. The battaile being concluded on, the Venetian commanded the men at Armes to alight from their horses and to fight among the footmen, and as he was putting them in order, he exhorted and intreated all of them to resolve either to die or get the victorie, protesting to hold him for an enemy, and to kill him which should but only make shew of flight, and that himselfe would be in the foremost rankes, not so much to encourage them, as to note and obserue euery mans valour. The Souldiours being animated by this speech, gaue a braue onfet, and fought so valiantly, and with such feruencie, as hauing broken and defeated the enemy, they purchased that day a goodly and memorable victorie. Diuers were slaine in the fight, but more in the flight. The Transiluanian was taken with all the chiefe men almost of his partie. There were taken of the Italians Bonifacio and Antonio de Lupes, with diuers other Paduan Gentlemen. King Leuis his ensignes with those of Carrario being throwne away in the fight, were taken by the Venetians.

It is thought of a certaine that if the Venetian had narrowly pursued the enemy, he might haue entred Padua with him, and haue made a verie great spoile euerie where and gotten great booty. The Paduans being daunted with this losse, did accuse the Carrarians as Authors of the warre, hating and detesting them. Francisco Carrario in the meane time, to hinder the Venetians, did by promise of great pay draw from them to himselfe the greatest of their Cauallerie: But they caused greater numbers than they had lost to come from Milan & Padua to their seruice. Giacomo Moro went to meet them as farre as Verona. Marfilio Carrario brother to Francisco was with him, who after the losse of the battaile hauing offered himselfe to the peo-

King Leuis hauing notice of the losse of his people and of the Transilunians fortune, sent to command Carrario to harken to a peace vpon any conditions, and that he should not hope for any more aide from him. The enemies obstinacie being overcome, hee sued for peace, which he obtained on these conditions. That the Prince and Senate should appoint fise commissioners, to bound the limits, for which they were at strife, as they should see cause: That the Paduans should presently pay fortie thousand crownes to the Venetians, and fouretene thousand crownes euerie year for the space of fiftene yeares: That Francisco Carrario or his sonne, should come into the presence of the Prince and Senate, and humbly craue for pardon: That Castelnouo should be razed with all the Forts thereabouts: That the tower of Corania with fawen miles compass round about should remaine to the Venetians: That Marfilio should enioy the possession of his goods, and that his reuenue should be brought him to Venice: That all prisoners taken in the warres should be released: That Carrario should forthwith dismisle all the forrain troups that were come to his aide: That he should yearly send to offer at Venice three hundred crownes on the high Altar of Saint Marke: That they should restore to the Venetians all the inheritances with the profit received of them, which had bene taken from them on the Territorie of Padua during the war: That the Paduans should not build within three miles neere to the mouthes of any Riuer: That he should not fortifie any place nor maintaine any Garrison.

On these conditions peace was concluded with the Carrarians which they received as more necessarie than profitable. Donello sonne to Francisco came to Venice to confirme and sweare to it: who being brought into Saint Markes Church, swore vpon the high Altar, as well in his owne name as his Fathers, that hee did accept of whatsoeuer had bene of late agreed on by his Father and the Carrarians, that they would obserue this peace inuolubly, and all the Articles therein contained. Such was the end the verie fame year (as farr as we can learne) of the warre against the Paduans. About the same time the monasterie of the virgins was burnt with diuers buildings neere to the same which were all repaired at the Common-wealths cost.

The Duke of Austria maketh
new war on the Venetians.

After this Paduan warre, the Common-wealth was three yeares at rest. This quiet was disturbed by a sodaine coming downe of the Germans. Leopold Duke of Austria hauing entred Italie with foure thousand horse without any warlike summons, did tumultuously seize on the Treuisan, where putting all to fier and sword, he encamped before the Citie to the great terror of the inhabitants. It was not knowne vpon what cause he made this warre. The Venetians who at that time expected nothing lesse being prouoked by the daily aduertizements they received, requested those of Aist their neighbours to assist them, from whom receiving some small aid, they sodainly marched against the enemy. It is not likely that the Venetians would goe to field with this aid alone, which was verie small, but that at the report of this warre, diuers companies of footmen were leui'd in the Citie, albeit the Authors whom we follow make no mention thereof. The German understanding that the enemy marched towards them, raised his campe and retired to the Territorie of Belluna.

The Senate in the meane time being prouoked by this losse, caused all the German Marchants which were in Venice to be imprisoned and their goods to be seized on: They did besides send for one Giacomo Caballa one of the best experienced Captaines of his time in the art Militarie to be Generall of their Armie. But whilst these things were done at Venice, Pietro Hema Gouvernour of Treuifo, sent fise hundred horse and foot, to spoile the Territories of Felitre, and Belluna. These being conducted by Marini Souranza to fetch bootie forth of the enemies Countrie, after they had made great hauock and carried away with them a great prey, retired into a place of safetie for feare of the enemies, whom they vnderstood were marching towards them.

Giacomo hauing receiued the Generals place marched to Treuifo, where he staid a while till the troups were leui'd from all places, and till his Armie were compleat as he desired, with which entring furiously into the enemies Countrie, he came first and encamped at Longina, where joining fight with the Almaines hauing slaine diuers of them, hee went on his way as farr as the Piles of the victorie. There is on the hither side of the Forrest of Felitre a verie narrow bottome, through the which the Riuer Piaua doth rather fall furiously than runne: vpon the right side where it runneth with greatest force, it doth in such sort shut in the Feltrian Mountaines, as it leaueh a small space of ground. On this side then of the Mountaine, cut out euen to the Riuer banks, a very old wall encloseth all these streights, which is called at this day The inclosure of the vanquisher: The Venetian hauing likewise driuen the enemy from thence, came euen to this Inclosure of the vanquisher, the which hauing courageously assailed, hee forced, and tooke. It is reported that the skill and valour of Gerardo Caminensis did greatly appear in this assault.

Leauing a Garrison in this place, the Armie came towards Felitre: where at their first arrival they tooke the Suburbs, and furiously assailed the Citie: Leopold hauing notice of the Feltrian danger, ranne speedily with great forces to their aide to raise that siege. Vpon report of the enemies approach, the Venetian retired to Treuifo hauing hired the houses next to the Citie, wherein the Souldiours did lodge at their first coming. Leopold being come as farr as Belluna, vnderstanding that the enemies were gone, was highly discontented, hauing lost the opportunitie of a battaile: whereupon returning to recover the Gallies which he had lost, he attempted first to driue the Venetians from the Tower of Baldina, which Caballa had possessed during the siege of Felitre. Giacomo as soon as he had intelligence of the enemies purpose, sent his sonne a braue yong man with a troupe of choice Souldiours to seize on it and to keepe it. The Almain being aduertised by his spies of the yong mans iournie, departed from Belluna, and by an Ambush did on a sodaine surprize this troupe which at the first he brake and put to flight: Their Captaine was taken with more than an hundred braue men, besides the residue of the companie, but hee suffered them forthwith to depart vpon their promise, that if peace did not ensue, they should returne and become his prisoners: Then hauing recovered the Tower, he brought back his troups to Belluna.

Truce with Leo-

At this stay stood the Venetians affaires, when by the mediation of King Leuis truce was taken for two yeares with Leopold: But in the meane time (as the mindes of men are variable and inconstant) the King separated himselfe againe from the Venetians, and made a League with the Genoueses, the Bishop of Aquileia, and the Carrarians against them. The Senate hauing intelligence that a secret warre was practized against them, and that the truce with Leopold was almost expired, thought it verie necessarie to make an agreement with him, and to make a peace by all meanes; because they would not bee intangled in so manie warres at once: whereupon Leonardo Dandolo, and Pietro Cornari were sent to Leopold, who hauing yeelded vnto him all those places which they had taken from him during the warres, and set the Almain Marchants at libertie, they concluded a peace with him. Soone afterward began the fourth warre with the Genoueses: which being the cruell and most dangerous that euer the Venetians had vntill then, I do likewise finde it to be most amply described by Historians. But before we enter into the discourse of the matter, we must set downe the cause why this warre was renewed.

Caloianes was Emperour of Greece, and a great friend to the Venetians, who among other children had a sonne named Andronicus, who being conuicted for that he had maliciously conspired against his father, had his eyes put out by his commandment, and was for euer confined to Pera. The Genoueses who of a long time had badly digested, that Caloianes did more esteeme the Venetians than them, caused first of all this young man to bee lookt vnto by Philistins, and then perceiuing that he had halfe recouered his sight, did vilely solicit him to seize vpon his fathers Empire. This rash and audacious young man, did willingly embrace this mischievous counsell, whereupon, with the helpe of those of Pera who were in a manner all Genoueses, hauing on a sodaine seized on the old man with his kinf-folkes and 10 house-hold seruants hee did invade the Empire, causing his father and his whole family to be imprisoned. Some say that Caloianes was deprivied of the Empire by Cantacuzin a Greeke by Nation, and was afterward restored to his former dignitie by Francisco Castulus a Genouese, and that the Emperour in recompence thereof gaue him the Isle of Lesbos. But those Authors whome we follow doe affirme Andronicus to be the Author and motiue of all these troubles, whome I rather follow, because it is most certaine that this young man was afterward belieged with the Genoueses in Pera.

Andronicus had then at the first promised the Isle of Tenedos to the Genoueses, with whom being desirous to keep his word, he did write to those who kept the 20 Fort of the Island to deliuer it with the whole Islande to the Genoueses. Two Gallies were sent from Pera to Tenedos for the same purpose. The Captaine of the Fort and all the inhabitants not making great account of Andronicus letters, answered that the Island belonged to Caloianes and not to his sonne, and that they would yeeld it vp to no man whatsoeuer, vnlesse he that ought it would command them. It is reported that the Empire being yet at quiet, the Governour of the Island and the inhabitants were commanded that if the old man should happen to bee driuen from the Empire (which God forbid) by any sinister accident, they should deliuer the Island to none but to the Venetians. Those of Pera being frustrate of their hope to get Tenedos, went to Constantinople. Marco Iustiniano was at the 30 same time Admirall of the Venetian Gulphe, who vnderstanding what had befallen Caloianes, fearing least the Venetian Gallies who were gone on to trafficke towards the Ponticke Sea should in that changeable season receiue some displeasure by the Genoueses, hauing conuoyed them to the verie entrance of that Sea, after hee had crossed the strait, arrived at Tenedos, resolving to tarrie there till the spring time and to attend the returne of his Gallies. He staid there with the Fleet all winter. Then going at the spring to the Bosporus of Thrace, to receiue the Venetian Gallies which returned, he went backe againe to Tenedos, where hauing acquainted the inhabitants with the dangers which threatned them, as well from the Genoueses as from others, the Island and the Fort were by a generall consent yeelded vp in- 40 to the Venetians hands. Iustiniano leauing Donato Tronius and diuers others there with forces to guard it, he returned with his Fleet to Venice.

The yeelding vp of the Island to the Venetians, being knowne euerie where, the Genoueses as well for their ancient hatred and emulation, as for that they perceiued whilst the Venetians should possesse that Island, the free navigation for their Marchants sailing into the Ponticke Sea would neuer afterwards be safe, did neuer cease to stirr vp Andronicus a new against the Venetians, who was already no great friend of theirs, to iniurie those who remained at Constantinople. He being prompt to all mischiefe, imprisoned Pietro Grimani with the Venetian Marchants, and seized on a Barze, lying in the Hauen which was returned from T. Anais. Iustiniano being 50 returned to Venice, it is said that discoursing of what he had done, and of the Island which he had of late brought vnder the Venetians subiection: the same was diuerly taken by the Senate; some not allowing thereof for feare of the warre; and others praising the deed for the commodiousnesse of the place, said that it was well done done, whereupon two Gallies were appointed for the guard of the Island, wherein Antonio Veniero went for Governour of the Isle, and with him two Prouidatori, Gionanni Gradonico and Pietro Cornari.

Whilst the Island was mand with this Garrison, the Genoueses came on a sodain with eleuen Gallies, and seized not in their owne name but in that of Andronicus on the Isle of Lemnos which the Venetians had taken from the Greekes; so soone as they vnderstood how the Emperour had wronged their countie-men. Afterwards hauing made readie three and twentie Gallies neere to Pera, and with them two shippes of burthen, they departed from Constantinople and landed in the Isle of 10 Tenedos. Andronicus was there in person, by whose commandment the Genoueses would seeme to doe all. Carolo Zeni was at the same time Governour there, a diligent and couragious person (for Veniero was not yet come thither, and I thinke Donato Tronius was already departed from thence) this man did not alone with great courage defend the walls, but made a fallly with certaine choise troupes, and disordered the enemies whom hee did beate backe to their shippes with great slaughter: in such sort as Andronicus hauing lost all his peeces of batterie was enforced to dis- lodge to his great shame.

It was thought that the Genoueses beeing desirous to ruinate the Venetians power, not being able of themselues to do it, did ally themselues with Lewis King of 20 Hungarie, Francisco Carrario and the Bilhop of Aquileia. The Senate perceiuing that both in appearance and deed the warre was prepared against them, provided an Armie of twentie Gallies, the which was committed to Victor Pisani, with all authoritie at Sea, and gaue him Panthaleon Barba and Lodouico Loretano for Prouidatori. Fourteene of these Gallies being armed at Venice and the rest in Candie, departed from Venice the foure and twentieth of Aprill. But Victor was commanded not to attempt any hostile act against the Genoueses, vntill such time as warre should be denounced. It is said that Nicoletto a Citizen of Chioggia, one of the Secretaries of the Senate, was sent to Genoa for this purpose.

The nauall Armie leauing the Gulphe, and hauing coasted Sicilie sailed direct- 30 ly towards Genoa, in which voiage it tooke in few daies diuers of the enemies shippes; and hauing soone after scoured the lower Sea, Lodouico Fiesca of Genoa to reuenge this shame went to Sea with ten armed Gallies with an intent to fight with the Venetian. Victor was at the same time at Ancia, a Sea-towne of Italy, who hauing notice of the enemies comming did sodainely embattaile his Armie, commanding his Souldiours to bee in readinesse, and at the first sound of the Trompet to arme themselues, at the second all Souldiours and Marriners to keepe their ranckes, and at the third furiously to set forwardes towards the enemy. The Genoueses were already in fight, when the Venetian because hee would fight on the maine advanced towards them. They had scarce begunne the fight, when as on a 40 sodaine a terrible tempest arose with great showers of raine, which did in a moment so trouble them, as nine Gallies of either Armie (the residue being constrained to retire) did fight, not with arrows shot, for they did not shoot any in this sodaine stirre, but with the sword and pulsh of pike. The battaile (notwithstanding the foule weather wherein the Seas and Heauen seemed to fight together) lasted two long houres: At the last the Genoueses giuing backe (four of their Gallies escaping forth of the throng) the residue were taken with Lodouico their Generall, one of which dashing vpon the neighbour shoares fell into the enemies power. Eightene Gentlemen of Genoa were taken, and more than eight hundred Souldiours and Sailers, with six hundred slaine.

The victorie was likewise verie bloudie to the Venetians, hauing lost diuers of the troupes which fought, and more were hurt: of the prisoners, Zacharia Giso, Fiesca and the other Gentlemen, with the moytie of the prisoners were sent to Venice, and the residue Victor carried with him to Candie. But beeing come vnto Morea neere to Modon, hee met with the six Gallies which (as wee said) were sent to 50 Candie

Candie to be armed, and joyning them with his owne, he failed to the Island: From whence departing soone after to intrap ten Genoa Gallies which had remained all the precedent winter at Constantinople, and being come as farre as Nigrepont, hee had notice that the enemies Gallies were passed already, and almost at Genoa, whereupon he returned, and did for a while make after them, who by their diligent speed were gotten into a place of safetie.

Whilest these things were done at Sea, Prince Cotario as well in his owne name as in that of King Lewis had begunne the warre with the Venetians, saying that he did nothing contrarie to his oath, nor to the Law of Nations in taking armes against the Venetians, because he was whether he would or no to obey King Lewis, vnder whose protection he was: The Bishop of Aquilea did likewise denounce war against them. Thus at one time did diuers arise thinking to overthrow the power and State of the Venetians, who had no succour nor allies, but Bernabo Visconte and Petrino King of Cyprus, to beare off so manie stormes and assaults of the enemies, and yet the King of Cyprus aide did neuer stand them in any steed, but that of Bernabo did auail them which did spoile and scowre the Sea of Genoa. The Venetians neuer thelesse so long as the warre continued did alone defend themselves with their own forces, without the helpe of any other, the which was scarce credible at the beginning.

Now at one time the Paduans on the one side, and the Forlani on the other contriving the Treuifan filled all the Countrey with feare and spoile. Gerardo Cammenensis who was thought to be a friend to the Venetians, by reason that he had married the daughter of Pantaleon Barba, at the first beginning of the warre, left them and went to the enemies, hauing first taken the Motte from his brother Richardo. This was done on the Venetian territories, whilest the Lords of Corretta assisted by the forces of Bernabo and the Venetians tooke certaine towne from the Genoueses.

The enemies in the meane time were not idle, for they surpris'd Famagosta, the goodliest Citie of the Kingdome of Cyprus. Historians say that the occasion of the taking thereof was, that young Petrino sonne to King Petro, being slaine a little before by the conspiracie of his owne subiects, hauing invited to the feasts and solemnities of his coronation all strangers with those of the Island, the Venetians and the Genoueses trafficking in the Island which were verie many, came thither likewise. It hapned that these two Nations in the midst of the banquet, did by their ancient hatred and ielouzie fall to words, which diuers thinke that the Genoueses did first minister, who did disdaine that the King should more esteeme the Venetians than them. They drew their weapons in the midst of the Royall Palace: and the Cipriots fauouring the Venetians, certaine Genoueses were slaine and diuers hurt, and the residue were driven shamefully from the banquet. The Genoueses being moued with this iniurie did forthwith depart forth of the Island with all their wealth. Then returning within a while with a nauall Armie they did on a sodaine assaile the Citie of Famagosta, and tooke it. The Authors whom we haue read, do not plainly tell whether they took it by force or treacherie. They slew diuers in detestation of the death of the late King, and among others, the Kings brother, & spoiled all their goods. The King and his mother for feare of the Genoueses escaped in this tumult forth of the Citie. In this manner did the richest marchant Citie of the Kingdome of Cyprus fall into the Genoueses hands.

The young kings mother was suspected to haue deliuered the Citie vnto them to reuenge her husbands death: and that which maketh me to beleue it, is the death of those who slue him, and the spoyleing of their goods, as also, because the Genoueses attempted nothing against her nor her sonne. Now whilest the Genoueses held Famagosta, Visconte had in the meane time betrothed his daughter to the young king, and being desirous to send her to Cyprus, he dealt with the Venetians to arme sixe gallies, with which his daughter might passe safely into the Island, and that he on the other side would leuie eight thousand horse, and a great number of footmen at his owne cost, to ouerrunne and spoile whatsoever belonged to the Genoueses. The Ladie being brought to Venice, was lodged in the Pallace of the Cornaro. Then departing from Venice with sixe Venetian gallies, and five which the king of Cyprus had sent, she safely arrived in the Island.

The king lay at the same time at Cerania called at this day Cernia, where after he had with great magnificence receiued his wife, he dealt with the Venetians for a great weight of gold which he promised them, that they would with the five gallies which he had in pay assaile the haven of Famagosta: the which being taken, they gaue an assaile to the Citie on the same side, whilest he with the greatest forces he could leuie, should scale the walles on the other side. The Captaines of the gallies were, Giovanni Miani, Francisco Basoli, Pietro Quirini, Francisco Foscoli, Giovanni Barba, Francisco Mocenigo, who had each of them a part armed one feuerall galley at their owne charge. These being moued as well by the kings offer, as for their generall hatred which they did beare to the Genoueses, with the five gallies, which as we haue said were sent from the king to Venice, beginning to fight at the entrie of the haue, were at the first repulld by the Genoueses, whereupon they retired to Sea, til their souldiers & mariners were refreshed. The Genoueses had placed three ships of burthen at the mouth of the haue to hinder the enemies approach: The Venetian returning againe with his mercenaries to assaile the Genoueses, came not as at the former time to assaile the haue's mouth but the sides, and emptied so much earth and grauell as he made at last a passage for his gallies to enter, which coming into the haue, the ships of burthen were forthwith taken by the Venetians with those which defended them. Diuers gallies with other vessels which lay there at an Anker were likewise taken. The Haue being thus seized on, the Venetians gaue a to daine assaile to the Citie, & having set vp scaling ladders in sundrie places, diuers hoping to enter, did in the midst of the enemies cries, & arrowes, mount to the top of the wall. The Genoueses whose numbers were great in the Citie, making a furious fallie on the assailants, did first with great slaughter beate them from the wall, and then from the Haue. Diuers doe thinke that the same Citie had bene taken that day, if the Cipriots had assailed it as courageously on the other side as did the Venetians. The Venetian Histories affirme this true.

Some of the authors say, that it was not Pietro, but Bugon of Lusignam, which was father to Petrino, and that he was not slaine by his owne subiects, but that it was one called Pietro, brother to the young king: Besides that the Genoueses were not injured by the Venetians, but that by the kings commaundement, some of them were throwne forth of the chamber windowes, where the feast was kept, and other some slaine in the Citie, and ouer the whole Island, so that none were left aliae to carrie the newes to Genoa: That the Genoueses coming into the Island with a great nauall Armie conducted by Pietro Fregosa did take the Citie of Nicosia by assaile with the King and Queene, and after they had put all the Island almost to fire and sword, brought away the King and Queene to Genoa, who being afterward set at libertie, did in vaine with the Venetian forces come and besiege the Citie of Famagosta, which he had voluntarily giuen to the Genoueses, with the residue of the Island. But howsoever it happened, the matter falling out vnfortunatly (as hath been said) the Venetian gallies departing thence, failed into Syria, who besides the other harmes which they did to the Genoueses, they tooke from them a Barze named Spimereggio laden with most rich merchandize: and returning on a sodaine towards the Adriaticke Gulph, did ioine themselves neere to Zara with the nauall Armie, which was conducted by Pisani.

Whilest these things were done in Cyprus and Syria, Victor Pisani, with eighreene gallies tooke the Citie of Catharra by force which belonged to Lewis, king of Hungarie. At their arrival they summoned the inhabitants, who made a verie proude answer, adding diuers reprochfull speeches which did greatly offend the Venetians. Pisani in regard thereof being enflamed with choller, landing his troups did come and assailed the Citie. The souldiers and marriners did at the first with such violence winne the defences, and afterwards the walles, as in a moment they made themelues masters of the Citie : which being taken and spoiled, those which were in the fort, being daunted with the sodaine losse of their fellows, did forthwith yeld. The bootie did inrich the souldiers and marriners. The Generall did speedily aduertize the Senate of the victorie by a galley which he sent away of purpose.

The situation of Tarentum.

Pisani his Armie being increased which was alreadie of twentie five galleies, vpon report that the Genoueses galleies were comming into Dalmatia, and that they were alreadie departed from Genoa for that purpose, and had commission after they should haue shut in the haven of Zara, to molest the Venetians, not onely at Sea, but along the neighbour shoares, resolved to meete the enemy at his comming farre from the Citie. The Venetian at last overtooke the Genoueses neere to Tarentum: for hauing passed beyond Naples, he vnderstood that the enemies Armie a little before had sailed towards Calabria: whereupon hauing coasted all the shores, he did not misse of the enemies Armie at the place abovesaid: and for to enforce him to fight, he encamped at the mouth of the Gulph neere to the mount Lacinia, which is iust opposit to that of Salentina. These two mountaines looking one vpon another make this Gulph to be of a verie dangerous approach. In that is situated the Citie of Tarentum. I said the Venetian did rather encampe neere to Lacinia, than elsewhere, because that the Genoueses lying in the haven of Tarentum, and the Venetian being verie desirous, not onely to draw him to the fight, but to consterne him: thereunto, had rather encampe there, to take away the meanes from them who lay a good way in the Gulph of flying backward.

The Genoueses sit from the venetians.

A stratagem of the Genoueses to quod the fight.

At the last the enemy being come forth of Tarentum, so soone as he perceived the Venetians to come towards them, did speedily put to sea-ward, and turned forth of the way. The Venetian neerly followed him, hoping speedily to ouertake him when as he saw himselfe to be deceived with a new trick of warre. The enemy made shew as though he would fight, and as if he were out of all hope to escape. And turning on a sodaine towards the Venetian, he seemed to make all things readie in his galleies for a battaile: which Pisani perceiving, made a stand and commanded his souldiers and marriners to arme themselves. The Genoueses so soone as he saw the Venetians in a readinesse, the souldiers laden with Armour, and the galleies all pestered with warlike engines, he gaue a signe to his people to set saile. Yet should haue seene then these two fleets sailing very differently the one from the other. For the Genoueses who had their marriners readie, and vnloaden, seemed to flie vpon the Sea with wings, and the Venetians not able to stirre, by reason of their weight and pestering. By meanes whereof he escaped at his pleasure, and tooke the direct way into Dalmatia. Pisani hauing no place of retreat neere, turned on the left hand towards Apulia.

The flight of three Genoueses galleies.

Description of the haven of Brandiffa.

At the same time, five galleies being armed by the Senates command, after the taking of Catharra departing from the Citie with the same which brought the newes of the victorie, to goe vnto the Armie, met with three Genoueses galleies neere to Berisone. These three had scoured for a time vpon and downe to the Venetians losse, and had taken as occasion serued, diuers ships laden with marchandise. The Venetian so soone as he had perceived them a farre off, sailed directly towards them to take reuenge. But the Genoueses without any stay betooke themselves to flight, and the one ceased not to pursue, and the other to flie, vntill they were in view of Zara, for then the Venetian galleies giuing over their pursuite retired to Brandiffa, where so soone as they vnderstood that the Genoueses fleet was arrived in Dalmatia, they stayed in that haven, fearing if they should passe on their iourney, to be surprized by the enemy. The haven of Brandiffa is by nature great: the mouth thereof containeth diuers and sundrie hauens which are not subiect to Sea tempests. There are within it diuers pleasant places of retreat where ships lie out of danger.

The

The structure thereof is like to the hornes of an Hart, whereof the Citie in times past tooke the name, because the haven with the residue of the Citie is made in the forme of an harts head which in the Messapian tongue is called Brandiffa.

The Venetian, hauing then receiued of the Gouverneur and the inhabitants of the Citie, the towers which lie at the mouth of the haven, did man them with good garriisons, then they sent by land to Pisani, who was said to be in Apulia with a great Armie, to certifie him that they staid in the Haven of Brandiffa, fearing to meete with the enemy who was not far from thence. Victor vnderstanding the danger of his Countreimen came with speed to Brandiffa. And there adding the six galleies to his owne fleet he made vp the number of one and thirtie, wherewith he speedily sailed into Dalmatia to surprize the Genoueses going to Zara, who hauing notice thereof did sodainly retire to Trahu.

The number of the Venetian Armie.

But whilest these things were done at Sea, the Venetians on the firme land tooke the Citie of Saligerta from Gerardo Caminensis & soone after Cefalta which was burned, and the other wholly ruined. The enemies in the meane time were not idle: for Prince Carrario hauing assembled, as well of his owne, as of the Hungarians, the Bishop of Aquileia, and of other Princes of the league to the number of sixtene thousand men, came and furiously besieged the Citie of Meltra: and to take from the inhabitants all hope of succour and victuals, he placed a strong Garrison on the river which leadeth from Mergera to Meltra: within a while after the enemy seized on Morezane, which is neare to Meltra; without the losse of one man: diuers men of note were taken there who were sent to garde that place. The Citie was afterward more sharply assailed. The Venetian sent three hundred braue souldiers to releue Meltra vnder the command of Nicolaso Galimico the Luquois, and Elirio Pisani, who passed through the enemies watch, each of them carrying a bundle of arrows on his horses crouper. Afterward they made diuers skirmishes all along the dike. At the last the enemy displayed all his forces, and battered the Citie more furiously than before.

Francesco Delfino commanded within it, who by his valour and good counsell did not onely defend the walls, but did likewise constrain the enemy, after he had lost his peeces of batterie, and a great number of his souldiers, to retire into his Campe, and within a while after to raise the siege and depart. Diuers of the enemies being infected with the aire of the marshes, fell into a deadly sicknesse: whereof being returned home to their owne houses they soone died. These are the exploits which were done that sommer.

Six galleies returning from forrage brought newest to Victor Pisani who was encamped before Zara, that the Genoueses Armie rode at an Anchor in the haven of Trahu. Victor departing thence to goe and fight with them, and passing by chance not farre from Sicco a Sea towne, he thought it fit before he went farther to take it by assault. Yet neuertheless hee would first of all summon the inhabitants to knowe whether they had rather to endure an assault than voluntarily to submit themselves to the Venetians. Three Gallies were sent before to this purpose, who hauing taken assurance of the citizens, did enter the same, where they acquainted the Magistrates with what they had in charge, who answered very arrogantly that the Venetian should neuer expect to haue the Siccoans to yeelde voluntarily, but if he ment to become master of the Citie, it behoued him to vse other weapons than words. Pisani being stung with this braue answer of the inhabitants, trusting to the great number of his Gallies (which were seuen and thirtie) made hast to assaile the Citie. Whereupon entring the haven on a sodaine, he commanded his souldiers to land, and to march furiously to the assault. The souldiers went to it so courageously, as hauing set vp ladders in sundrie places of the walls, & vndermined them, the Citie was taken in a moment with great slaughter of the inhabitants: the greatest number of whom were retired with their wives and children to the Palace, where for a while was a bloody fight. But that place being likewise forced, great crueltie was vsed on all sexes and age whatfoeuer diuers were slaine, and some were throwne headlong downe from the top of the Palace. There was a Castle in one of the corners of the Citie which was strong by nature and art, into the which diuers had retired themselves, who presuming on their great numbers, did dare to make a sallie on the enemies, and to fight in the midst of the Citie. The fight lasted for a time doubtfull, and more blood was shed there than in any other place. But the Dalmatians being at last overcome, were constrained to retire againe into the Castle, which Pisani would not of purpose besiege, fearing if hee should stay long in that place, the enemy would be gone into the haue of Zara.

The Citie then being spoiled and burnt, and diuers prisoners carried thence, a great bootie was brought to the Gallies. He sent away a Gallie to Venice to aduertise the Senate of the taking of Sicco and of their want of victualls: Then imbar- king his troups he sailed towards Trahu. The haue of Trahu hath two entrie, one towards the East and the other on the West side. The Genouefes had so artificially stopped both of them, as the Venetian returning from the assault, was constrained to lie at Anchor on the West side. One part of the Genouefes Armie was at the same time gone into Apulia for victualls; from whence returning, they entred the Haue on the other side not being perceiued, which Pisani hauing notice of, did diuide his Armie into two parts, to shut in the Genouefes on euery side: Then to molest them in sundrie places, he landed certaine troupes of Souldiers. It is thought 20 that the footmen made certaine light skirmishes, which are not worthe of memory. At the last, Victor being impatient of so long stay came and assailed the Citie, but all his attempts were in vaine. For hee was so farre from entring, as on the contrary he was beaten backe by the Genouefes (whose number in the Citie was very great) and constrained to retire with great losse to his Gallies. Luca Valeriosa a Venetian Gentleman died in this assault. Victor being frustrate of his expectation, and victu- 30 als beginning to faile, not hoping to recover any force from Venice, the dearth of all things being very great there, he raised his siege and came and encamped before Zara, where he did more feare than hurt the inhabitants. He sent besides tenne Gallies to the Albanos to know their minds, who being daunted with the mishap of the Catharrians and with that of the Sicceans, did voluntarily yeeld. Francisco Contarini was sent thither to command the Citie.

The Senate being aduertized that the Armie was dislodged from before Trahu, did forthwith arme five Gallies, and laded them with victualls, which were sent to Pisani who lay before Zara, who was commanded to returne instantly before Trahu: and not to stir from thence till either by force or famine he had taken the Genouefes Gallies which lay there. But the Genouefes after the first siege, had with greater labor and trauaile than before, fortified the haue: by means wherof this last attempt was as vaine as the former wherof we now spake. The Armie for certaine daies lay at anchor before the haue. But Pisani being enforced by hunger and cold 40 (for it was winter already) departed from thence, hauing effected nothing, & came into Histria. From thence he wrote to the Senate to know their pleasures whether he should with the whole Armie returne to winter at Venice, or else tarrie abroad. They decreed that the enemy being so neare, it was needfull that hee should tarrie abroad all winter: the which of a certaine did greatly hurt the common wealth. For the Souldiers and Marriners being vndone by hunger and cold, were scattered here and there without any leaue searching for victualls, and left their Ensignes badly attended. Diuers likewise died with hunger, and others with cold. And because victualls were scarce in the Citie, they conclude to send diuers ships that winter into Apulia to fetch corne, and that Pisani should conuay them for feare of being surprized by the enemies. The dearth did in some sort cease in the Citie by means hereof. The Armie returned into Histria to their wonted place. But the extremity of the cold daily increasing, and many dying euery hower, the number of those which remained was so small, at it was not sufficient to arme twelue Gallies: so as 50

Pisani sent diuers of them emptie to Venice, to the end they might be furnished anew against the spring time, if the Senate so pleased.

Eleuen Gallies newly armed at Venice were sent to Pisani, with diuers other vessells, laden with victualls, and among the rest, a great ship of burthen, full of armour, and other equipage for ships: the which Pisani commanded to bee forthwith carried into Candie, to furnish those Gallies which the Senate had appointed to be made readie in the Island. The Armie departing from Pola where it had wintered, and being come into the maine, a terrible tempest arose on the sodaine, which scattered them here and there. This ship of burthen which was full of Armour, was by the force of the winde carried safely into the Haue of Ancona, where it met with a Venetian Barze laden with Syrian merchandize: Being ioyned together they expected a fit time to depart thence, but on a sodaine they espied twelue Genouefian Gallies on the maine.

The Venetians suspecting the truth, and that they were Genouefes, would forth with haue vnloaden their ships, and determined to carrie their best and richest wares into some place of safetie, but the Townes men would not suffer them so to do, saying that their Haue was a safe retreat for all men, and that they needed not there to feare the Genouefes, nor any whatfoeuer, protesting that they should doe no worse than themselves. The Venetians on this assurance did not vnload. The Ge- 20 nouefes in the meane time entred the Haue, and kept themselves quier for a while, but after they had bene at meate, they armed themselves, and with great noise, seized on the Towers, and Walls of the Haue, and from thence they ran to spoile the ships. The Venetians which were on the Citie walls, would haue shot at the Genouefes, but the inhabitants would not suffer them, saying, that they would not incense the Genouefes against them by any new iniurie. They then perceiving themselves to be betrayed did not stirre. The Venetians ships being drawne forth of the Haue, the one of them being vnloaden of the Armour that was in it, was burnt in the view of the Citie, and the other which was laden with merchandize, the enemies carried away. This iniurie did greatly moue the Venetians, but being intan- 30 gled in so many Warres, they thought it fit to deferre the reuenge till some other time, and therefore they did as then attempt nothing against the Authors of that deede.

Pisani in the meane time was come into Apulia, and the Venetian Gallies tooke in their lading of corne, at Barletta and Siponto. Those who loded at Barletta, quarrelling with the inhabitants about a small matter, were in great danger of their liues, but the tumult was appeased by the arriual of those who commanded the Gallies. The Venetian in the end hauing loden, departed from Apulia, and met at Sea with fifteene Gallies of Genoa. So soone as Pisani descried them, he bethought himselfe after what manner he might assaile them, whether it were best to doe it on 40 the sodaine, or after the accustomed manner: He knew well enough that the Genouefes whom he could not prouoke to fight at Tarentum, & were not since that time become stronger in Gallies, or in ought else, would neuer abide a battaile: yet neuerthelesse he commanded his watlike engines to bee set in order in his Gallies, and being come within bow-shot one of another, each of them began to prouoke his aduersarie by shooting of arrowes: The Generall of the Genouefes Armie died at this encounter. The Venetian Historians, nor those Authors whom we haue followed doe not name him; Victor Pisani was hurt likewise with the shot of an arrow.

The enemy perceiving that to dissemble in this fight would no whit at all auail him, trusting to the lightnesse of his vessells, he got forth of the throng, and sailing 50 directly towards Dalmatia, the Venetian forthwith lost sight of him, whereupon he stured at his pleasure into the Haue of Zara. Pisani arriuing in Histria, and bringing his fleet into the Haue of Pola, he sent the ships which were laden with corne to Venice.

Whilst these things were done abroad, the Senate sent five Gallies well armed from from Venice, to scoure the lower Seas. It was reported that there was no armed Gallies at Genoa. It was the spring-time when they sailed into the maine Sea, where they remained all that Sommer, Haruest, and a part of the Winter, in which time they did greatly molest the enimie.

Pisani after he had sent (as hath beene said) the ships loden with corne to Venice, he remained at Pola with one and twentie Gallies, five of which for that they were slower than the rest, hee caused to be drawne a shoare to be trimmed and made cleane, that they might thereby become more light and apt to fight. But in the meane time foureene Genoa Gallies were on a sodaine descried within a mile of the Hauen: Those which were within them, did brandish their naked swords, and challenged the Venetians to the fight: Ten other Gallies of supplies were come vnto them from Zara, of which the Venetians had no notice, the enimie had placed them in ambuscado behinde a little hill neare to the Hauen, and commanded them that after the battaile should be begunne, and when they should perceiue their fellows by litle and litle to retire, and the Venetians to follow them, then on a sodaine with great noise and cries to come forth vpon the enimie. Pisani not dreaming on this Ambush (because hee plainly saw all the Gallies which the enimies were wont to haue) hauing commanded speedily to prepare those five which were on the strond, sailed directly with the residue of his Armie towards the enimie.

They ranne at one another with great furie, and fought for a time without any odds, but the Genoueses Admirall Galley striking on that of Pisani, (and Luciano Doria the Generall of their Armie being dead, whom Donato Zeno slew) hee was lost: whereupon the Genoueses in the heate of the fight began a litle to giue backe, not so much for feare, as of set purpose, and being come to the place of the Ambuscado, the enimies rushing forth with great clamours did much amaze the Venetians. Pisani perceiuing his five Gallies, which at the beginning of the battaile were on shore and being now armed did issue forth of the Hauen towards the fight, did courageously receiue the enimies running fiercely vpon them: (But those Gallies who were appointed for rescues, perceiuing the number of the enimies Gallies, and their fellows to be inclosed on all sides, refusing to come to the fight, did forthwith flee towards Venice:) And then did the Venetians fortune beginne openly to decline. Pisani being to his great grieve drawne by force forth of the throng, did with all speededirect his course towards Venice, leauing a glorious victorie to the enimie: fifteene Venetian Gallies with all their furniture were taken: very few escaped to the Land. Two thousand men were taken in this defeat, among whom were diuers Gentlemen, the residue were slaine or hurt. This losse happened on the sixth of March, on which day the Venetians in a manner lost all their Sea-forces.

The newes of so vnfortunate a battaile brought extreme sorrow to the whole Citie. Pisani, with the other Captaines of the five Gallies, which had refused to come to the fight, being condemned by the Senates decree in a very great fine, were committed to prison, they for their refusing, being the cause of the losse of the battaile, and Pisani because he fought, before he had sent forth to make discouerie. The people tooke Pisani his condemnation very impatiently, but much more his shamefull imprisonment. The report was, that the enuie of some of the Senators, rather than his offence, was the cause of his imprisonment.

The Genoueses being puffed vp with pride for this one victorie: and hoping to execute greater exploits, being come to Zara, did commit their captiues to close prison, some of the meaner sort excepted. Then causing their Gallies which were much broken at this battaile to be repaired, they filled the Venetian Gallies with Dalmatian Marriners, so as in a short space they armed eight and fortie Gallies with all things necessarie. But before this losse at Pola, sixe Gallies were set forth from Venice vnder the command of Carolo Zeno, to molest the Genoueses on the coast of the lower Sea. These five hauing ouer-taken those sixe farre from Venice, did diuers great exploits as well in the higher as lower Sea, all the residue of that yeare till the middelt of Winter, at which time, after the losse of Chioggia, they were by the Senates decree called home.

The Genoueses in the meane time hauing a great number of Gallies, tooke sixteene forth of the Hauen of Zara, and came at the same time, and seized on Humaga, Grada, and Caorli: Then giuing chase to a ship laden with Marchandize, they came enuie almost to Venice, and were in view of the Citie, when Thomaso Mocenigo, who was Owner of the shippe, not being able to approach the Hauen by a mile for want of winde and water, did on a sodaine with those who were in his companie leape into a Galliot or small Gallie, (for the enimie was verie neere) and so escaped into a place of safetie. Whereupon three Genoa Gallies did enuie and spoiled the ship in the view of the Citizens who stood gazing on the shoare, & when they had so done, they burnt it. This was the greatest disgrace that the Venetians sustained during this war, to behold one of their ships which was returned from Syria richly loden, to be pillaged and burnt by the Genoueses, they not daring to stirre, or make any resistance.

The enimie departing thence, went and tooke Pelestrina by assault, the which hauing found for the most part to be abandoned by reason of the wars, they forth with spoiled and burnt it: Then they sailed towards Chioggia, where they landed, and without any difficultie seized on that part of the Citie which looketh towards the East, called by the inhabitants Little Chioggia, the which likewise being desolate they forthwith burned. The Garrison which lay in the Citie being much offended thereat, made a sodaine sallie vpon the enimie. The Genoueses attended them beyond the bridge, where they fought courageously on both sides, but the enimies number still increasing, the Venetian being ouer-come, was constrained to retire with great losse into the Citie, and the Genoueses to their ships, who after that directed their course towards Ancona, where they staid to refresh their Souldiours and Mariners, and from thence, hauing with great mirth dragged the Venetians military ensignes gotten at Pola through the Sea, they returned triumphing to Zara. It is thought that the Genoueses might easily haue taken Chioggia at the same time when they burnt part of it, if they had knownen the situation of the Citie.

The Venetians being in a short space afflicted with so manie mischiefs, considering that the meanes of the Common-wealth were not sufficient to leuie an Armie strong enough to oppose against the Genoueses, and that the cause thereof was partly by reason of the late losse of their Armie, and partly likewise because diuers armed Gallies were from home, they resolved for that time to defend their Citie: Therefore they appointed fifteene Gallies for the guard of the Hauen vnder the conduct of Thaddeo Iustiniano. But they could hardly manne six of the number, by reason that they wanted rowers, enerie man refusing to serue, in hatred to the Senate, who had imprisoned Vittor Pisani, who was beloued of all men.

They did afterwards fortifie the Hauen in this manner. They did first of all build two Castles of wood, of a verie hard, and strong substance, at each end one. These two Castles were filled with great quantities of arrowes and darts, and beneath were placed warlike engins to keepe the enimie far off. Then they crossed ouer an yron chaine three double, supported by verie strong Sandoni (for so they call certaine ill trimmed vessels) euerie of them being fastned to two Ankors, to the end they might not be shaken by the waues of the Sea: And they did couer the entrie thereof with yron bodkins, and made strong defences on each side. Three great ships strongly fastened together were set against those chaines, who, being furnished aboue with hurdles, did represent an inexpugnable Fort. They made a trench at Saint Nicholas on the shoare, from the waters which are within the Citie, and there they builded a Fort to hinder the enimies approach, if he should come from Malomoc: then they builded a Fort neere to Malamoc with a strong Garrison, and two couered ships to keepe the enimie from comming into the Lakes, whereby they might greatly indanger the Citie. Caballa of Verona was made Generall of all these Garrisons. Diuers other vessells well victualed for a good while, were readie, and expected when they should bee commanded to faile against the enemy, if neede should be.

The Genoueses likewise were not idle in so faire an aduantage: but departing from Zara the first day of August vnder the conduct of Pietro Doria with eight and fortie Gallies, and diuers other small vessells, they sailed beyond the Citie of Venice, and came furiously into the Hauen of Chioggia, which being taken the Armie approached the Citie. Prince Carrario, who was before aduertized (as being allied to this war) of the Genoueses arriuall, had leuied forces and shippes, and hauing notice of what they had done at Chioggia, he came in smal vessells called Ganzarioles through the channell of the Riuer Brent, euen to the Venetians Fort, neere to Montauban. But perceiuing that the place could not be taken without great slaughter, and meaning to make no long stay there, he tooke in hand a memorable worke, and worthy a great Prince. For hauing assembled a great number of husband-men, from day-breake till noone, he caused a trench to be made of fife hundred paces long, euen to the channell called Nafariola, so deepe, as the vessells with the troupes might easily passe through it, by meanes whereof he forthwith constrained the Fort of Nafariolas to yeeld.

The enemy in the meane time came at his pleasure and ioined al his troupes to the Genoueses Armie, with his munition and victualls, hauing left a Garrison at a Fort built of purpose at the mouth of the Riuer, to the end that the passage thereof might be assured to his people comming from the firme Land. The Senate commanded Chyurani who was at Chioggia, to come home, who because he had not performed his dutie in the Seruice of the Common-wealth, was condemned in a great fine, and to perpetuall imprisonment.

He Genoueses take Chioggia: The Citie is greatly affrighted at the report of this losse. Pisani is set at libertie by the Senates Decree. The Generall of the Armies place is diuided betwixt Thadeo Iustiniano and Victor Pisani. The Citie fortified neere to the Hauen, and in diuers other places. King Lewis sendeth Charles to besiege Treniso. The treatie of peace begun by the Hungarian, is broken off by reason of his vnjust demands. The Genoueses besiege Malamoc: They fight vpon occasions on either side, as well on the shoare as in the midst of the marshes. The Senate resolue to leue a great Armie. Diuers particular persons doe diuersly aide the Commonwealth. The Genoueses raising their Campe from before Malamoc, doe retire to Chioggia: Carolo Zeno his exploits against the enemy, as well in the higher as lower Sea. The Venetians besiege Chioggia on euerie side: How valiantly they fought at Brondoli neere to the Hauen with the enemy. Thadeo Iustiniano losseth part of the Armie at Siponto. The Genoueses being vanquished and almost daunted in a set battaile neere to Chioggia, yeeld themselves. The Prince hauing giuen the Souldiours the spoile, doth recouer the Citie with all the prisoners.

Chioggia is situate in the midst of the marshes, enuironed almost round about with channels, and hath within it like to Venice, brookes that are navigable, which ebbe and flow with the Sea-waues, and without the Towne diuers streames which run through their fields and salt-pits whereon the inhabitants do go in little boates, as in a beaten way: By meanes whereof during the siege, there were still men, so long as the enemy possessed the Hauen, who came thence waies by night, bringing letters from the Senate to Chioggia, and from thence to Venice. But these streames can beare no great vessells. There is a waie which leadeth from the Hauen to the Citie, by which the enemies might haue passed, which was before then inclosed by the Venetians. They had builded a Fort on the hither side of the Hauen with a good garrison, as at Malamoc, and had besides placed a ship in the midst of the marshes, right ouer against this Fort, well furnished with men and munition. These lets kept back the enemy, who so soone as they had forced the Hauen, which is a mile distant from Chioggia, did not forthwith assaile the Citie, who being encamped neere to the Hauen, great forces in few daies came to them. For besides the Paduans, and the mercenarie Souldiours which Carrario brought, the troups likewise of the Bishop of Aquileia, with those of the other confederates came thither to them. These perceiving their bad successe in that place, resolved to assaile at one time the Fort and the ship: Having then put 12. Ganziarolles forth of the Hauen, after they had a while rowed vp and down heere and there, they came to the shoare of the little Chioggia, where great numbers of men drew them by maine strength ouer little hillocks which hang downwards on the shoare, into the inner channells. They placed moreouer warlike engins on the shoare, to batter the Fort at one time, 10 before, behind, and on euerie side. Diuers Genoa vessells likewise being come somewhat neere, did greatly molest the Venetian with the shot of their arrowes, so that they which were within, being in this manner tormented by their shot, and distrusting their owne small number, hauing set fier on the Fort and the ship, because the enemy should haue no vse of them, retired into the Citie. The Paduans with those which were on the opposite shoares, so soone as they perceived the Venetians to leaue the place, cried out that the Venetians were vanquished and vndone, that their pride was daunted, and that they together with their name would be buried in the waues. But they not being any iot amazed, placed three shippes of burthen well armed and furnished neere to Saint Dominicks Church, to hinder the enemies 20 approach. And on the other side those which guarded the Citie fallying forth on a sodain on that side of the bridge, which leadeth from the citie to the little Chioggia, fell with great furie vpon the enemy. The fight was for a while equall, but the number of the enemies stil encreasing (for they were reported to be foure and twentie thousand) the Venetians did speedily retire into the Citie, hauing lost the other part of the bridge.

The Venetians
enforced to retire into Chiogia.

There were three thousand five hundred Souldiours in the Citie besides the inhabitants, who were commanded by Balbo Galluccio the Bolognois, Nicholao Gallicano, Hirvio Pisani, and Nicholao Darseria, all of the valiantest and famousst Captaines of those times: Pietro Hemo was Gouverneur, and Nicholao Contareni with Giovanni Mo- 30 cenigo were Prouidatori. The Citie was afterward twice assaulted. At the first time albeit the assault was verie cruell, hauing continued from day-broke till night, with great slaughter; yet the Citie had no great harme: But at the second, the Genouefes being mingled among the Souldiours entred into the middelt of the Citie. It is said that to their force they added cunning; for the enemy hauing brought neere to the bridge a small ship-full of vine-twigs and other drie matter, that being set on fier, the smoake did first choake those which fought aboue, and the flame and heat afterwards did enforce the Venetian to leaue the place. The enemy would not loose such an occasion, but hauing once seized on that place, they did presse the Venetian so nerely, as giuing backe by little and little, they entred pell mell with them 40 committing great slaughter in the Citie.

cunning.

The inhabitants and the rest did then begin to flic on euerie side: Pietro Hemo being forsaken by his people, did with fiftie Souldiours for a time brauely sustaine the enemies assault on the bridge neere to the Palace. But at the last all things falling out desperate by reason of the great multitude of the enemies, he with his Souldiours did shut themselves vp in the Palace, which soone after beeing yeelded fell into the enemies hands. The Armie afterwards entring, the Citie was vterly spoiled. The Genouefes ensignes, with those of King Leuis, and of Prince Carrario, were set vp in the highest place of the Citie, and those of the Venetians were throwne downe and trodden vnder foot. All the noble women whose ho- 50 nours the victorious enemy would haue to be preferred, were with their children retired into the Churches, and three daies after, being called from thence were sent home to their houses in all safetie. Diuers escaped, others were taken prisoners: those which fell into the Genouefes hands, were imprisoned in Chioggia, but those those which fell to the Paduans, and the Forlani, were carried elswhere.

Chioggia hath on the south side, a small Island of the bredth of five hundred paces stretching as farre as Brondoli. This space of ground is almost wholly tilled with great labour by the inhabitants. Therein there is a goodly vineyard to be seen, and verie large gardens. The inhabitants make great profit thereof; notwithstanding that they giue themselves to salt making, and to fishing. They make great ditches about their inheritances, their grounds being alwaies wet and moist. There are likewise diuers houses in it here and there, some of them builded with moorish matter, and the rest with mortar and bricke. The Genouefes drew a great many pri- 10 soners forth of these places; which being on all sides enuironed with water could not for want of shippes escape. Diuers were found dead on the shore who had carelessly entred into the water.

Six thousand men were slaine at the taking of the Tower; the most of whom were either Towne-men or Venetians. In this sort we finde that Chioggia was taken by the Genouefes. Nicholao Gallicano and Balbo Galluccio being with money redeemed from the Genouefes by Francois Carrario, were beheaded. But they which received the price of humane blood falling into the hands of the enemies before the end of the warre, did dye more miserably in prison, than those whom they had sold.

20 The guard of Chioggia was giuen to the Genouefes. Prince Carrario with part of his troups went home to their owne houses. The like did the forces of the Bishop of Aquileia who were commanded by Giacomo Porliano. Pietro Hemi paid three thousand crownes for his ransom, and lost the worth of as much in moueables when the towne was taken. The Genouefes after the taking of Chioggia, came with Ganziarolles and other lesser vessells, and a few Gallies to seize on the Castle of Lo- 30 retta, and the tower of Bebia. Those which were in the new tower hauing notice of the taking of those two neighbour Fortes, not tarrying till the enemy arrived burned their Fort, and retired with great feare to Cape-darger a Towne belonging to the Venetians; but it continued not long in their obedience. For Carrario approaching with his forces the inhabitants forthwith yeelded, which they of Montauban vnderstanding, did quickly burne their munitions and fled to the tower of Salina. This Fort alone remained impregnable all the time of the warre.

The Venetians being thus shutte in by Sea and Land; beganne on a sodaine to want victuailles and other necessaries: For Chioggia beeing taken, with all the Townes and Fortes which they possessed on the Riuers and Lakes, they had no hope to get victuailles from any place but from the Treuisan, from whence they furnished the Citie with a little corne and flesh by the Riuier Sylla.

The newes of the losse of Chioggia being brought at mid-night, the enemy entering into it at Sun-set, did in such sort trouble the Senate, that so soon as it was day 40 the whole Citie was in alarme: At which nois all men ranne with their armes to the Palace, where such great numbers of people arrived as all the great market-place before the Palace; and before Saint Markes Church, was filled with them. Then by the Senates commandment they gaue notice to the people of the losse of Chioggia with as many as were in it. It is reported that at these words there were such cries and lamentations made among the people, as greater could not be if the Citie had beene taken: yee should then haue seene honorable women to walke vp and downe the Citie hanging down their heads full of sorrow, and then on a sodaine lifting vp their eyes and hands to heauen, knocking their breasts with their hands: 50 The men on the other side bewailed their common fortune, saying that the State of their Common-wealth was ouerthrowne. Euerie man lamented his owne particular losse; but much more their libertie which they held so deare.

cular. Some sent away their gold, pretious stones; iewells, money, apparell, and other rich moueables; to them which kept their farmes in the countrie, others hid them in Churches, and old monuments. In a word the whole Citie was filled with feare and weeping: diuers did beleue that if the enemies Armie had in this amazement come into the Citie (which Carrario after the taking of Chioggia did oftentimes counsaile the Genoueses to doe) it would haue benetaken that verie day, or at the least-wise brought intogreat extremitie. But God hath not giuen all to one man: Many men haue knowne how to vanquish, but few that could make vse of their victorie. The Garrison which lay at Malamoc being called home, came speedily to Venice, hauing razed their Fort and brought away the shippes.

Besides, almen complained, that there was no man who by speedy counsaile and exhortation could raise the courage of the Citizens daunted with sorrow, and who for his good seruice had such credit among the people, as all men would gladly entertaine him, and be desirous to haue him for their Captaine in such a danger: all men saying that their State was lost, and their liues in great hazard, vntill some one would shew himselfe to relieue their afflicted countrie: That there was none but Pisani in the whole Citie, who being beloued of all men could by his valour preserve the Common-wealth in so dangerous a season: but that he was in prison and kept in darkenesse, yet if he were set at libertie, his onely presence would encourage the daunted Citizens, and that therefore they should doe well to goe altogether to the Palace, and intreat the Senators presently to enlarge him, and to bestowe him on his countrie.

They decreed that Pisani and all they who were imprisoned for the same fact, should be set at libertie: which being diuulged in the Citie, a great multitude of people ranne on a sodaine to the Palace. But he like a discreet and modest person would needs lie the night following in prison, and in the meane time sent for a Priest, to heare his confession. Then fo soone as it was day, hee went vp to the Palace and heard Masse at Saint Nicholas Altar, where he receiued the Sacrament giuing all men thereby to vnderstand, that he did forget the wrong which he had receiued as well by the Common-wealth, as by particular persons. This being done he was brought into the presence of the Prince and Senate whom he saluted, not with a furious and angrie looke, but with a gentle aspect, and kneeling at Prince Contareni his feet, the Prince spake thus vnto him.

Victor, we haue for a time obserued the rigour of the Law: it now behoued vs to vse mercie and fauour: by our commendment thou wert imprisoned for the losse which the Common-wealth receiued at Pola vnder thy conduct: we haue at this time thought good to set the at libertie. Let me intreat thee not to dispute which of the two hath bin most iustly done, but rather forgetting what is past, to looke vpon the Common-wealth, and endeavour to restore and maintaine it: In a word deale in such sort, as thy fellow-citizens who loue and honour thee for thy notable vertues, may be bound vnto thee as well for the good of the Common-wealth, as for their owne particular profit.

To this speech Pisani answered. Most excellent Prince there hath nothing befallen mee either from your selfe, or from those who with you doe gouerne the State of the Common-wealth, which I take not in good part, as becommeth a good Citizen. I know that all things are well and wisely done which are concluded for the seruice of the Common-wealth, whereunto I assure my selfe that all your Councils and decrees doe tende. Concerning the iniurie I haue receiued of some particular persons, I am so farre off from taking any reuenge, as I protest and sweare by that most holy Sacrament which I hope I haue this day receiued to my soules health, and by that holy diuine seruice which I was present at, neuer hereafter to remember it. And I intreat those who haue in any sort enuied my fortune and prosperitie, to beleue, that I beare them no lesse good will than to my dearest friends, and that they shall neuer by me, nor for me receiue any displeasure whatsoever, but I will on the contrary strue to performe all offices of loue and kindnesse to wards them. As for your charitable affection, & inuiting me to the seruice of the Common-wealth, I doe most willingly vndertake the defence thereof, and I would to God I were a man in these dangerous times, to relieue it in any sort either with counsell or industrie, but howsoeuer, my loue shall neuer be wanting. This being said, he was embraced by the Prince, and by all the Senators, whose eyes were full of teares, and then he went home to his owne houle.

It is reported that as he walked in the streets among great numbers of people who came to congratulate him, the whole Citie in a manner following him, they clapped their hands in signe of ioy, and there were some, who at random said that he ought to be Prince, and not a priuate Citizen; but he mildly reprehended them, telling them plainly that those praises ought to be giuen to Saint Marke the Cities Patron, and to the Prince, and not to an humble Citizen. And because the Senate had giuen him charge of those troups which were nere to the Hauen, that he might together with Caballa the Veronois aduise what should be most expedient for the Common-wealth, the common people thought that he had bene restored to his office of Generall of the nauall Armie. Then did all the religious Orders, all the Colledges, the companies and fraternities of the Citie come to offer themselves both in publicke and particular to furnish an Armie freely at their owne costs: some likewise made offer at their owne charges to arme all the gallies. But he after hee had courteously entertained them, sent them backe to the Prince and Senate, telling them that it was they who had the managing of all matters, and that they would listen to their offers, which concerned the good and profit of the Common-wealth. In the meane space he spent the time in visiting the works and fortifications made at Saint Georges Church against the enemies incursions, the which as vnprofitable, he caused to be beaten downe; and made others of better forme. But when the people knew that he was not restored to his former office: yee should haue seene in an instant how they stood affected to him, and taxed the wilfulnesse of the Senators, who in so great a danger would still respect their priuate hatreds. What said they, shall not so notable a man, most skilfull in marine matters and famous for the reputation of his high attempts, be restored to the office of high Admirall? This is not done for the good of the Common-wealth, but onely to satisfie the enuie of a few particular persons. These or such like detractions of the common sort being reported at the Pallace, the Senate did againe assemble, where they propounded the small danger which at any other time the peoples murmuring against the Senate could import; but that it was most necessarie at that present to beate vnite one with another, inaregard the safetie of the Common-wealth was then in hazard.

VVhereupon by a generall consent, Victor was admitted to his former office: It was presently blowne abroad the Citie, how that by a new decree of the Senate, Pisani was declared Generall of the nauall Armie, and that he was with his forces to lie betwixt the Citie and the Paduan confines: Great numbers of people did forthwith runne vnto him, and in three daies sixe gallies were armed, and many more might haue bene made readie if need had bene, euerie man struing who should first enroll his name for that seruice.

Many Ganzariables and other small vessels were added to these gallies. All which being readie to depart: Pisani came with the nauall Armie to the Hauen, where he conferred with the Generall of the land troups, to change the Fort which had been builded at the first into a bricke wall, & to build at both ends two small towers with good garrisons. The Senate allowed this opinion of his, and euerie one falling forthwith to worke, in foure daies the two towers were builded: Pisani, Thadeo, Iuliano, Caballa, and diuers other noble men, hauing laid the first foundations. Then they began the wall in the same place where the trench was, the which being drawne drawne from one tower to another, was ended in fifteene daies : great numbers of townsmen, fouldiers, and mariners laying their hand to it. The ruines of this building are at this day to be seene on the left side of the Hauen. There was afterward a great yron chaine drawne neere to the lewrie to hinder the enemies incursions, and foure great covered ships were there placed to serue for a defence. Then without they made a trench from the new wall vnto Saint Martins Church, where diuers light boates were placed, who all night long went the round, lest the enemy entering secretly, should burne the buildings next to the Citie. They did besides in the night time place diuers corpses-de-guard, for feare lest the Citie should receiue some harme by a surprize.

VVhilest these things were done in the Citie, diuers persons in light boats made incursions beyond Montauban and those places from which men go from the firme land to Chioggia, where they assailed diuers boates which went vp and downe, which being easily taken, with the profit that arose by them, did encourage diuers others to doe the like. There passed no day but some vessell or other was taken, so as in a while after none durst goe from Padua to Chioggia. The Genoueses, soone perceived that if the passages were shut from them, victuals would faile. VVherfore to stay these incursions, or rather hoping to execute some great exploit, they came with their galleys and diuers other armed vessels, furiously to possesse the Hauen of Malamoc, and to encampe there; and hauing builded a Fort in the same place where that of the Venetians had stood, they landed part of their troupes on the opposite shoare to take Poueggia by force.

The Venetians being aduertized of the enemies approach did shut vp the channels which came from Chioggia to Venice with two ships which were sunke one neere to the other, a little beyond the Church of the holy Ghost, and on the side of them another greater than they lying at Anker, with store of archers in it. The enemies galleys being come thither: Thaddeus Iustiniano who lay at the foresaid Church did with five galleys euerie day give them alarme, where they fought more with arrowes and dardes, than with hardie strokes. The Venetians light boates coming on the one side with their warlike engines and arrowes did infinitely torment the Genoueses galleys, and diuers daily died on both sides. They fought likewise sometimes on the shoare as occasion serued. In all which encounters the Venetians had still the better. For Caballa the Veronois was most skilfull in the art militarie, and had good troupes of horse, which the enemies at Poueggia, and Malamoc had not.

Treuif.

During these combates and encounters at the Sea, Charles sonne to Lewis, (as some say) or according to others, sonne to that Charles who defeated Manfred king of Apulia, came with ten thousand Almaines before Treuif. Before his arriuall Nicolas Morosino, Giuanni, and Zacharia Contareni were sent thither to confult with the Hungarian concerning the Commonwealth. For it was reported that hee had expresse commission from his father, to giue audience to the Venetians Ambassadors, and to those of the leagues; and if he and his associates likewise thought it fit, to make a peace with the Venetians. At his arriuall the Paduan Prince came to the campe, so did the Ambassadors of the Genoueses, and the Bishop of Aquileia, as well to congratulate his welcome, as to determine with him either for peace or warre, of that which concerned the king and the confederates. The Venetians the next day came to the campe which lay neere to the Church of the fortie Saints. And though they were expressly commanded by all means to accept of peace, though it were on vnjust conditions; yet nevertheless the demandes were such and so hard on all sides, as if the Venetians wealth had beene foure times greater than it was, so they would not haue beene sufficient to satisfie the insatiable couerousnesse of the enemy.

The enemies vn-

This treatie of peace lasted certain daies, but the enemies shamelesse demands caused the Venetians by no means to condescend to such vn honest conditions, chusing rather rather to endure all extremitie than by such basenesse to dishonour the Venetian name: Prince Carrario in the midst of this parlie returned to Padua, hauing left Arcan Bucecarino to command the troupes which hee had brought to Charles. After his departure the matter was a while debated on. But the enemies meaning to take all from the Venetians, and to leaue nothing to the vanquished but their liues, the which they would haue them to enioy of their speciall fauour, the despite of that disgrace being conuerted into choler, the Senate commaunded their Ambassadors to giue ouer the businesse, and without any conclusion at all to returne to Venice. They being gone, Charles, after hee had laine in Campe two moneths before Treuif, perceiuing that it was to no purpose, dislodged and returned into Hungarie.

peace broken.

Whilest these things were done on the Treuifan, the Venetians armed fiftie small boates, and came about fixe or seuen of the clocke in the euening, to surprize the enemies Fort. There was in the dike which Carrario had hastily made neare to Montauban, one Gallie commanded by Bartolomeo Vsiere of Sauona, with two other small boates, which serued for conuoy to those which went vp and downe. The Venetians hauing suddenly assailed it, tooke it in a moment, the enemy making greater shewes than deedes. The Venetian Archers wanne it, who passing ouer the other side of the dike, did shoote directly into it being very neare to the shoare: but being taken and spoiled, because by reason of the ebbe they could not bring it away they burnt it.

Charles returneth
to Hungarie.

This victorie did greatly reioyce the Citie, and so much the more, because this fortunate successe did put courage into the Citizens, who were daunted with so manie losses, and caused them to hope for better fortune. For after these exploits, diuers speeches full of discontent were euery where heard. How that the Citie was become carelesse and fearefull, that it durst not fight with the enemy in a set battaile, that the Venetians did greatly degenerate from the valour of their ancestours, who had so often overcome the Genoueses, hauing more Gallies than they: That a while before, the Genoueses had no place of retreat in all the Sea, to retire themselves in safetie for feare of the Venetians, but that now the same Venetian vigour was dead: that they did no more remember their Countrie, their libertie, nor yet their owne priuate meanes, saying that it was a folly, or rather a miserable thing to stay, (hauing consumed all their wealth) till they were basely enforced to yeeld, rather by famine then by Armes: That the Senate should doe well to leaue the greatest forces they could: That the Citizens were resolved, either to vanquish the enemy, or else to die for the preferuation of their libertie. These speeches being reported to the Senate, made them thinke on higher enterprizes: Whereupon they concluded to Arme fortie Gallies of which Prince Contareni should be General: And Captaines for those Gallies were speedily appointed. This decree being published, did greatly reioyce the people; and it was executed with such affection of the inhabitants, as according to some Authours, foure and thirtie Gallies were made readie in two dayes, the friends kinsfolks and allies of the Captaines of the Gallies hauing imploied themselves in that busines to hire Rowers, the residue of the Gallies for want of men could not be made readie. For besides the losse which they receiued a few months before at Pola, eightene Gallies were abroad vnder the command of Carolo Zeno, which they daily expected. Prince Contareni in the meane time, so soone as the Rowers were gone into the Gallies, for to practise them in rowing (for they were almost all artificers) hee did daily make them to row from the Iewrie to Saint Nicholas Church. Hee did it of purpose as well to accustom those new and vn skilfull people to the oare, as also to deliaie the battaile if it were possible till the arriual of Zeno: Because it was against reason to oppose to the victorious Armie of the enemies, one lesser in number, and weaker in forces than they.

The Citizens resolution.

But because the scarcitie of all things did in such sort oppress them, as it was impossible possible to draw the matter out at length for feare least that delat might cast them headlong into some greater danger, they relolved to fight notwithstanding that Zeno was not returned. And because in so great a dearth they might bee able to feed such an Armie, before they did set forward against the enemy, it was published by a decree of the Senate, That whosoever among the people would relieve the nauall Armie or the troups, with monie, victualls or Souldiers: so soone as the enemies should be defeated, thirtie of those who should bee thought to haue best deserued, should be receiued into the number of the Senatours, which honour they and their posteritie should for euer enioy: And besides, that the Senate would yearly distribute fise thousand crownes among those who could not attaine to that dignitie. Diuers on the hope of such a recompence did shew themselves, diuers likewise being moued with loue to their Countrie, some offered one thing and some another.

More than threescore families did relieue the Common-wealth at this need, so as by how much any man was esteemed rich, by so much more did he strue to deserue well of the Common-wealth: by means whereof great reliefe was gathered, whereupon diuers were made Senatours. But in reading all that aboue mentioned in some Authors who haue bene careful to collect this historie, one thing hath greatly moued me, which though it be of no great importance, doth neuertheless shew a great affection and loue towards a mans Countrie.

It is reported that one whose name was Matheo Falscolo a Citizen of Chioggia (this man after the taking of the Citie retired to Venice with his children) came to the Senate, and told them how that at the taking of his Countrie he had lost all his wealth, which amounted to manie thousands of Crownes: and that if they were againe in his possession hee would frankly employ them for the good and profit of the Common-wealth: But that he had nothing left but his life, and two children, the which he freely offered to the Senate and his Countrie: And if they would employ them either by Sea or Land, they were readie for the seruice of the Common-wealth to expose that onely iewell which fortune had left them of all the rest.

The Genoueses hauing notice of the great preparations of the new Armie, fearing least the Venetians, being driuen forward by the flowing of the Sea, should about midnight surpris the entrie of the Hauen which they held, and being once entred, that those of the Citie comming to assaile them in small boates before and on the sides would enuiron them, and by that means enforce them to fight in round and so cut them in peeces, they raised their siege and returned to Chioggia, thinking that the Venetians being shut from victualls by Land and Sea, would yeeld. But before their departure, they razed the Fort and ruined Malamoc and Poueggia downe to the ground.

Soone after, foure and twentie Genoueses Gallies went into Friul to get victualls, meaning to exchange salt (whereof they had great store) for wheate and other kind of graine. In the meane time three of those Gallies which were left for the guard of the Hauen (the Genoueses hauing disarmed the rest because the Citie should not be without Garrison did daily make incursions as farre as the tower Salina (which was the only fort that the Venetians held of all the residue in the lakes) and gaue diuers alarms to them within it. Victor Pisani departing from the Citie with three hundred small boates and fifty Ganziaroles, came and ambushed himselfe among the reedes neere to the tower thinking to surpris them, but being descried a farre off by means of his flags which were not taken downe, the Genoueses on a sodaine returned againe towards Chioggia. The Venetian not being able to ouertake the enemy in his flight, came with speed by the lakes which did beare smaller boates, first to Chioggia, where at his arriual he tooke the Fort of the Saltpires, which are neere to the Citie, and hauing assailed the Citie at the same instant, he did greatly terrifie the enemy: The furie of the fight was towards the gate Mariana, and the fight was already begunne in the channels when on a sodaine these three Gallies arrived. The Venetians being assailed by the enemy, before, behinde, and on the sides, were enforced speedily to retire to their command and of the familie of the Gradonici, and diuers others likewise with, eight vessels taken by the enemies: And by this meane the matter falling out vnluckily the Armie returned to Venice. The Genoueses Gallies in the meane time who were returned from forrage, vnderstanding what had bene attempted in their absence, did resolute to fortifie Chioggia, and to beat downe all the buildings neere to the salt pits, and those likewise which were vpon the Walls: to rampier the market place in the midst of the Citie, and all the houses neere round abouts, and to that purpose to stop vp all the streets which lead to the water with a bricke Wall, and to make a Fort in a manner of a Wall with rampiers and Towers of wood, with bridges within it of double ranckes, for the ease of the combatants. And because they had intelligence by their spies, that Carolo Zeno who was abroad with the Armie, was not yet returned, and that there was no likely-hood that the Venetians would attempt any thing before his comming, fearing by that meane nothing lesse than their arriual, they wrought but lazily in those fortifications.

Carolo Zeno (as hath bene said) departing from Venice with fise Gallies at such time as Pisani was defeated at Pola, met neere to Sicilie with Sicilian ships, diuers of which being laden with corne and other victuall as hee thought sufficient for his owne fleet, he threw the rest into the Sea; then he did let goe the Mariners who were Sicilians without any harme at all; and gaue them somewhat to beare their charges: forbidding them hereafter to goe no more to Genoa. Besides he tooke diuers Genoueses ships, as well on the coast of Trinacria, as on the Tuscan, and after he had spoiled them hee suncke them in the Sea.

In this happie iourney of his, foure Gallies departing from Candie came and ioynd with him: These likewise before they came to him, had taken three Genoueses Barzes, one betweene Candie and Morea, the other at Sapientia, by the aide of the Modonois, and the third on the Sicilian Sea: The which being brought to Naples, the merchandize which was within them was sold for fise and fortie thousand crownes. Then Carolo hauing of fise Gallies made a fleet of nine (for he was still Generall of them all) sailed speedily towards the Riuer of Genoa to spoile there, where after he had made furious incursions, torne vp Trees and plants by the roots, he made all things desolate from Porto-venere euen to Genoa. He would not tarrie to besiege any place for feare of six of the enemies Gallies, who still followed him.

This spoile being made, returning to the maine Sea, he seized on a Sicilian shippe laden with corne, and other vessells going to Genoa, he brought away the shippe, and suncke the rest. These exploits did Zeno on the lower Sea. But neere to Trinacria Micheleto Insustiano who with foure Gallies had laine in the streight, besides other shippes taken from the enemies on the Propontide Sea and the Bosphorus, he tooke a Neapolitan Barze laden with Genoueses merchandize which was sold for eighteen thousand ducats.

The six Gallies likewise which departed from Venice at the same time in a manner, or a little before Zeno, were not idle. For soone after their departure they surprized two shippes of Amona, vnto whom vpon their word, they restored what they had taken from them, and within a while after departing forth of the Gulphe they met with a Turkish Gallie which they suncke, and slew all that were in it. Then they came and made certaine light assaults on the Isle of Chios where they burnt the Wind-mills and the Rampiers. From Chios they went to Tenedos, and from thence hauing crost the streight, they sailed toward the Ponticke Sea, where hauing surprized a shippe of Sicilie, and finding the merchandize to belong to the Genoueses, it was sent as good prize into Candie.

An enterprise attempted with bad success.

The Genoueses fortifie Chioggia.

What Carolo Zeno did after his departure from Venice.

Zeno makes spoile all along the Riuer of Genoa.

Afterwards, he drew neere to Constantinople. Caloianes had at the same time recovered his Empire, and driuen his sonne Andronicus into Pera. But he was not yet master of the Caste, which did greatly vex him. Therefore he neuer ceased to importune the Venetians, vntill he had drawne them as well by entreaties as promises to assaile three hundred Genoueses which kept it. It is reported, that melting into teares, he besought the Venetians not to forsake him in so euident a danger, protesting that if by their meanes he were restored to his Empire, that the Venetians, and not hee (as in time before) should beare the name of Emperour of Constantinople. The Caste being taken by the Venetians valor, Caloianes recouered all the places of the Empire (Tenedos excepted.)

But whilst the Venetians were neere to Constantinople, they surpris'd two Genoueses ships laden with Syrian merchandize, within the which were eight and twentie Genoueses; and diuers other small vessells, which for the trafficke did ordinarily frequent the freight, and the Ponticke Sea. Pera likewise in hatred to Andronicus was straightly beleiged, and during the siege, the foure Venetian Gallies in fauour of Caloianes did neuer stirre thence.

About the same time Zeno came to Tenedos, where in few dayes nineteene Venetian Gallies arriued, trusting to whom he tooke a Barze of Naples wherein were diuers Genoueses. Whithin a while after he departed from Tenedos with fiftene Gallies, hauing left two for the guard of the Island, and sent the residew to the siege of Pera, vnder the command of Bertuccio Pisani, brother to Victor. As he passed along he would needs haue seized on Andria a Citie belonging to the Barbarians, where being stricken with an arrow he fell downe dead. Carolo came from Tenedos to Rhodes, and going from thence he tooke two Genoueses ships. Then he arriued in Cyprus, where neere the Island he tooke a Barze of the enemies laden with corne, after that, an other which was verie rich. From Cyprus he sailed into Syria, where refreshing himselfe in the Hauen of Beritha, a Candiot-Gallie arriued sent by the Prince and Senate, bringing newes of the losse of Chioggia, and of the Cities siege, who commanded him to returne speedily into Italie, to raise the enemies Campe: whereupon hee sodainly left Syria and sailed to Rhodes to take in victualles. Nicholao Zeno, Micheleto Iustiniano, Giovanni Barba were sent before with three Gallies to make expedition for whatfoeuer should bee necessarie for their iourne. They found in the Hauen of Rhodes a Genoa Barze called Pichinione, the goodliest that in those daies sailed on the Seas. The Genoueses mistrusting that which followed, that the residue of the Armie would quickly come thither, (the Venetians in the meane time not daring to assaile it for the bignesse of the vessell) went forth of the Hauen, and tooke the direct course towards Ionia, hauing but a scant winde. But it was not verie long ere Carolo arriued. There was by chance at the same time in the Hauen, a strange Barze, with an other of Spaine strongly armed, but somewhat lesler: Zeno with those and the residue of the Armie, came and ouertooke the enemye who for want of winde (as hath beene said) was not verie farre from the Hauen. The Genoueses sustained the assault a day and a night, and would not yield, vntill they perceiued their sailes to be burnt. A hundred and threescore Marchants were taken in it, and almost as many Marriners. The Florentine Marchants were let goe so soone as they came to Rhodes, and to each of them were giuen an hundred crownes to beare his charge home.

It is reported that the Genoueses neuer had a greater or richer ship. They found by the marchants bookes of accounts, that the goods within it were worth five hundred thousand crownes. They found thereof to the value of foure-score thousand such as bid most: the residue not being set to sale.

Carolo, after he had caused the great ship to be vnladen, and the goods to put in smaller vessells, suncke it in the maine sea, and then passed into Candie. In that place (as some Authors say) hee receiued the first newes of the Cities siege by Marco Morosino, who was sent thither with a Gallie of purpose by the Prince and Senate.

But during these exploits at Sea, the Citie being tormented daily more and more with the scarcitie of all necessaries, Prince Contareni departed by night from Venice in the middle of Winter, with foure and twentie Gallies, and diuers other Vessells which carried Victualls: the Horse-men, and Archers, came by day-breake, and seized on the Hauen of Chioggia: And then on a sodaine hee sanke two Barzes at the mouth of the Hauen, which he had dragged thither for that purpose, thereby wholly to take from the enemies all meanes of making any incursions, hauing at his arrival all forces at the place, where he meant to sinke them, to see that those who had the charge thereof should speedily execute it. Then the Mercenarie Souldiers being landed, and tickled with a desire to fight, marched toward the Citie: The horse within the Towne being in great numbers made a sallie forth vpon him (for there were at the same time ten thousand fighting men in Chioggia) where the battaile was bloudie and fierce on both sides: But the enemies multitude still increasing, the Venetian was beaten backe, and with great losse driuen to his Gallies. Diuers were slaine fighting, but more flying: For whilst the troupes arriued on the shore side, striving to enter into the Gallies, diuers in that amazement were slaine, and many taken: who being brought to the Citie and disarmed, were all murdered. Linco Pisani who had an honourable place in the Venetian Armie, died in this assault. The enemye by this victorie being become more insolent, did forth with arme diuers small vessells, and came against the Venetian Barzes, the which being not defended, the Gallies not being able to come neere them by reason of the strength of the flood, were presently taken and burnt: wherewith the Venetian was better contented than if the enemye had kept them and placed Garrisons in them; For if they had so done, they would haue wholly hindered the Venetian from shutting vp the hauen.

The Venetian did not greatly esteeme these two losses, hauing his nauall Armie still whole and sound, for of all his Rowers, Pilots, and Marriners, not one came on shore to fight. He speedily sent two Gallies to the Citie to bring away two other Barzes. But whilst all these preparations were making readie: Frederico Cornari went with foure Gallies by the Princes commandement to Brondolli, to shut vp one time all issues from the enemye. Being come thither hee sodainly sanke two ships neare to one another, not farre from Brondolli: the one towards Saint Blase his Church, in the way from Chioggia to Ladice, and the other in the very Hauen.

But whilst Cornari was occupied in this businesse, Prince Contareni, because hee would loose no time, caused the bottomes of those two Barzes, which the enemies had burned to bedrawne forth of the water, and filling them with flint stones, hee put them in the selfe same place from whence they had beene drawne: Then the next day hee did without any impeachment sinke in the same place the two other Barzes which came from Venice, being filled with earth and flint-stone. And because the entrance and coming forth of the Hauen, should bee flint free to the Venetians, they fortified that part thereof which looketh towards the Citie; the which the enemies sometimes attempted to hinder: But being repulsed by the arrows which were shot forth of the ships in the Hauen and then by those which lay at anchor without, they were constrained to retire to the Citie with great losse.

The enemye fearing that if the Hauen should be shut vp, he might be brought to the last point of all miseries, which is famine, caused foureteen Gallies to bee prepared to carrie part of the troupes from thence by Sea to Brondolli, intending to returne at the spring, to free his Countymen from the siege, after hee should haue reinforced his Armie at Genoa. The Venetian Gallies which Cornari had brought thither (as hath beene said) did come before them to Saint Blase his Church. The Channell was so freight as two Gallies could hardly goe in Front; the which did greatly profit the Venetians, because they could not bee enuironed by a greater number, (but the ships which were sunke auailed them specially) whereupon so soone as Cornari perceiued that the enemye sought to draw them vp from thence, and to make themselves a passage, he aduertized his fellowes thereof, who lay three miles from thence, by a smoake. Contareni perceiuing this signall, instantly commanded Thadeo Iustiniano to goe with foure Gallies to relieue Cornari. At his arriuall the enemies left off a little. Victor Pisani being sent after Thadeo with sixe Gallies, caused two other ships to be sunke, almost in the same place, and shut vp the passage with a chaine made of Masts and Saile-yards, builded in the forme of a Rampier.

Victor was made Generall of the Gallies which were sent to Brondolli : whereas Thadeo being offended (for there was alreadye some suspition of jealousie betwixt them two) forthwith departed thence in his Galley, because he would not be enforced to obey him, and came to the Prince. The residue which were thirteene remained in the Garrison, where the Venetians had much to doe, the enemies hourly seeking all meanes to open the passage. The Genoueses Gallies being brought back to Chioggia, hauing attempted the passage in vaine, the enemy seized on the Monastrie of Nunnes neare to Brondolli, and fortified it : and hauing caused his Gallies to glide along as farre as little Chioggia, he attempted likewise to possesse the other side of the Hauen of Brondolli. Victor which perceiued it (for the enemies Gallies were remoued from the other side) he commanded Giuanni Barbado to passe speedily vpon the enemy with light Vessels (whereof great numbers were from the beginning sent vnto him) whilst himselfe with his Gallies drew as neare as he could to the same side which the Genoueses intended to take. For it is most certaine that the enemy possesseing both the sides of the Hauen, the Venetian Gallies would haue bene shut in. The Hauen is foure hundred foote broad. There is small fore of Water in the midst thereof, but it is nauigable on both sides neare to the shore. Now the Genoueses possesse alreadye (as hath bene said) one of the sides, and had fortified it. If he had shut in the going forth on the left side, as he had determined, the Venetian Gallies had bene vndone. They rested not in any fort in so great a danger : they fought fiercely in the midst of the Hauen, whereby the Venetians endured much, in regard of the great numbers of arrowes which the enemies shot on them from the opposite shore. But the greatnesse of the danger made the Venetians resolute, or rather oblitinate in their determination, so that at last they brake the enemies designes ; and being become Masters of the place, they builded a Fort there with all expedition : which that they might finish with more safetie, they called great numbers of Souldiers and Artificers from the Armie.

Giorgio Caballa, Sonne to Giacomo, was sent with a good troupe to guard that place ; and by this meanes the Genoueses and the Venetians possesseed one Hauen at one time. Whereupon there were daily skirmishes, the engines of warre throwing from one side to an other. The nauall Armie was likewise much molested day and night, by the warlike engines which the enemy had in the Nunnes Monastrie. During these exploits, neare to Chioggia, the Stellani, in fauour of Bernabo Visconte, over-ran the whole Countrie of Genoa, thereby to diuert them from the Warre of Chioggia. For besides other exploits of warre, foure thousand horse came at times vnder the conduct of Affuro their Generall vnto S. Francis Church, neare to Genoa, filling the whole Countrie with feare and terrour. But the Genoueses making a fallie forth vpon them the latter time, wholly brake them, and tooke them all prisoners ; their Capitaine excepted, who escaped by meanes of a Peasant.

The forces likewise of the Emperour Calotianes did somewhat aide the Venetians, who did greatly molest those of Pera by ordinarie incursions, and sometimes by furious assaults : But so soone as his Sonne Andronicus had placed Misians and Turkes that were come to his aide, in a place neare to the Citie, for feare of danger he gaue over the Venetian partie.

This was done farre from the Citie. But on the Venetian Territorie, The Genoueses who were desirous to put forth some Gallies to succour their troupes, did with great difficultie draw eightene Gallies ouer the bridge of Port Mariana, into the streame which separateth little Chioggia from the great, and from thence conducted them with great danger to Brondolli, where being sufficiently furnished with with men and Armes, they remained before the Fort, expecting a fit time to sallie forth. The Venetians on the other side not to suffer the enemy to escape without punishment, kept good guard neare to the Hauen, to beate him in if he should attempt to make any euasion. But whilst the enemy watcht his time, and the Venetian continued to attend on him, the Venetian Gallies were greatly molested by the enemies Archers, in such sort as the Marriners like desperate persons cried out, that they were of necessitie to dislodge, vnlesse they would haue them which were in the Gallies, to die before Chioggia. Those likewise which were in guard on the shore, fearing that Carraro would send his troupes to assaile them on their backs, intreated that they might raze the Fort and depart thence. Pisani exhorted and intreated them all to haue patience for a while, and that it could not be long ere Carolo Zeno would arriue ; and that then being strengthened with Men and Gallies, they would easily daunt the enemies boldnesse.

The like despair was in the Princes Armie. For cold and hunger, and the danger of arrowes which were continually shot into the gallies had so daunted them, as the souldiers with those which were in the Hauen, thought more on flight, than on resistance. The Princes presence onely, and intreatie did stay them, who laid before them the great disgrace, and euident danger which their countrey was like to incur if they departed thence without effecting some worthie enterprize. That without doubt the Genoueses would pursue the Venetians at the heeles, if they disloded from before Chioggia, and committing more furiously than before to assaile their Citie alreadye in a manner lost by famine, they would in short space take it.

But neither entreaties, nor exhortations could perswade the souldiers, who were wholly daunted, to continue the siege, so as at last they resolute within two daies to raise their campe from both places : But Zeno on a sodaine, as if he had bene sent from Heauen, about noone entred the Hauen of Chioggia with foureteeen gallies well armed.

The Senate on the first of Ianuarie, so soone as they descried him on the maine sailing directly towards the Citie, about three of the clock after noone, sent to command him to go and meete with the Prince, who lay before Chioggia. His coming was no lesse acceptable than needfull. The ioy and welcomes were great in both Armies, but much more when they vnderstood by his speech that he had sunke threecore of the enemies vessels of all sorts, and that he had taken in the great Barze called Pichinione, and in the rest more than three hundred Genoa marchants, not accounting the rowers and marriners, and gotten a bootie more in value than three hundred thousand crownes. But because their businesse at that time required no long delay, Zeno was forthwith commaunded to goe to Brondolli with twelue gallies to meete Pisani.

His arriuall brought great contentment to the Venetians, who wept for ioy. The Garrison which was on the shore perceiuing the arriuall of their gallies, tooke courage also. At the same time three gallies of Candie, and one of Arba came to the Prince : Whereupon the Venetians seeing their Armie to consist of two and fiftie gallies, did no more feare the enemies attempts. Carolo resolute to lie at Anker without the Hauen, and not to enter before night : But a sodaine tempest arising before sun-set, he returned with sixe gallies to the Prince, hauing winde and tide with him. Thadeo Iustiniano who had remained still with the seven, hauing been grievously tossed, lost two gallies, one neere to the Fort which was broken on the Sea-banks, & the other neere to the mouth of Po. Carolo being sent back again with nine gallies to Pisani, entred the Hauen as he was commanded & ioyned with him. Two gallies were placed as sentinels neere to the place, where the enemies would haue escaped.

The Genoueses faining to escape by night, came and assailed one of those two gallies, and by the helpe of the Garrison of Brondolli drew it on shore. Those within it feeling themselves to be drawne forwards by cables and yron chaines, did presently leape into the Sea, hoping to saue themselves by swimming, but being kept down by the waues, they were all drowned, and those who stroue against the waues were slaine by the enimie. Giohanni Miami Captaine of the galley was taken with a rich booy. For this galley Carolo had brought home from his voyage.

The enimie being proud of this exploit, would needs attempt to get forth : For he certainly knew that so great a multitude of people shut vp in a place, would soone be famished if speedie meanes were not found to separate them. Whereupon the Garrison which was at Lupa neere to the haven, which the Venetian determined to assaile; and the other which ment to escape at Brondolli, came at one time to encounter the Venetian. They fought fiercely in both places, and the Genoueses were repulsed with great losse; but much more at Lupa than at Brondolli. The Venetian after all these attempts, to take all hope of escape from the Genoueses, caused two great ships of burthen to be brought from Venice, and sank them with an yron chaine in that place, (though verie straight) which remained open to the Genoueses. Then they placed five galleies for the guard of the passage commaunded by Francisco Bocelli, in which place before there were but two. Carolo Zeno was commaunded to keepe neere to the Fort with seven galleies; and five others were placed in the way to Bebia : Villor with the residue of the Armie encamped neere to Saint Blase his Church.

In these places they remained all day : in the night they came neere to Brondolli, and set boats in sentinell, to the end they might be soone aduertized if the enimie removed. Such was the state of the Venetians affaires at Brondolli, when in the meane time three Venetian galleies, sent with forces from the right hand, assailed Loretta, which in few daies was recovered and manned with a strong Garrison in like manner the new Tower which had bene burnt at the Genoueses first arrivall, was repaired and manned with souldiers for the guard thereof.

About the same time that Loretto was recovered, the Tower of the Monasterie of the Nunnes which the enemies possessed neere to the Haven, being shaken with a sodaine stroke of a Peece of batterie, was for the most part overthrowne, where Pietro Doria Generall of the Genoueses Armie was crushed in peeces. Some say that he was slaine as he was putting his vessels in order of battaile, and that (he being dead) the Fort was abandoned, and the vessels left to the mercie of the fire. And that thereupon the victorious Venetian pursued the enimie in his flight as farre as Chioggia, and that there they fought againe before little Chioggia: whereupon the Genoueses being againe vanquished with great slaughter, and having lost the one halfe of the bridge, they retired confusedly into the Citie: that the same day likewise more than fixe hundred Genoueses were taken, and almost as many slaine, of whom besides Doria of whom we now spake, Thomaso Gotti a man of great repute, was buried in the ruines of the bridge. But Charnatio setteth downe the matter otherwise, whom herein we rather follow as we haue done in other matters. He saith that all that which we haue spoken of, did not happen in one day, but at sundrie times : that both the enemies fleets did neuer lie so neere one to the other, nor did neuer so much hurt one another with arrow-shot. It is reported that no day passed wherein aboute fixe hundred great stones were not flung forth of brazen engines from one campe to the other, with great slaughter and hurt.

In the meane time they were not lesse infested neere to the Citie. For they skirmished daily neere to little Chioggia, as occasion serued. The Genoueses being shut vp in this manner, men began to come to Venice by the riuer of Po, from La Marca, Romagna, and Ferrara. By meanes whereof the dearth of victualls soone ceased. The price whereof had bene so high, as the Citie was almost brought to the last extremitie. For corne was solde at the same time, at a fourefold rate, and so likewise all other necessaries.

The Paduans by stealth in small couered boates carried victualls to the besieged. The Senate to reeferce the troupes which were before Chioggia, leuied fixe thousand foot: The Genoueses for their last attempt, would trie if by any cunning they could could put their Armie forth which lay at Brondolli, seeing by force they could not doe it. Wherefore having drawne a great and broad trench from the Fort, euen to the shoare, they were in great hope to be able in the darknesse of the night vnkowne to the Venetians to put forth to Sea, whereupon twentie galleies made account to get forth in that place, whom they thought to be sufficient to molest the Venetians coast, and chiefly the Citie of Venice, so as they being at Sea, the Venetian should be enforced whether he would or no to raise his campe. But the Venetian having discovered the enemies designe, all the souldiers thereabouts were sent for to the Princes campe, where they resolved to assault Brondolli at one time by Sea and land.

All the forces in a manner being reduced into one bodie for this purpose, there arose a quarrell betwixt the Italians and the mercenarie strangers which were in the campe : who falling to blowes, diuers in a moment were slaine, and it would greatly haue endangered the Armie, had not the Princes coming sodainly appeased the matter. This tumult, with the feare likewise, least the enimie should draw his trench euen to Brondolli, caused the Venetians to make hast, and not to tarrie for John d'Agons a wife and valorous Frenchman, whom in his absence they had named for their Generall by land. Carolo Zeno being sent with the residue of the forces which remained round about Brondolli, was commanded to bring those troups which had still laine encamped vnder the publike ensignes before the Citie neere to the shoare, to assaile the Fort of the Genoueses, who was thought to be a Captaine better experienced on the land than sea.

Pisani was alreadye commaunded carefully to attend the signall : and that so soon as he should be aduertized that his fellows fought at Brondolli, he should likewise come on the other side, and that having brought his galleies as neere as possibly he could, he should land his troups, and assaile the enimie on that side next to the Port. All things were readie for the assault of Brondolli, when as the exploit falling out fortunately at little Chioggia made them to alter their determination. For the Venetian fearing that the enimie would come on their backs, would first before they went to Brondolli assaile the Fort which the Genoueses held in that place: The troups marching on to this end, were hardly come to the Tower, when as on an instant the Genoueses as though they had bene called by a certain signall, caused all those which were at Brondolli to come to Chioggia, sauing a few who were left for the guard of the place, who were commaunded to march in battell, and to assaile the Venetians on their backs, whilest they should be busied in the fight, and that they on the other side would fall forth of the Citie, and giue a furious onset on the enimie : herein being guided after the common saying, That it is better to fight with the enimie in a set battell, than by a long siege to bee brought to all extremitie.

It is said that fiftene hundred came forth of Brondolli, and about eight thousand from the Citie. The Garrison of Brondolli came with great noise, as issuing from an ambush, and fell vpon the Venetians. Zeno brauely receiued them, and the fight was verie cruell. At the first they shot such great store of arrowes from both sides, that the aire was darkned as with a great cloud. The noise which was heard from the shoare, and from the ruines of little Chioggia, together with the clashing of Armour filled euerie place with terror: in which fight the number of the dead was great, but that of the wounded much greater.

In the meane time that great squadron of eight thousand men came forth of the Citie, and came forward in a close battallion like a torrent vpon the Venetian, who was busied in fight with the first commers. Zeno likewise turning towards them, did valiantly sustaine their first attempts, and was alreadye enforced to fight on both sides, when desiring to be ridde of the one, that he might intend the other, he came with greater furie against those of Brondolli, towards whom giuing backe by little and little, and almost halfe vanquished, the cawallerie speedily marched, who finishing ding them to be spent and tired in the fight with the footmen, did easily breake and put them to flight with great slaughter. Diuers casting themselves into the water neere to S. Katherines Church were drowned, as well because they could not swim, as by the weight of their Armour.

The victorious Venetian being freed on that side turned all his forces against the Squadron of the Citie, which being amazed at the mishap of their fellows, had already begun by little and little to give backe. Against these being of themselves disordered, the Venetian furiously marched. The enemies being then affrighted, losing their iudgement with their ranks, perceiving fortune to be contrary, beganne openly to flie: euerie man shifting for himselfe, endeouored to get ouer the bridge fearing if he should be shut forth to be murdered by the enemy; those that were last were worst dealt with. Diuers were slaine in the flight, but manie more neare to the bridge: which not being able to beare so manie armed men together, and sodainly breaking in the middelt, drew diuers with it into the ruines. Those which fell with the bridge and their Armour into the water, did all perish, some on their owne lauelings, and others by stones which fell vpon them, but the number of such was greatest who by the weight of their Armour sinking into the bottome of the water, were neuer after scene. More than a thousand who were shut forth of the bridge, were cut in peeces, and diuers likewise casting their weapons from them were taken prisoners. Those who were on the farther side of the bridge being pursued with arrow-shot were enforced to yeeld. The Venetiaps committed the keeping of the fort that the enemies Souldiers had builded in that place, to Giaco-mo Rouccio a valiant Captaine. The Tower which before the battaile was begunne to be assailed, did likewise presently yeeld.

Four hundred Genoueses were taken at the same time, among whom were diuers gentlemen: with a thousand ensignes of the Paduans and Genoueses:

The night after the battaile, the Genoueses that were at Brondolli hauing set fier on their Gallies retired in great amazement to Chioggia. So soon as Victor had notice of the enemies flight, he presently drew neere with his Gallies, where he saued two Gallies of Genoa from the fier, ten of them being burnt, and the residue drawne to Chioggia a while before. Diuers Paduans and Genoueses fearing that if the Venetian should shut vp al the passages, they might not then depart when they would, did the same night retire with great silence to Padua. The next day Victor entred into Brondolli, where hee had intelligence by certaine spies, that tenne Genoa Gallies strongly Armed, lay not far from thence for the guard of the Mills, whither he presently sent certaine small boates, to discover whether it were so or no. But the Genoueses decyfering them, and being terrified with the newes of the losse of their Armie, left their Gallies, and leaping into the water escaped by swimming to the next shoare, by meanes whereof these Gallies without any resistance at all were possessed by the Venetians, which to the great ioy of the people, were brought to Venice. Some Authors say, that they were but five, and that fourescore of the enemies were taken in them.

Carolo Zeno, hauing by the Princes commandement drawne his troupes from the lesser Chioggia, came and encamped before the Hauen of the Citie, by the way which leadeth to Brondolli, neere to Saint Francis Church, where he caused his Souldiours to make a great Trench. The Genoueses then perceiving that they were more straightly shut in, did put all the women and children, with other vnprofitable eaters forth of the Citie. Prince Contareni sent that wretched companie to Venice. Besides, the Venetian inclosed all the passages from the firme Land to Chioggia, with stronger rampiers. Pisani likewise by building a Tower and a rampier at Brondolli, did within a month make the Hauen so strong, as leauing a few troupes for the guard thereof, he brought thence his Armie out of all feare and danger. The siege still continued till Chioggia was recouered.

In the meane time, vpon report that a new Armie was prouiding at Genoa, and that that of a certaine Prince Carraio made great preparations of Armor and shipping, and perceiving besides, that they should not speedily recouer Chioggia, the Senate to prevent the like scarcitie of victuall, as that wherewith the Citie was a while before afflicted, decreed that certaine ships of burthen should be sent into Apulia to fetch corne, and that Thaddeo Iustiniano with twelue Gallies should be their conuoy. He failing towards Histria did without any great difficultie recouer Grada, where surprising diuers Foriani, he sent them all bound to Venice. Hee departed thence with a faire wind, and came to Manfredonia, where he had intelligence that the Genoueses Armie was not farre off, being commanded by Maruffo Doria; hee presently sent backe those shippes which he had laden with corne: Soone after, the enemy approaching, he caused the other shippes to bee suncke in the Hauen to the end the Genoueses should make no vse of them, and himselfe with six Gallies (for the rest were gone a forraging) returned towards Venice. But a terrible tempest arising, caused him to returne to Manfredonia, where (because the enemy was at hand) he caused all his Gallies to be disarmed, and their tackling and furniture to be caried into the Towne, which done, he suncke them in the Hauen. Then barricadoing his troupes on both sides the entrie of the hauen, to the end they might fight incouert, he resolved to hinder the enemies entrance. Some say that Guido Foranensis the Cities Gouernour, counselled Thaddeo to leaue the Hauen and to retire with his troupes into the Citie, but that he would by no meanes doe so.

At the enemies first arriuall, there was a cruell fight for two houres space: then both sides made a pause whilst they refreshed themselves, & soone after they returned to the combat with greater furie. The Hauen had been brauely defended, if the Venetian had not bene enforced to fight neere together, and in a round figure, by reason that some of the enemies were landed, they neuertheless for a while brauely sustained all their assaults: But being beaten thence by the enemies great multitudes, they fled. The Citie being not farre off was the cause that the slaughter was no where else but in that place where they skirmished. Thaddeo with a hundred of his Souldiours were taken by the enemy.

The Genoueses hauing broken as much of the suncke Gallies as appeared about water, failed to Ficulan, where six other Venetian Gallies were reported to be, five of which by the enemies rash entrance escaped and came to Venice, and the other being not so swift as the rest, was taken. The slaues of those Gallies which were lost at Manfredonia, came to Chioggia by Land. Where, at the verie same time as all this happened farre from Venice, the Venetians fought with good successe on the Lakes, with fourescore of the enemies vessels, eight of which were taken, and the residue being put to flight retired with great feare to Chioggia. But the assault which was within a while after giuen to the Genoueses Fort at the Mills was not so fortunate. For the Venetian was not only shamefully beaten thence, but the sonne of Lodouico Loretano a valorous yong man, with diuers other Venetians of note were there slaine. The Venetians comming againe the morrow after to enuiron the Fort; the Paduan Armie (which Chioggia being besieged had remained there, intending to passe ouer into the firme Land, so soone as the Venetian Gallies should not be able to stirre for want of water) was onward on their iournie in the Lakes, so as whilst the Venetians were busied in the fight, newes was brought them that the Paduans were escaped towards the firme Land. Whereupon they gaue ouer their enterprize, and crossing the Lakes they made hast to ouertake the enemy, whom on a sodaine neere to the shoare they defeated and put to flight.

The enemies escaping into the neighbour Marishes, all their vessels to the number of fourescore were taken, & with them threescore prisoners, among whom were so diuers Genoueses; They were not idle in Zenos Campe, for they still fought as occasion was offered. The enemies beginning to want victualls, the Souldiours first, & then the Genoueses, craued that they might depart from Chioggia with their goods; the which was flatly denied to either of them.

Not long after, the Venetians having intelligence that the Genoueses Armie was arrived in Dalmatia, and of the preparations which Carrario made on the frontiers to relieve his associates, and to raise the siege, sent word to the besieged, that whosoever would have their lives saved should forthwith leave Chioggia (for the Historians mention no set time) and come and yield their bodies at the Prison gates in Venice, otherwise they should not expect any mercie.

It is reported that the enemy did so contemne this proposition, as not one among all their great number would embrace it. They had beene aduertized of the coming of their Armie, and therefore hoping that the siege would soone be raised, they resolved still to hold out, and to endure any extremitie rather than to yield. The Senate did set forth fiftie light vessells to resist the Paduans attempts, for they were to fight on the lakes. They did afterwarde cause five and twentie Gallies to come to the Citie, which should be opposed against the enemy, if he had made any approach.

On the fourth of June about three of the clocke after dinner the Genoueses Armie presented it selfe before the Hauen of Chioggia, being three and twentie Gallies in number. They came within a mile of the Citie, and with great cries called the enemies to fight. But the Venetians not stirring at all, made themselves readie to receive the enemies assaults: And in another place great number of light boates kept watch on the lakes to discour the Paduans proceedings. The Genoueses perceiuing that they could not draw the Venetians to fight, retired to the Fossioni, from whence they daily came to challenge the Venetians with reprochfull speeches. Yet neuertheless Prince Costareni and the other Captaines continued still firme in their resolution, by no meanes to fight. And yet they sent forth certaine small boates which by their swiftnesse did greatly molest the enemies Gallies.

Pisani at the last concerning the enemies small number, did by the Princes permission sallie forth of the Hauen with five and twentie Gallies, and being come somewhat forward at sea, he did on a sodaine turne the prowes of his Gallies vpon the enemy at Fossioni. The Genoueses durst not attend them, but hauing retired the Armie, they did on a sodaine flie towards Ancona; but the Venetian without the Princes commaundement would not pursue them verie farre, fearing to leaue the siege.

The besieged at the same time would needs attempt one meanes more to escape, hauing for the purpose made a hundred small boates of the wood of houses, each of which had tenne oares. They had determined (for their fleet within few daies after was returned to their olde place of abode) that so soone as their Gallies should approach the Hauen, and with their great vsuall noise make all men attentive to behold them (for they had received new supplies from Genoa and Dalmatia) three of their Gallies should come as neare as they could to the shoare right ouer against the lesser Chioggia. And in the meane time those within the Towne should come forth by the inner channells which lead to the port Mariana and the lesser Chioggia, and being come to the Sea, should goe aboard the Gallies: Granello of Pera was the Conductor of this enterprize. Hee when all things were readie, gaue a signall to his people to come forth. Those of Zeno's Campe hauing discovered the matter, did speedily aduertize the Prince that the enemy was readie to depart. Diuers light boates were forthwith sent to hinder their coming forth, who hauing crossed the water, and being come to the place where the enemy was already come forth, did on a sodaine so affright them, as in a moment they were defeated. Fiftie of their boates were taken, diuers of them were slaine, and fourescore prisoners were taken with Granello their leader, and the residue by flight escaped into the Citie.

Blondus saith that the Genoueses made an attempt to cut a sunder the chaine which crost the funke Argolis at the entrance of the Hauen, at which time Murrufo the Generall of their Armie came at the flood, and gaue in vpon the Venetian tian Gallies and that the Kirmish being begunne, hee busied the Venetian in fight, whilst his people tooke away that hinderance: but that both their attempts proved vaine. For those who would haue come forth, and those likewise who came and assailed them at their backes, were in such sort beaten by the Engines of warre and by arrow-shot, as they were basely enforced to flie.

The Genoueses being daunted with the losse of their people returned to their vsuall abode. Those in the Citie perceiuing that neither their owne attempts nor those of their fellowes did any whit auail them, did set all the prisoners at libertie, and bringing them to the Citie gates, sent them to the Campe. It is thought that they did it for feare, least if they should haue died in prison, they themselves in like manner falling afterwarde into the enemies power might receiue the selfe same punishment.

Then they tried another means to get forth. They sent messengers to the Captaines in Zeno's Campe, who promised them all the gold, siluer, and Armour of the Genoueses with the Citie to boot, on condition that the Venetians would permit them to depart thence home to their houses without any harme at all. To this forme of yeelding they did all hearken; But Zeno opposing it, did aduertize the Prince thereof by an expresse messenger. Pietro Hemo his Counciller was forthwith sent thither, for besides diuers things which would haue beene taken from them by this kind of yeelding, the Venetians should haue receiued a great disgrace, if the Genoueses their ancient and Capitall enemies being with great danger and trauaile brought to all extremitie should haue escaped from them without punishment. By Hemo's aduice then it was concluded, that the spoile of the Citie should be giuen to the Souldiers, and that as manie as tooke the enemies paie should become their prisoners; and the Genoueses, Paduans, Forlani, Dalmatians, and Greekes, being more apt to tug an oare than to beare Armes, should with the Citie fall to the Venetians share. The Captaines being by these Articles put in minde of their dutie, did promise and swear to Zeno, that they would neuer againe accept of the Genoueses offers, nor in any sort harken to their messengers, entreaties, or promises whatsoever.

The matter being thus appeased, Roberto della Marca, who held a very honourable place in the Armie, continuing still wilfull in his opinion that the Genoueses offers should be accepted, did labour all hee might to haue it done, til being brought into Zeno's presence, hee was by a generall consent committed to prison, and two dayes after being convicted of treacherie was hanged at Venice: and thus by the death of one only man the whole tumult was appeased.

The Genoueses first designe prouing vaine, they endeouored still to raise some sedition in the Campe, as they had done at the beginning, by making greater offers to the Souldiers. But the Captaines sent their messengers to Zeno, assuring them that the Genoueses liues and deaths were in his and the Venetians hands, and that they were to entreate and beg their liues of them, and to vse no more meanes to the Souldiers, for both they and their Captaines, were at the commaund of Carolo, into whose presence they being come, they could by no meanes change his determination on.

Hauing then lost all hope, falling to teares and entreaties, they sent the chiefe of all their troupes to the Prince, who weeping and falling at his feete, entreated him for the loue of Almighty God, and in pittie of their calamities, to take commiseration of their present miserie; confessing that they had till then like enemies executed diuers enterprises against the Venetians, as well by Sea as Land, but that it was only for dominion, and not for greedinesse of mens liues: which might be easily testified, in regard that during the warres all prisoners on both sides, had beene oftentimes redeemed or exchanged, and sometimes likewise by convention set at libertie: Namely that lately at the taking of Chioggia, not any one was injured by them, that were found without Armes, except some few, who by the rashnesse and follie of some particular persons, and not by the generall consent of all men, had bene slaine. And that besides, they had neuer refused to giue anie man his life that had requested it. That victualls beginning to growe scarce, they dismissed their prisoners, fearing least they should be famished in Prison. They did not denie but that they had tried all meanes before they wou'd yeelde; which neuerthelesse they had not done so much for any hatred they did beare to them, as because they would not bee counted Bifonians and cowards among their Countreimen. And that now being vanquished rather by famine than by Armes they did not request to carrie away with them their owne gold, silver, or mouables, but onely their liues: the which if it should bee denied to men vnarmed, and who did humbly craue it, would for euer bee accounted a deed both cruell and inhumane: Yet whatsoeuer should befall the Genoueses in this warre, they had next vnto God placed their hope in the meeknesse and mercy of the Venetians. They besought them then to bethinke what regard they meant to haue, to their prayers and teares, and lastly to their greiuous calamitie. For they could not believe, nor neuer would, though they should endure the vttermoſt extremitie, that they who had so many times felt the thwart of aduerſe fortune would forget the alteration of wordly affaires.

The replie made vnto them.

To this there was no gentle replie made, but only that they might bee free to bee soone imprisoned, and that then the Senate would arleisure determine of their life or death: That in the meane time, it was both iust and reasonable that those should remaine in darke captiuitie, who to obey their owne vnbridled passions, had lost their libertie. They were then commanded to depart, and to take heed least that by their owne fault they lost not the offer made vnto them, and that they should speedily dispatch what they had to doe. Being returned to the Citie they brought newes of nothing but sad calamitie, how the losse of their goods, imprisonment, and their liues were in danger. But being grieuouſly afflicted by famine (for there were some among them who of a long time had scene no bread) they refused to yeeld howsoeuer rather than to die with hunger. Therefore setting vp an Ensigne on the highest Tower of the Citie, the Genoueses flecte came forthwith from their vsuall place of abode into the Cities view, but the besieged did soone take it downe: whereat those of the Gallies being moued, sought by all meanes to encourage them: but they within the Citie returning them no signall for an answere, they were certainly perswaded, that both they and themselves were wholly vndone: whereupon, being sad and disconsolate they retired to the Fossioni.

Famine enforced them to yeeld.

The Capitaines in the meane time sent into the Citie to separate the mercenarie Souldiers from the Genoueses, and to put the richest bootie into a certaine place. Foure thousand prisoners fell to the Venetians, three thousand of whom were Genoueses, two hundred Paduans, a few Forlani, and the residue Dalmatians and Illirians with some Greekes, who were all brought prisoners to Venice. The Souldiers being disarmed, were let goe. The whole spoile being laid on a heape in Saint Marias Church was for the space of two daies sold to such as bid: most: the monie was distributed among the Souldiers, and the Citie was by the Capitaines yeelded after it had bene taken by the Genoueses. Prince Contareni, Victor Pisani, Carolo Zenno, and the chiefe of the Armie entred it on the foure and twentieth of Iune:

Chioggia being recovered in this manner, the Venetians because they would not stoppe the fortunate course of their victories, did forthwith send to besiege the Fort of Bebia, thereby to make free passage for their Merchants who traffique into Lombardie. The Genoueses in the meane time, dislodging from all places neare to Venice, did neare to Corbolles set vpon diuers ships loden with corne, who tarried in that place till such time as the Genoueses Fleet were removed (that they might with more safetie goe to Venice) the which at the first they tooke, and furnishing their Gallies with corne for their owne prouision, they threw the residue into the Sea, and then failed into Histria.

the Palace, taken on the person of Donato Trevis Gouvernour of the Citie, and imprisoned all the other Venetians, whom they first despoiled of their wealth. After that, they assailed both the Forts, (for there were few people in them) which within two daies yielded, and were presently razed downe to the foundations.

Prince Contarini having provided for the affaires of Chioggia, left Carolo Zeno for the guard thereof, and making Pisani Admirall of the Sea, he returned to Venice where he was generally welcomed with signes of great ioy. The newes of the Thyrse rebellion being brought at the same time to Venice, did in some fort interrupt their mirth. For at the Princes arrivall the Citie was troubled thereat: But on the very day of his entrie, other newes no lesse distastfull arrived, how that Cap-Histria was taken. It was reported of a certaine that the enemies Armie was so mightily encreased, as besides the Gallies (which were fortie in number) they had diuers other small boats of two ranks of Oares: and that the enemies after they had taken the Towne, had wholly spoiled it, certaine houses of banished men excepted, by whose means and trecherie they had surprised it, but that the Castle did still hold out for the Venetians, into the which Crispino Azo of Treviso perceiuing the Citie to be lost, had with certaine troupes entered.

The losse of these two neighbour Cities, brought great discontentment to the whole Citie: And then the great Armie which the enemy was reported to haue, did much trouble the Senate. For it was very likely, that vnlesse their Armie were as strong as that of the enemies, the Genoueses would in short time become Masters not only of Histria, but of all the Venetian coast. Resolving then forthwith to leue a mightie Armie, they tooke order that no day should passe, but some Gallies should be manned and Armed.

But during these preparations at Venice, the Genoueses having restored Cap-Histria vnto the Patriarch of Aquileia, departed thence with their Gallies, and speedily encamped before Brondolli, where so soone as they had viewed the fortification of Chioggia, and perceiued how all passages were shut vp from them, they sailed towards the Citie. The Fleet remained in order of battaile for a time before the Hauen, but not with great assurance. For diuers light boats going speedily forth of the Hauen, did greatly molest them by arrow-shot, and stones thrown forth of engines. But no signe of a battaile appearing, the Genoueses returned towards Histria, when hauing attempted to cause the Piarnes to revolt, they did furiously assaile the Citie, because the inhabitants and the Souldiers would not consent thereunto: But being brauely defended, the enemy was with great disgrace beaten thence.

The Genoueses did likewise at the same time assaile Parenza, but their attempts as well there as at Piarna were to no purpose. The enemy departed thence, and came to the Frontiers of the Carnori where they trimmed their Gallies in the Hauen of Marran.

The Venetians did at the same time recouer the Fort of Bebia. It is certaine that the siege lasted for a while: for three score Genoueses were within it, who at the first did valiantly defend the place, but when they perceiued the Venetians who were entred into their defences, to beate downe the Fort, thirtie of the besieged by swimming ouer the Riuer escaped, and fled to Padua: Those which continued within, hauing valiantly defended it were either all slaine or taken: Those likewise who kept the Tower would neuer yeeld till they perceiued it to be set on fire.

Bebia being recouered, all the other Forts and Townes which are in the Lakes or at the mouthes of Riuers, were recouered by the Venetians, Cap-darger excepted which was held by Carrario. On these termes stood the Venetians affaires, when on a sodaine newes was brought that the Genoueses had taken Pola, and burnt it for the most part. This caused the Venetians, sooner than they had determined to passe ouer with a mightie Armie into Histria: At their arrivall the enemy being danted, (for the report was that they had seuen and fortie Gallies, and manie boats of two ranks of Oares) hauing spoiled the Citie, did retire to Zara. The Venetians Armie being come into the Prouince, was forthwith encreased by many Gallies from the Piarnes, Parenzanes, and other inhabitants of Histria, who had continued loyal to the Venetians, so as it amounted to an hundred warlike vessels. The Venetians neuer had a better furnished naual Armie, For euery Gallie had fiftene men at Armes, besides the rowers, Archers, and other mariners.

Pisani commanded this mightie Armie. Caballa of Verona was there likewise, who had bene (as hath bene said) at the beginning General of the Armie by Land. The Venetians being come into Histria, sent forth two Gallies in the euening towards Cap-Histria, to discover the state of the Citie. Michael Delfino and Petrucio Maripetro commanded those two Gallies. These being assailed by the night, did breake the bridge which the Patriarch of Aquileia had made from the Citie to the firme Land. For being thus broken there was some likelihood that the Venetians being encamped before it, those within could not hope for reliefe from any place. Diuers of the Bandetti who had bene the cause of the taking of the Citie, so soone as the bridge was broken did the same night escape to the firme Land, by the foordes neere to the Citie. By day-broke the residue of the Armie approached: the light vessels went before being followed by the residue with great cries. Those who kept the Castle would not loose so faire an occasion, but presently making a sallie vpon those of the Citie, did so affright them as they presently yeelded. Four hundred Forlani were taken there, among whom were Nicolas Spilingbergo Gouvernour of the Citie, and Simon Tambergino. The Citie in detestation of the Bandetti was wholly spoiled, and then left to the guard of the inhabitants who were not then (in regard of the miserie of the time) verie many: they placed a good Garrison in it to defend it with them, fearing least the enemy should againe seize on it, by reason of the small number of the inhabitants.

Cap-Histria being recouered, Pisani would haue directly gone to Pola, but that he tarried for an expresse commandement from the Prince and Senate, to knowe their pleasures, whether they thought it fit that he should passe with his Armie ouer the Fanaticke Gulphe: which being granted him, the Armie soone after drew neere to Pola. The Genoueses in the meane time were not idle: For whilest the Venetian Gallies remained at Cap-Histria, they brought theirs to the Isle of Scardona, neere to Liburnia, where they enforced Arba the chiefe Citie of the Island to yeeld, hauing for a time sustained a siege. They yeelded on these conditions, That if the Inhabitants would deliuer to them all the Venetians which were in the Citie with Lodouico Contarini their Gouvernour, the residue of the Inhabitants should haue no harme. The Arbians did euer till then affect the Venetians, and had often bene besieged during that warre, choosung rather to endure all extremitie than to quit their obedience.

Chinatius who more than any other Author hath curiously written the last Genoueses warre, saith, that the Arbians did not for many daies eat any bread, liuing onely on flesh and white meates: but that at last being daunted by the cruell assaults of the enemies, they yeelded on composition, not such as they were resolved to haue done, but on such as they could obtaine of the enemy. The Genoueses entring into it, left three Gallies for the defence thereof, and afterward departed thence.

This was done at Sea, at such time as the Paduan came and besieged Treviso, hauing builded two bridges on the Riuer, one at Casal, and the other neerer the Citie, where Carrario in hast had builded a Tower. He did resolute at first, to tame the Venetian Souldiours & the Trevisians by famine, by shutting vp all the passages of the Riuer, by which victualles were brought from Venice thither. The Paduans Camp laie neere to the Tower, from whence they made daily incursions euen to the gates. The Towns-men were besides greatly tormented by the enemies peeces of battery. At this stay stood the Venetians affaires at Treviso, when Pisani being come neere to Zara, and hauing begun to batter the Hauen, vnderstood by spies, that twelue Genoueses gallies were a while before gone from thence into Apulia to fetch corne. Hauing intelligence hereof (notwithstanding that he was sicke of a Feuer which had held him from the fifth of August) because he would not loose so faire an occasion, he departed from Zara and went after the enemies whome he ouertooke on the coast of Belligion, but the darkenesse of the night at their verie first encounter made him to loose sight of them. Catharino Corberio Captaine of one of the Gallies was slaine at their first meeting.

of all men.*

The Venetian hauing lost the fight of the enemy, retired to Manfredonia, where Victor sonoe after dyed to the great griefe of the whole Armie. It is reported that neuer any man was better beloued of his Countie-men, whereupon whilest he liued they called him their Protector, & being dead they all bewailed him as their father. Loaquico Loretano commanded the Armie in his sted till such time as the Senate had prouided another. Pisani his bodie being brought to Venice, was with a great pompe brought by the Senate with a great concourse of people to Saint Anthomes Church. His Tombe is at this day to be seene neere to the high Altar, bewitched with Marble and goulding.

There was neuer any funeral more followed with teares and sighs than this, so greatly was he beloued of all men. The Senate gaue his place to Carolo Zeno, who was commanded to depart speedily to the Armie, two Gallies being made ready for his conduct.

*Carolo Zeno is

But whilest the Citie thought on this businesse, the Venetians had not forgotten Treuifo, where the passages being shut vp they were brought to all extremitie for want of victualles, whereat the Senate being highly displeased, did attempt to open them and to send prouision to the besieged. Therefore they made an engine of shippes which should plucke vp all the Piles which had bene driuen into the Riuer, which was accompanied with foure and twentie Ganzaroles, and with diuers other vessels well armed, with part of the troupes which were at Chioggia, and of those which lay about the Hauen of the Citie: the managing hereof was committed to Martino Carrasuala a diligent and valiant person, who had charge of the opening of the Riuer. The Paduans had planted athwart the Riuer of Silla from one side to the other, on that side neere to Crete, three rankes of Piles so neere one to another, as it seemed to be a chaine. Sarrasino Dandolo commanded those troupes which were to bee conducted to Musftra, by the shoare oppositeto the enemy. Musftra is within a mile of Casal, where the enemy had a Fort. Being come to this place, this engin of shippes well armed with all necessaries did sodainly moue towards the enemy, hauing for conuoy on the shoare a good troupe of Souldiours, and being come to the inclosure, they were busied two full dayes, in plucking vp two rankes of Piles, in which meane time they fought brauely with the enemy. There was nothing to be seene on both sides but Arrowes and Dartes flying in the Aire. But the enemies brazen Peeces of batterie, did greatly endamage the Fleete, and chiefly the engine which pluckt vp the Piles, which being battered with many blowes was made vnprofitable, being in all parts full of leakes. Those likewise who were on the shoare did continually shoot.

The Paduan troupes which besieged the citie ran to Casal at the Venetians first arrivall, vnder the conduct of Girardo Caminensis, so likewise did all the Souldiours nere to Padua, who were called thither in hast: by meanes whereof they often fought at Musftra: but in euerie encounter, the enemy had still the better. Diuers Venetians were slaine, but more taken, among whome was Iohn surnamed le Grand, a French man of a verie noble house: whereupon the fleete gaue ouer the enterprize, and retired to Musftra. But the enemy, albeit he saw the Venetian gone, would not stand still, but hauing staked diuers trunks of trees, and great peeces of timber, and other things which they abundantly found there in the mouth of the riuer, they shut vp the passage more strongly than before.

*The Venetians

The

The Venetians perceiuing their encamping in that place to bee to no purpose departed thence some two houres before day, and came to Melstra, to make triall whether they could relieue the Treuifans by land, seeing by water they could not. Dandolo in the meane time fell sicke, and was constrained to goe home to his house, in whose sted Pietro Hemo was sent by the Senate. The fleete likewise so soone as the footmen were departed from Musftra, was brought backe to Venice. Now when the Venetian fleet was dislodged, the enemy brought backe his troupes to the campe: Then, fortifying the Tower with men and victuals (for he had no other safe place of retreat) fearing some encombrance from the Venetians, who were encamped at Melstra, he dislodged, and in all hast besieged Noualla which he beganne forthwith to batter with his engines.

by the enemy.*

Treuifo.*

Meane while the Treuifans being at times relieved with victuals by those of Melstra, the dearth was in some sort diminished. For the scarcitie was so great in the Citie, as the ordinarie measure of corne was worth foure crownes, and in regard thereof, diuers of the common people did voluntarily abandon the Citie, the most part of whom retired to Venice. The enemy hauing no good successe at Noualla, being wearied with so long a siege, and being out of hope to take the Citie, raised his campe, and returned to the Paduan territorie. Where because winter drew neere, he disposed his armie into diuers garrisons, and sent them away to winter. This is all that was done on the firme land that Summer, and a part of Haruest. At Sea Laurentano approached with the nauall Armie neere to Ancona, and afterwards failed into Histria. But soone after, departing thence he tooke Bressia and Senia on the frontiers of Liburnia by assault which hee spoyled: howbeit through an vnfortunate fire at that time hapning in Senia, the whole bootie was almost consumed.

*Bressia and Se-
Loretano.*

At the report of the coming of this great Armie, the Goritani being affrighted forsooke the Citie, and retired with their wiues and children to the highest hilles in the Island. The Bishop of the place came to the Venetians, and offered them the Citie, and humbly entreated Loretano, not to suffer his souldiers to commit any hostile actes in a Citie that yielded. Whereupon there was no outrage done, not so much for present curtesie, as in regard of the faithfull friendship which the ancient Lords of that Island had borne to the Venetians, wherein they had by mutual offices stil continued, till such time as king Lewis tooke all Dalmatia from them. From thence he came to Bocharis: which being taken by force, hee wholly burnt and spoyled it. Then he departed towards Pola, where by the Senates letters he was aduertized that Carolo Zeno was appointed Generall of the nauall Armie, whereat all men highly reioyced: For, besides his valour, he was next to Pisani the most popular man. From Pola he came to Parenza, where in few daies after Zeno arrived.

*What Loretano
did after Pisani
his death.*

*Zeno arriveth
in the Armie.*

Hauing mustered the Galley-slaues, he found that many were wanting. VWhereupon fearing that for want of rowers, he might incurre some danger, if he should happen to meete the enemy, hee disarmed seuen of the formost gallies, and with their spoiles manned such as had need, and being thus disarmed (because without rowers, they could not serue in the warres) he sent them backe to Venice, into which Caballa of Verona entered with the troupes of the land Armie, being called home by the Senate by reason of the warre of Treuifo. Three of these gallies being come to Venice were presently armed and giuen to Marco Phalerio for the defence of Romagna, and La Marca. For the Genoa gallies making daily incursions neere to Ancona, had in such sort turned the marchants from commerce with Venice, as the dearth began already in the Citie. But Phalerio his arrivall restrained the enemies boldnesse, whereupon the dearth ceased.

The passage at sea being assured to the marchants, Phalerio by the Senates decree went with his gallies to Zeno in Dalmatia. The Armie after diuers passages to and fro through Histria and the frontiers of Dalmatia, not finding the enemy any where, where, was brought backe to Venice, about the first of Nouember, hauing done no memorable matter, leaving onely foure gallies to guard the Prouince.

VVithin a while after Carolo departed from Venice with three hundred small vessels well armed, and came and besieged Marrana a sea-towne of the Forlani. By the way hee met with threecore well armed vessels of the same sort, belonging to those of Grada and Piran, who came to him at the haufen of Lignana, wherewith hauing joynd his owne, hee gaue a furious assault to the Citie: But, it being circled on euerie side with the Sea, and well fortified, their attempts proued bootlesse. The Venetian hauing viewed the place, perceiued that he should but loose his labour. But because he would not seeme to depart thence for feare hauing brought his forces to the walles, for a while they fought fiercely: but at last diuers being hurt, Zeno retired without any further losse.

The great expences of the warre had exhausted the publike treasure, when as the Senate being enforced by the dearth commaunded fixe Gallies, and sixteene boates with two ranks of Oares to be prepared to goe into Candie, to fetch thence the richest wares of certain particular persons, to the end that they being sold by their consent, the money might be employed for entertainment of the Armie, being lent for a time to the Commonwealsh. At the beginning of the spring (for sooner they could not by reason of the tempestuous VVinter) the fleet went to sea vnder the conduct of Simonetto Micheli. But I finde in the meane space that these preparations were made in Venice, That diuers light skirmishes were made on either side, as well on the Treuisan, as in Histria, and that they fought with different successe as aduantage was offered.

The Garrison which the Venetians held in Castell-Franco, hauing receiued no pay for certaine moneths, first chaced away Andrea Paradiso the Cities Governour, and afterwards assisted by the inhabitants receiued Carrario into their wals. This revolt caused diuers others on the Treuisan shortly after to doe the like. The newes of this losse being brought to the Citie, another soone followed. For the Hungarians that were encamped on the mountaines, and who from thence did ouerrunne the Countie of Ceneda, had imprisoned Gulielmo Caminenfis an associate of the Venetians, accusing them to haue, contrarie to the agreement, relieved during the warres, the townes of Sacilla, Cogniliana, and diuers others subiect to the Venetians, with victuals, and they demanded to haue the Haufen of Bufatere deliuered to their hands, and that Caminenfis with all his family should retire to Conigliana.

The Venetians affaires being in this sort brought to all extremities on the firme land, and not knowing from whence to be supplied, either for victuals or money, to sustaine the charge of the warre, the Senate resolved to send to Leopold Duke of Austria, and in the Commonwealthes name to offer him the Citie of Treuifo, with her confines, which if the Paduans should not hereafter desist to molest, it was certaine that the Almaine would on a sodaine come into Italie with the greatest forces he could leaue, and that thereby the Commonwealthe, being elsewhere sufficiently busied with Sea-matters, should by forraigne forces be eased of the warre on the firme land. Pantaleon Barba was by the Senates decree sent to the Duke.

In the meane time, about a thousand horse of those at Mestra for want of their pay went from the Venetians to the enemies side. Those who remained after the others departing, did in the night bring some victuals to Treuifo, and in their returne thence were surprized by the enemies ambush, whereupon, some of the horse being taken, and the residue put to flight, went first to Treuifo, and afterwards to the campe, so as all the troupes which were at Mestra, were in a short space brought to nothing. The Venetians being daunted with so many losses, sought meanes of agreement with Carrario, referring themselves to the arbitrement of Alberto d'Elia. And to this purpose they sent vnto him Frederico Cornari, and Pirrinio Rotta, the one being his Procurator, and the other his Goship, and ancient friend. But they could procure him by no meanes to deale in the businesse, so mischieuously at the same time were their neighbours bent against them.

And because the report then was, that they were already mounted on the carriges, the Venetians on a sodaine made great Causies and Rampiers on the banks of Mulsiona, as men goe by water to Mestra, thinking that all the enemies practises were wholly bent to surprize and invade Mestra. But his designs were elsewhere. For Carrario being come to Noualla, began furiously to batter it, and hauing broken downe the cawties round about Moggiana, on which men went to Treuifo, and placed a strong Garrison at the breach, hee tooke from the Treuisans all hope of reliefe. The Garrison in Treuifo being aduertized of the Ambassade sent to Leopold (for all men certainly beleued that Pantaleon Barba was sent to offer Treuifo with her confines to the Almaine:) fearing in this alteration to be defrauded of their due, and hauing receiued no pay of a long time, they chose Horatio Malespina a discrete person, to vnderstand and debate the souldiers cause. They did all sweare and promise to accept of agreement, truce, warre, peace, or whatsoever he should conclude, saying, that at his command they would take and lay by Armes, so that he would onely take their cause in hand, and take such order for them, as they might not bestow so great labour and trauaile as they had endured for nothing. This Horatio being a wise and discrete Gentleman, came with all the Captaines to the Venetian Magistrate. Leonardo Dandolo was Governour of the Citie, Marco Zeni chiefe Iustice, and Andrea Venier Prouidator, vnto whom it is said, he spake in this manner.

Malespina his speech to the Magistrates of Treuifo.

IT is reported for certaine, my Lordes of Venice, that the Prince and Senate haue sent to Leopold Duke of Austria, to offer him in the name of the Commonwealthe the Citie of Treuifo with her confines, the which which we may suppose, (if he be not senselesse) that hee will willingly embrace. Who doubteth but that when he hath accepted thereof, he will soone come hither with forces, and commit the guard of the Citie to his owne souldiers? or (that which I can hardly beleue) if delaying to come, he should afterward arrive in Italie too late, Carrario is heere, vnto whom whether we will or no, we must of force yield, he hauing shut vp all the passages, and taken all hope from vs as well of victuals as of souldiers: Now because we are zealous of them both, & unwilling to loose so many moneths pay which is due vnto vs, we haue determined, respecting the Venetian dignitie, & the faith of souldiers, to looke to our affaires in time, and gently to demand our pay. And because we will doe nothing rashly, we are resolu'd to containe our selues a while longer in our dutie, till such time as one of you shall goe to Venice, to take order that our due be sent vs. In the meane space you may safely reliee vpon vs. But heerein wee will endure no delay, nor haue the Senate aduertized heereof by letters or messengers: one of your selues must needs goe thither, to the end all may fall out prosperously. Wee will expect the returne of him, whom ye shall send, so long time as we shall thinke to be sufficient to provide money: For there needeth no long determining in matters that are iust. The fault shall bee in you, if we be not such hereafter as wee haue hitherto beene, or if yee enforce vs by injuries to commit ought against your profit and reputation. For we will keepe our faith and promise with you, euen so long as yee shall please.

This vnciuill demand of the Souldiours greatly amazed the Venetians: for there was no man but easily knewe whereto their designs tended. Albeit they made a gentle reply, yet euerie one fearing as much his owne particular danger as that of the Publike, they concluded betwixt themselves that Dandolo should forthwith be sent to Venice, to aduertise the Prince and the Senate on what termes the affaires of Treuifo stood. Departing therefore by night somewhat farre off from the enemies Campe, he came with two trustie friends by woody and by-waies to Mufestra and from thence to Venice. The Senate being aduertised in what danger Treuifo was, resolved by a common consent to provide money; but they were at a stand by what means safely to conuey it thither: For they could not do it without great danger, the enimie possessing all the passages; besides, they had no forces readie to conuey it thither. Therefore they concluded to write to Zeno that he should deal with the chiefe of the Citie, that some of them would in the Common-wealths name paie the Souldiours their due; saying that they were readie to make ouer the same summe into what Banco they pleased: But in regard of the length of the warre those who were thought to be best monied, said that they were so farre from hauing any summes of money lying by them, as on the contrary they had not one pennie; that their continuall losses one vpon another, had in such sort stript them of all means, as they were in a manner readie to begge. Whereupon leaving the Townesmen they deliuered all two strangers who did put forth money to interest: who on the assurance of the Common-wealths word did presently tell downe the money, and by this means the Souldiours were paid.

But whilest these things were done at Treuiso, the enimie hauing assembled all his forces from diuers places, came and besieged Asil, where there was no great Venetian Garrison, Francisco Delfino Governour of the place, and those that were with him, distrusting their small number retired into the Castle. The enimie comming to bessege them, hauing battered it with engins of warre, and vndermined it in sundrie places, did in fiftie daies take it by force. Some say that eight and fortie of those that were within it were slaine by the enemies arrowes and engins. But the Castle Walls and the tops of houses being much shroken by the engins of warre: and besides vterly despairing of succour, the Inhabitants who with the Governour were retired thither, vrged him to parley. Delfino being thereunto enforced, capitulated in this manner, That it should be lawfull for himselfe and as many as should follow him, safely to depart thence with fise and twentie waggons which the enimie should furnish them for the carriage of their stufte and furniture. The Castle being in this sort yielded, Delfino going towards Venice, neere to Crespiniano met with Leopolds troups, who came to free them from the siege. Some Authors affirme, that at the same time Lofinasiro Calderio Generall of those troups, was corrupted by Carrario: and thereupon he slackt his journey, till such time as hee imagined the Castle was yielded. The Garrison of Noualla likewise hauing expelled their Governour for want of pay, did yeeld vp the place to Carrario.

The Tower of Corania being assailed at the same time by the enimie in the marshes, was not onely brauely defended, but diuers Ganzariones were taken from them and brought to Venice. Artuano Buccacharino came at last from Prince Carrario with great forces and besieged Treuiso, lying incamped neere to the Church of the fortie Saints: Diuers and sundrie exploits were made on both sides, and at times more than fortie Horse were taken from the enimie; which was the best atchieuement that was there performed.

The Citie of Serrauall following the example of the Garrison of Treuiso incurred the like danger. The Soldiers began to mutinie for certain moneths pay which was behind, and and on a sodaine fell vpon Nicholas Velleresso the Governour, and seized on the Castle. Afterwards they dispatched messengers to the Senate at Venice, to excuse themselves for what was done, laying all the fault on their want of victualles and paiement, both of them hauing bene badly supplied to them, whereupon they had bene enforced whether they would or no, to enterprife nouelties; and withall demanded their pay: which if within eight daies they might receive, the Garrison and the Castle should continue obedient to the Venetians: or else, otherwise providing for themselves they would let all men know, that there is nothing more dangerous for such a make warre, than to detain the Souldiours pay.

The Senate was not greatly moued at these newes, being certaine that Pantaleon had already made the offer: Yet neuertheless fearing least the inhabitants who had euer loued the Venetians, might thereby fall into some mischief, they sent them word, to vse means in some sort to content the Souldiours, to free them themselves from the danger which threatned them. Heereupon those of Serrauall (for they were resolu'd to endure all extremitie rather than to beare Carrario's tyrannous yoke whom they extremely hated) sent Francisco Lardemo to the Governour of Belluna, to request him, That seeing by the Venetians offer made to Leopold, they were his vassalls, that he would defend them from the danger wherein they were: telling him that the Souldiours possessed the Castle, who demanded their paie, which vlesse they might speedily receiue, it was certaine that they would soone deliuer it to Carrario; whereunto as the Tyrant had a long time aspired, so hee would now doe anything to obtaine his desire: And that therefore it behooued him to make hast, least (as it often happeneth) some small delay might bring some great daunger to the wretched inhabitants.

The Governour who would not seeme to abandon their new subiects, forthwith caused money to be deliuered to the messenger; which was paid by Giacomo Spiritello of Belluna a man of exceeding great wealth, who did it for the Governours sake. Chinatus faith, That three thousand fise hundred Crownes were sent to Serrauall, which being giuen to the Souldiours, they did forthwith quit the Castle. This is that which was done on the Treuisan: whilest the Venetians (vpon report that the Genoueses had newly taken Armes; and were already departed from Genoa) fearing least the Gallies which Simonetto had at the spring time carried into Candie should be met with by the enimie, caused eight Gallies to be made readie, and to begueto Zeno, who was made Admirall for a yeare, who with them put out to Sea.

He first directed his course, as he was commanded, towards Candie to the succour of his Countreimen. But going along the Coast of Dalmatia, he met with twelue Genoa ships, which he tooke and spoiled, and then burnt them: Soone after, neere to Morea, he espied a great ship of Genoa, loden with rich marchandize, which he tooke and sent into Candie. From thence he sailed towards the Promontorie of Malles, where he resolu'd to tarrie for the Gallies which returned from Candie: Within few daies after Simonetto came thither with twentie Gallies: which were forthwith followed by the residue of his fleet, so as in few daies, he had thirtie Gallies. And because the enemies Fleete which was not farre off, was reported to be but one and twentie Gallies: Zeno resolu'd to leaue fise Gallies at Modon with the marchandize, and with the residue to make towards the enimie.

Two daies after he descried the Genoueses Fleete neere to Ionia, the which (avoiding the fight) he pursued in vaine all that day till night, when by reason of the darkness he lost sight of it. The Venetian being come to Ancona, sent ten Gallies for the guard of the Citie, and with the residue he determined to rauage the Riuer of Genoa, where hauing with good successe crossed the Adriatick, Ionian, and Tuscan Seas, being entered on the enemies confines he descried six Genoa Gallies; to whom he gaue chase for a time. But hauing giuen over his pursute, he was likeli soone after to haue bene intrapped before Porto-uenieri by foure and twenty Genoa Gallies, who hauing intelligence of the Venetians comming into the lower Sea, were speedily come from Dalmatia to resist their attempts. Two Venetian Gallies which Zeno sent forth to discover, hardly escaped from the mouth of the Hauen: but making way by the strength of their oares they soone came to their Fleete, which from thence went to Liorna; then on a sodaine they returned to Morea, where receiving a new supplie of fise Gallies from Lodouico Lorezano, they sailed againe towards the lower Sea, intending (as I thinke) to fight with the enimie if he could meete with him; if not, to spoile all the Coast Townes on the Riuer of Genoa.

Whilest the Venetian ranne thus vp and downe, the enimie was not idle. For, so soone as Carolo departing from Ancona, sailed towards the Riuer of Genoa: hauing made readie fise and twentie Gallies, he came and besieged Cap-Histria, which in a moment he tooke, spoiling and burning it for the most part. The Castle was defended tended by meanes of the Garrison within it. But hauing intelligence that Zeno was gone to rauge the Riuer of Genoa, fearing that the Frontiers being without Garrison, the Venetian might wholly spoile them, hauing left six Gallies in Dalmatia to molest the Venetians, he came speedily with one and twentie to the reliefe of his Countie. They were those with whom the Venetians met (as hath bene said) at Porto-uenieri, and which had like to haue surprized two of his Gallies.

Whilest these things were done at Sea, on the Treuisan Conigliana had like to haue bene taken by treacherie. Two Captaines of the Garrison had intelligence with the enemy who had the guard of the Hill, aduertizing him to come in the night with ladders, which they should without any resistance reare against the wals, and so enter into the Towne. The enemies vnwilling to loose so faire an occasion, did not faile to come at the time appointed; and diuers of them were already come ouer the wall vnder the Tower, when those about hauing descied the enemy, began on a sodain to giue the alarme. At this noife all the Townefmen ran speedily to the Castle, by whose assistance those about who defended the place did beate the enemies from the walls with great slaughter. Twentie men at Armes were taken, and eight and twentie of the Traitors were apprehended: who beeing conuicted of the fact were hanged, to serue for an example to others.

About the same time the Bishop of Verceil, sent by Amadeo Duke of Sauoy, arriued at Venice, and in his Masters name requested the Senate to send Ambassadors to his Highnesse, who greatly desired to heare the deputies, as well of the Venetians, as the enemies, and maturely to vnderstand the cause of their strife, and that he would doe his best to atone them, and to procure a peace, saying that hee had already for that purpose sent to Genoa, and would likewise send to King Lewis and their associates, whom he did not doubt but that they would accept of peace.

Vpon this offer, Michaels Morosino, Giovanni Gradonico, and Zacharia Contareni were sent Ambassadors to the Saouyan, who accompanied the Bishop: The Ambassadors being gone, the Senate were aduertized by letters from Pantaleon that Leopold had accepted the offer of the Citie of Treuifo, whereupon the Duke sent two Alman Gentlemen to receiue it of the Venetian officers: These according to their Commission did muster the Souldiours of the Garrison, and gaue them pay onely for one moneth, till Leopold with his forces were arriued.

Newes was brought at the same time that the Venetian prisoners at Genoa were so hardly delt with by the enemy, as more than three hundred and fiftie of them were in few daies dead with hunger, whose bodies they had inhumanly flung into the Sea: Some thought that they had bene poisoned in regard so many of them died at one time. Vpon this report all men were so enflamed with choller, as they presently ranne to Terra-noua to the publike prison, where breaking open the prison dores they had like to haue slaine all the Genoueses. But thinking it to be a diuelfish deede, they would be reuenged in an other kinde, by depriving them of all their commodities, as of kniues, beds, couerlets, and their kitchen: forbidding women who for charitie did minister vnto them, not to come any more there. Their ordinarie pittance was but bread and water and that verie sparingly: But the Citie did soone after remember their accustomed clemencie, and all that had bene taken from those poore creatures, was by a publike decree restored vnto them.

Whilest these things were done at Venice, and on the confines of the firme Land, three Genoa Gallies did in the Hauen of Pisauro take foureteene Venetian vessells so laden with wine, which they burnt, and taking away the Marchants whom they found in the houses neere to the Hauen, they speedily departed thence, and rauaging from Pisauro euen to Chioggia, they did infinite harmes to the Venetians, in the Hauens, and at the mouthes of Riuers.

Hauing

Hauing afterwards taken fiftie vessells laden with Marchandize, they sailed towards Ancona, and from thence, fearing least the Venetians would come to their reliefe, they sent them speedily to Zara.

Vpon report that the Genoueses Armie was greatly encreased, Zeno in the meane time beeing with the Gallies farre from home, the Senate fearing least the enemy would on a sodaine come and assaile the Citie, did speedily fortifie the Hauen, and the forces being called from Mestra, which since the yeelding vp of Treuifo were there to no purpose, they appointed a Campe at S. Nicholas on the Ihoare. They had besides eight Gallies in a readinesse to saile whither neede should be vnder the conduct of Nicholas Micheli.

In the meane time, the siege of Treuifo was not discontinued but daily augmented by new supplies which the enemy sent thither. Armano Buccacario the Princes brother in Law commanded there: whereof Leopold being aduertized, came within few daies after his people had taken the possession thereof with tenne thousand horse, and encamped on a sodaine before Conigliana. He was reported to haue in his Armie besides that great number, more than foure Hundred Knights and great Lords. Armano hauing intelligence of the Almans comming, sent speedily to his Campe to treat with him about some matters. But he was so far off from hearing the messenger, as he would not vouchsafe to see him, but commanded him speedily to returne and tell the Paduan, that he attended him: and that the next day they might conferre together about their affaires. Armano did soone perceiue whereunto those words tended: whereupon fearing to be ouerthrowne by his sodaine arrival, the morrow after by brake of day he raised his Campe, & fled thence. Which Leopold hauing notice of, was highly displeased that he had lost so faire an occasion of a battaile, who soone after departing thence, caused his troupes to passe ouer the Riuer of Piaua, and came and encamped neere Treuifo, in the same place where the enemies had bene. And he with the chiefe of his Armie entering into the Citie, brought thither such abundance of corne and wine and all other necessaries, as the Citie was in an instant deliuered from the siege and famine.

In this maner did the Venetians loose Treuifo, fortie yeares after they had taken it from the familie of Escalla: But the Senates constancie in dissembling such a losse, was so great, as they sent Ambassadors to Leopold, to congratulate his welcome and entrie into Treuifo. Giasomo Delfino, Pietro Hemo, Bernardo Bragadino, Marini Memo, and Alberto Contareni were sent thither.

Prince Carrario albeit that at Leopold's comming, hee had raised his Campe from before Treuifo, did not cease for all that to molest and make incursions on the Treuisan, where he tooke certaine Townes since the Almains arriuall, saying openly that he did it by the King of Hungaries commandement, albeit Leopold was newly allied with the same King, and at his entrance into the Citie, had caused his roiall Armes to be set about his owne. It was thought that King Lewis had speciall regard to Leopold's profit, but because he would not seeme to abandon his associates, he entreated them to take Carrario's wilfulnesse in good part: whereupon he did often intreat them by Ambassadors (the which hee might haue done by force) and chiefly the Paduan, to desist from his enterprize. But neither entreaties nor threats could make him to abstaine.

Zeno who (as hath bene said) was of late come from Morea to the lower Sea, arriuing at the mouth of the Riuer Arno, was aduertized by the Senates Letters that peace was concluded with the Genoueses: wherupon being sad and displeased to see himselfe snatched forth of the enemies throat, he went back again towards Morca, & from thence by the Senates commandement, he returned with his Armie to Venice. And by this meanes this sommer which was the last of the fourth Liguticke warre was spent without any memorable action.

By the mediation then of the Duke of Sauoy, peace was concluded with the Genoueses, King Lewis, and their allies: six yeares and foure moneths after that this last warre beganne. The conditions of the peace were: That the prisonners of warre on both sides should be set at libertie: That the Paduan Prince should deliuer Capdarger and Morensana to the Venetians: That he should raze all the Fortes which he possessed in the Lakes, and neere to the Riuer: that the Venetians should giue him the Tower of Corania: that Alberto D'Este should be iudge of the controuersie betwixt the Venetians and Paduans concerning their limits: that the Venetian should withdraw the Garrison that he kept in Tenedos, and that the Duke of Sauoy should haue the keeping of the Island for two yeares, and that it should be kept at the Venetians and the Genoueses charges: that at the two yeares end the Fort should be razed, if the Genoueses thought it fit to be done, and that the Venetians should then giue ouer the entire possession of the Island: that the Florentines should be caution in the summe of two hundred thousand crownes, that neither the Venetians nor the Genoueses should euer after possesse the Island: that both the Genoueses and Venetians should not trafficke neere to the Riuer Tanais, for feare least by ancient ielouzie, (as it had oft hapned) they should beginne the warre anewe: That euerie ten yeare the Venetians should paie seuen thousand Dukats to King Lewis, who in regard of the said summe should be bound to free the Sea-coast of Dalmatia of all Pirats; and that no Sclauonian nor Dalmatian should make any salt. Some say that on the same day that the peace was published, a childe was borne in Venice which had foure Armes and foure Leggs, and did liue till it was baptized. The Venetian Dames made a collection of money to relieue the Genoueses that came forth of prison halfe naked, with cloakes, shirtes, hofe and shoes, and other cloathing according to euerie mans need, and did besides furnish them with money to beare their charges home, to the end they should not be enforced to begge by the way. Those that went thence were aboute fiftene hundred persons, the residue dyed with the stentch of the prison, and others with too much filling their bellies. Besides it was found that aboute eight thousand naturall Genoueses, did dye in this warre, and of the Venetians halfe as many. The Senate being freed from this warre, because they would performe the promise made by the Common-wealth, called thirthe of those into the number of the Senate, who in the heate of the warre had at their owne costs relieued the Common-wealth: and for others, the summe of siue thousand crownes euerie yeare was appointed to bee distributed among them. Those who were made Senators before they came into the Senate went all together to heare diuine seruice, then being brought before the Prince and

Senators, they tooke their oathes, to continue loyall and not to reueale the secrets of the Common-wealth. Chinatus saith that Caballa of Verona for his great and notable seruice done to the Venetians in this warre, was hono-

The Senate had giuen commission to Panaleon Barba who was sent thither for that purpose, to deliuer the Fort of the Island according to the agreement into the hands of Bonifacio, Deputie to Amadeo Duke of Sauoy. The Genoueses Agent was come thither to see it done, and to pay the Souldiers that were there.

Mutatio

Mutatio his answer to the Venetians and Genoueses.

Mutatio hauing receiued the money which the Venetians and Genoueses had brought, declared to Bonsface and the Commissioners his owne determination with that of the Islanders, saying; That they had heard how in the Articles of peace it was expressly mentioned that the Fort of the Island, their only refuge, should be razed, wherein both the Genoueses who had requested it, and the Venetians who consented thereunto, had carried themselves basely: But he told them that the Islanders would looke to their owne affaires, and that therein they should doe wisely: That they had neuer yielded to the Venetians on that condition, that their Fort being razed, their Island in time should become desolate. And therefore calling now to minde that which concerned them, they were resolu'd to hazard all, rather than to see their Island in such sort to be wholly ruined: And to that end, they had instantly entreated him to take their Citie, Castle, and meanes, into his protection. The which he finding to bee great both in shew and effect, he was determined to keepe and defend the Island as his owne, seeing it belonged neither to the Venetian, nor to any else: He willed them then to depart, and not any longer to expect the deliuerie thereof vnto them, saying, That they were well dealt with in being suffered to goe freely thence: Then was there a great noise made by the Souldiers, and the Inhabitants of the Island, calling Mutatio their Lord and Captain: who commanded the Venetians and Genoueses speedily to depart thence.

Some say that Mutatio made a shew that this came wholly from himselfe, to the end that the Greeks should not afterward reedifie the Fort which the Venetians should demolish. But on what pretence soeuer he did it, the Commissioners being enforced to depart thence, came to Venice. The Senate tooke this refusal in bad part, knowing that vnlesse Tenedos were deliuered, the Common-wealths credit through one mans follie, would be crackt among the Italians and forraigne Princes, and that all men would impute the blame to the Senate and not to one man alone. And that besides their breach of faith, it was to be feared, that so soone as the Genoueses, King Lewis, and the other associates should heare that the Island was not deliuered to the Sauoyan, they holding the couenants of peace to be broken, would forthwith take Armes: They therefore decreed to send to Mutatio and the Islanders:

Carolo Zeno was sent thither, who neither by entreaties nor threats could alter his determination. At Zeno his entrance, because by one mans rashnesse the Common-wealths promise should not be infringed, they decreed to proceed by Armes; whereupon a speedie leuie of Souldiers was made, vnto such a number as was thought sufficient to subdue the Island. Fantino Georgio was made Generall of these forces. He departing from Venice with sixe Gallies well Armed, and arriuing at Tenedos, landed his men, and in an instant gaue a furious assault to the Towne and Castle.

There were great numbers of Archers in the Camp, so was there in the Castle, by meanes whereof at euery assault and sallie, diuers died on either part: Some say, that they fought more eagerly than against ordinarie enemies; For if any one were taken he was forth with hanged, or else being put into one of the engines of Warre, was in sted of a stone throwne into the Camp, and so from the Camp into the Citie: whereby it plainly appeared that it was neither the Prince nor Senates fault, that the Island was not deliuered according to the treatie of peace; but only through the wilfulnesse of Mutatio.

The siege lasted aboue seuen Moneths: but victuals failing, they yielded on these conditions; That neither Mutatio, nor those who were with him should be called in question for detaining Tenedos, to the hindrance of the Common-wealth: That the Inhabitants should depart forth of the Island, with their gold, siluer, and other moueables: That as many of them as would go dwell in Candie, should haue as much Land there as they had in Tenedos, and as many as would goe to Constantinople or else where, should receiue money for the iust value of their Lands: And in this sort, those within gaue place to the Garrison.

The

The Castle being recouered, Fantino entred it with two hundred Archers, dismissing the residue of the Armie. Giouanni Memo by the Senates decree did afterwards succede him. The residue of the Articles being performed, and the Inhabitants being gone, the Fort was at the last razed.

The Thryetines who in the hottest of the warre were revolted from the Venetians, fearing that so soone as they should be at quiet both by Sea and Land, they would on a sodaine come and inuade them, did yeeld to Leopold. Soone after King Lewis died. At the first it was thought that his death would in some sort abate the pride of Prince Carrario, who till then had neuer ceased to molest the Treuissans: but on the contrarie in sted of desisting, he assailed them more furiously than before, and gaue them so many assaults and ouerthrowes, as Leopold despairing of being able to defend the Citie, did on certaine conditions giue it ouer with her confines to the Paduan, who in a manner was Conquerour.

All this hapned almost three yeares after that peace had bene established by Sea and Land. But in the meane time Prince Contarini died, after he had gouerned foureteen yeares, and was honourably buried in St. Stephens Church.

Michaeli Morosino succeeded him. At his entrie into the Gouvernement, a Law was made against Murderers, that whosoever should kill a man, should loose his head, whereas in time before they who were convicted of such crimes, were hanged according to the custome of the Countrey. It was thought of a certaine that if his Principallitie had lasted any long time, he would haue beautified the Common-wealth with sundrie holy Lawes and Statutes: But by how much the hope thereof was greater, by so much was his Regiment shorter. For about foure Moneths after his Creation hee deceased, and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes.

arrival.

Sovereign justice of a Father on his owne Sonne.

Antonio of Es-calla is defeated by Giouanni Ga-
lesca Visconte.

Galesca Visconte
slew Padua.

Antonio Venieri being absent was subrogated in his sted, a man who besides his ancient Nobilitie, was of a meeke and gentle disposition, and beloued of all men. Being called home from Candie where he remained, he arriued the thirteenth of Ianuarie at Venice, on S. Nicholas shore, where the whole Senate, and a great part of the people receiued him; and from thence after diuers reciprocall embracements, going into the Buccentauro he was with great ioy brought to the Ducall Palace: His presence was the more welcome to all men because by reason of his long absence it had been so much desired: He had bene seuen years absent with his familie, and had well gouerned the Common-wealth in diuers places, and chiefly at Tenedos. His gouernment was very meeke and gentle, without any tumult or strife in the Citie, with plenty of all things which was greatly desired of all men: But his owne domestick losse did in some sort trouble the fortunate successe of his affaires. Albeit I do not well know whether his seueriustice did purchase the old man more honour and reputation, than his sonnes death did afflict him with griefe and sorrow.

He had a Sonne named Lodouico, who was enamoured on a Senators wife. But as it often happeneth, some jealousy arose betwixt the two louers, whereupon this yong Lord by chance, in disgrace of his Mistis, whom he then hated, caused homes to be hung up at her husbands gate. Inquire thereof being made, the Prince being moved at the iniurie done to a Senator, commanded his Sonne forthwith to be imprisoned, where he remained till he died, to the great griefe of all the people.

The same yeare at sundrie times the Marquesse of Este, and Mantua, came to Venice, with diuers other Princes, and Princes Ambassadors to treat with the Senate concerning great affaires of State, albeit some of them came but to see the Citie. A while after, peace still continuing abroad and at home, great warre and contention arising betwene Antonio Escalla of Verona, and Francisco Carrario the elder, Giouanni Galesca Visconte (whose power was at the same time very great) at Carrario his entreatie did make warre vpon Escalla, and hauing vanquished him, he tooke from him Verona and Vincenza. Then, (as the desire of getting doth encrease when prosperitie doth follow vs) he did as furiously assaile Padua, as he had not long before done those of Escalla. Some say that Carrario attempted to set Bernabo his Allie at libertie, whom Galesca, his Sonne in Law and Nephew, Sonne to his Brother, kept prisoner in the Castle of Trece, because he had bene aduertized by Katherine his wife, wife, that Bernabo had laid wait to kill him, whereat Visconte, being moued, made warre vpon him.

The Venetians in this warre bynded their forces with Galesca who assailed the Paduan, and hauing armed foure hundred boates vnder the conduct of Giacomo Del-fuso, did in a manner seize vpon all the Cities, Ports and townes which Carrario possessed on the lakes, and at the mouthes of rivers. Galesca likewise on the firme land, did not alone besiege the Citie of the Paduan territory, but likewise in few moneths did hee besiege also the Citie of Padua. Where after he had taken the elder Carrario, he imprisoned him in the Medozian prison. His sonne, furnished with all things, escaped into Germanie. Galesca would not stand still in so faire a way, but pursuing the course of his victorie, came and tooke Treviso by force. This warre was very painful and bloody.

At the last, Carrario forces being broken, and wholly ouerthrowne, Galesca by agreement had Padua, Trece, and Belinzone; the Venetians, Treviso, and the Marquesse of Este, who was one of the associates against Carrario, recovered all the townes which did belong to his ancesstors. Then not long after, Galesca hauing proclaimed warre on the Bolognese and Florentines, and his forces being already suspected of all the people and potentates of Italie: The Venetians, Florentines, Bologneses, Francisco Gonzaga, the Marquesse of Este, and Carolo Malatesta, entered into league against him. Robert Duke of Bavaria was entreated to bee of the number (with whom Escalla remained) and to march with his forces into Italie against the troups of Visconte.

Galesca leauing the Bolognese, came and furiously besieged the Citie of Mantua, and pressing on the great number of his souldiers (for his Armie was reported to be fortie thousand) he enuironed the Citie by land and water. The Venetians armed a great number of boates against him, to deliuer a friend and confederate Citie from the siege: and because Escalla was more molested by water than by land, the Venetians hauing added certaine gallees to their fleet, this audacious enemy was repulsed with great losse from the Citie by the Venetians aide, on the same side of the Citie, by which the enemy had thought to haue taken it. And soone after being inuaded by Malatesta Generall of the land Armie nere to the village of Gouernara, and being broken and defeated by him in a set battaile, he was with great disgrace chased farre from thence.

Visconte remained not idle in so faire an occasion. For Robert vsing delaies, he returned into Italie in disguised habite, unknowne to the Venetians and their associates. And by that meanes he entered Padua and enioyed it. The Almane, following him afterwards with a great Armie, came and besieged the Castle of Padua, which held out for Galesca. Those of Verona being amazed by their neighbours example, tooke Arme, and hauing expelled Galesca his Garrison, they sent for Antonio of Escalla from Tuscan, but they understood that he was dead a while before: whereupon repeating of what they had done, they sent to Federico Blanchardo, who commanded Visconte his Armie in the countrey of Cremona, and hauing obtained pardon of him for their reuolt, and for the obtaining of it paid a great summe of money vnder the name of lendings for the souldiers, they receiued him into their Citie: in the which entering tumultuously, the souldiers desirous of bogrie could not be kept from spoiling. The wife of Galesca being sorie for the mishap of so excellent a Citie, commanded three daies after they began to pillage, to spoyle no more. Robert in the meane time being discontented for that he was deceived by his associates of his promised reward, raised his campe from before the Castle of Padua, and went backe with his forces into Germanie. The Florentines did at the same time send Iohn Haraut, one of the famous Captains of his time, with forces to aid Escalla by whose valour the Castle was in few daies recovered: diuers and sundrie attempts were made on either side, but because they do no whit concerne the Venetians (for they were done on the firme land, & farre from the Sea) we do of purpose omit them.

Peace for ten
The Duke of Austria and the French kings Nephew came to Venice to be transported to the holy Sepulchre.

The market place of Saint Marke paved with bricke.

At the last, peace being concluded for ten yeares was as acceptable to afflicted Lombardie, as pleasing to all men else. At the same time the Duke of Austria arrived at Venice, where being bountifully entertained, he remained till such time as two gallies were made ready to carrie him to the Sepulchre of our Lord. The same yeare the French kings Nephew arrived there, who had the like entertainment as had the Almanie: he made ready a Galley there at his owne charges to transport him into Syria for the same purpose, as the Austrian was gone to the holy Sepulchre.

In process of time, all things being quiet by sea and land, newes was brought that an Argosie of Genoa of meruailous bignesse was gone forth to robbe at Sea. The Venetians vpon this report rigged forth three great ships of warre, which were manned with five hundred armed men, which went to Sea. But that great Genoues Argosie being cast away by a great tempest, the Venetians returned home and found home to their houses.

The Citie during this long peace, was beautified with diuers publike works. The market-place of Rialto, with that great and spacious place before Saint Markes Church, were paved with bricke, and with square stone. At the same time Prince Venetie died, the eighteenth yeare of his principalltie. His funeral was accompanied by great multitudes of people to the Church of the Tondinet.

Michaeli Steno Procurator of Saint Marke succeeded him, who being chosen in the beginning of December, came not (by reason of a disease whereof he lay sicke) to the Pallace till the tenth of Ianuarie.

Diuers publike shewes made in the Citie for loue to the Duke.

The people did neuer doe the like honour to any of his predecessors as to him. All the Trades of the Citie euerie one a-part, did prepare costly shewes for his sake, each of them inuenting new, so as no holy day passed in the whole yeare, but someshew or other was presented: And that whole yeare would haue beene spent in mirth and pastime, if the vnexpected losse of certaine Citizens had not marred the sport. Sixe gallies laden with forraine marchandize vnder the conduct of Leonardo Transano returned to Venice about the end of Autumne, but it fell out, that neere to the Islands of the Egean sea, at Irene (called by corruption of language Turin) foure of them (which had seldome happened) being beaten with a tempest suffered shipwracke. Yet neuerthelesse few of the men perished: the marchandize chandize being scattered heere & there was with great labour recouered. The Viari, Delfino, Sourance, and Sagrada, were lost. Cornari and Gradonico refitting the seas furie came safe to Venice.

Four Venetian Gallies lost by tempest.

The yeare following three Gallies departed from Venice: the Duke of Austria had prepared two of them, and Prince Carrario the third, to fetch and conuoe from Apulia the sister of King Ladislaus, who being newly reitorred to his kingdom, was Crowned King by Barthimeo Iuliani, Cardinall of the Sea Apostolike, sent from Pope Boniface. His sister was promised to one of the Dukes of Austria. But these Gallies came back to Venice, by reason that Ladislaus refused to send his sister.

ed king of Hung-gary.

Some Annales make mention how that the Emperour Robert with his wife came the same yeare to Venice, where he was magnificently entertained, and honoured with diuers rich presents. But those Authors whom we follow conceale the cause of his coming. I finde in some, that Robert being vanquished by Galeas in the Territorie of Cremona, hauing in a manner lost all his Armie, retired to Trento, where hauing leuied new forces, he came to Padua, and from the firme Land to Venice, where being curteously entertained, after he had familiarly discoursed with the Prince and Senate of the wrong which Galeas had done him, he returned into Germanie: But because mention is made of his wiues being there with him: we must think that he left her at Venice, because himselfe went on pilgrimage to Rome. For it was the yeare of our Salvation one thousand foure hundred, at such time as Pope Boniface the ninth celebrated the great yeare of Iubilie.

The same yeare the bridge of Rialto was redified. In this manner did the Commonwealth peaceably flourish, and the greatest care of the inhabitants was set on trade of Marchandize. But this quiet was interrupted by the Genoueses new stirrs. They had about the same time armed one and twentie Gallies, and sixteen great Argosies: Some Authours make no mention of Argosies. The report was, That this preparation was made against the King of Cyprus. Bonicaule a Frenchman, was General of the Armie. The Genoueses had bene for a time, as they were then, vnder the French Kings protection, and the most part of their Gallies were manned with French-men. The Fleet departing from Genoa, arrived after a tedious course, at Scandelora a Sea-Towne of Cilicia. (those who are most expert in Navigation, affirme this place from the firme Land to be opposite to Cyprus) The Genoueses received there so great a losse, as of all the Gallie-slaues in one and twentie Gallies, there were not so manie left as would furnish eleuen. Departing thence, they failed into Syria, where surprizing Barut, they ranfact & spoiled as enemies all the Venetian ships, and others, who by chance were then in the Haucn. From Syria they failed into Morca.

The Genouesie

Carolo Zeni whom the Senate, at the first report of the Genoueses preparations, had sent with eleuen Gallies into the Adriatic Gulph, hauing at Sea narrowly pursued the Genoueses Fleete, had speciall care that they should not attempt on any place belonging to the Venetians: (for their Armie spoiled all places where they came) and yet he would not fight with them because they were not proclaimed enemies. In this fort both of them dissembling, the Venetians kept the Genoueses in aw, and the Genoueses the Venetians. But both of them staying neere to Modon, they made shew of other matters than they had done at the beginning. Zeni fearing least by his patience the Venetians affaires might incurre some great danger, did on a sodaine set forward towards the Genoueses Fleete, who vnder colour of taking in fresh water, lay betwixt Modon and Ijonches. At Carolo his vnlookt-for arrival, there was a sharp-fight, and the Venetians fortune was so much the worse, because the Genoa Gallies were better manned than theirs.

The two Armies
fight.

It is reported that euerie Gallie had besides the ordinarie banke of Rowers, fortie men at Armes, and all French-men, who fought furiously with the Lance & sword, after the manner of their Countrie. And the Venetians did but in a manner beare off the blowes, at such time as Hermolao the Lombard returning from a long voyage, came thither opportunely with two Gallies. He perceiving the danger wherein the Venetians were, did with great furie turne the prowes of his Gallies vpon the enemy who was builed in fight, and strooke one of their Gallies with such force, as he ouerturnd it into the Sea with the Souldiers and Marriners. At Hermolao's artiuall fortune sodainly changed.

The Genoues
Fleete defeated.

For the enemy who had already in a manner wonne the victorie, for the losse of one Gallie began to faint: The Venetian on the contrarie being strengthened by these two Gallies, did valiantly renew the fight. Their fortune hung for four hours space in equall ballance: at the last three of the enemies Gallies being sunke, and as manie taken, the residue which were fiue, betooke themselves to flight. More than fiue hundred of the enemies were slain and drowned, and more than eight hundred were taken prisoners. The Venetians for their part, obtained not this victorie without bloodshed, who found an hundred and three and fortie of their men to be wanting.

Gyles the Black greatly honoured

It is said, that, after the victorie, certaine Captaines of the Gallies were disgraced and noted of cowardize for comming too slowly on the enemy at the beginning of the fight, & because by their baseness they had endangered the state of the Common-wealth. Others, among whom was Gyles the Black, were honored with great rewards, because they had brauely borne themselves in that conflict. The fiue Genoues Gallies which fled from the fight, encountering with a Venetian Gallie laden with victuals they easilie tooke it: after that, they tooke an Argosie, wherein were diuers Venetian Gentlemen. Much more harme besides they did to the Venetians; but because after this defeat, they knew no safe place of retreat: they returned verie disconsolate to Genoa.

A French man punished for indiscreet speaking.

Within few daies after, a French-man, of the number of those who were taken prisoners in the fight, being wearied with imprisonment, said in choller, That he hoped one daie to wash his hands in the blood of the Venetians. This cruell preface being reported to the Senate, did so highly offend euery mans eares, as they all with one voice commanded that hee should bee hanged betwixt the two Columns.

The hatred which Nauello did beare to the Venetians.

In this mean space Nauello Carrario commanded in Padua, where he was some few yeares before replanted by the Venetians. This vnthankfull man did hate the Venetians more than euer his Father had done. He practized day & night against them & their state; he dreamed on nothing else, & all his attempts tended to that purpose. The Venetians, having knowledge of a long time how he stood affected to them, had I know not by what means, discovered all his practises, & vnderstood by the French prisoners, that he had bene the cause of the setting forth of the last Genoa Fleete that was defeated. They knew likewise by letters found in the coffers of Galeas Visconte lately deceased, the traps which those Tyrants had laied for them. And besides all this, after Galeas's decease, hee had earnestly solicited William of Escalla, who had bene created a Gentleman of Venice, and dwelt at the same time there, to recouer the Principalltie of Verona: whom after the recouerie thereof, he perfidiously poisoned: notwithstanding that before he had sworne and protested all loue and friendship to him, and receleued him with Armes and Councell. After which having surpris'd Antonio, and Brunora of Escalla his children, he caused them to be murdered. The race of Escalla being thus extinct: Francisco caused his son Giacomo, or according to some, his brother, to enter Verona, the Ensignes of the Empire and his owne being displaied before him, and created him Prince of the Citie: Yet not being satisfied with so great a Principalltie, he besieged Vincenza, having first spoiled the Vincenzans Territorie.

The Carrarians

on the Vincenzans.

The Vincenzans delecting the name of Carrario, resolved to endure all extremities, rather than to submit themselves to their Tyrannie. They speedily sent to Katherina, widow to deceased Galeas (for Carrario already made hauock of their countrie, to get that by force which he could not obtain by right) and intreated her to assist them against the violence of the Carrarians, giuing her to vnderstand their great danger, vnlesse they were speedily relieved: alleging for instance, That on the one side they had Padua for neighbour, where the Tyrants made their retreats; and Verona on the other which they had lately seized on, hauing vilely murdered their hoists; and that being enuironed and shut in euerie side, they were openly pursued as enemies, because they would not open their gates to the Tyrants: and that the Vincenzans knew not of whom or from whence to expect reliefe, but from thence where the power of Galeas had bene in force and Authoritie. Earnestly therefore they entreated her presently to send them aide, or if she had not the means so to do, yet to send them word in what manner shee would will or command the Vincenzans to provide for their safetie. This did the Commissioners deliuer vnto her. But she being a woman, and troubled with the death of her husband, and busied elsewhere in greater affaires: (For Carolo Sonne to Bernabo after Galeas's death began to stir, and diuers pettie Princes of Italie had seized on the Cities which belonged to her husbands Dukedome, so as she had busines enough to keepe Milan) for resolution in these difficultes assembled her Councell: by whom it was concluded, That, in regard they being so streightly pressed, could not continue in her obedience, it was much better for Verona, Vincenza, Feltre, Belluna, Collogna, and Bassan with their dependances to be giuen to the Venetians, than to leaue them for a prey to those wicked Tyrants.

The Venetians, albeit they had already refused the offer which the Vincenzans had made to them of their Citie, not that they did it to gratifie Carrario, or were vnwilling to helpe their poore afflicted friends, but only for that they were ashamed to possesse the goods of an other man without iust cause: so soon as they perceived the offer to be made, contrarie to their expectation, by the true Lord (albeit they knew that great warre would follow with Nauello) they would not loose so faire an occasion. Therefore they courteously entertained the Vincenzans Commissioners (the chief of whom was Giacomo Thyeni, sent with the Cities keyes) & willed them (after they had receiued their oathes of fidelitie) to be of good cheere, & not to doubt but that they would deale in such fort, as if this Paduan, who filled all places with tumult and menaces did not desist from molesting them, they would shortly set him such taskes, as he should no more trouble his neighbours, nor any else. Besides, seeing that the Vincenzans had esteemed from the beginning nothing to be more profitable for their Citie, than to be vnder the protection of the Venetians, they would take order that so loiall a Citie should neuer repent her loue and affection towards them. Heereupon they willed them then to depart, and to carrie home with them the ensignes of Saint Marke, (whom they besought to be fauourable to them both) and to erect them in the publicke places of their Citie, assuring them that the Prince and Senate would take order for the rest.

commissioners.

In this manner were the Commissioners sent home. Giacomo Suriano followed them soone after with a good troupe of Archers for the Cities guard. They sent likewise to Carrario to signifie vnto him in the name of the Common-wealth that he should abstaine from further molesting the Vincenzans, because they were become subiect to the Venetians. But all this aduertisement notwithstanding so farre off was he from giuing ouer his enterprise, as on the contrarie, in contempt of them, and against the law of Nations, he caused the Ambassadors Nose and Eares to be cut off, and willed him besides, to tell the Venetians, that it was too saucily done of them to prescribe lawes vnto those, who were commanders in possession: That they should doe well to containe themselves within their small inclosure of the Sea, and leaue Cities to those who from their Ancestours had receiued the power to gouern.

The Senate being moued by the Tyrants arrogant answer, would (before they proclaimed open warre) contract alliance with Francisco Gonzaga. great battaile. The Paduan curie where opposing himselfe against the Venetians attempts, did greatly molest them. The Senate on a fodaine caufed great forces to be leuied, and gaue the charge of them to Carolo Malateste of Arimini, who was sent from Flaminio for that purpose. The Armie was reported to be of thirtie thousand as well horse as foot.

Carolo Malateste of Arimini & one vall of the Venetians land Army.

Howbeit Carolo staied longer than was expected, yet being come to Venice he was entertained with great ioye, and receiued the publicke Ensignes in St. Markes Church. Then marching towards the enemie he came to Mefra, which was the Rendecuous of all the Venetian troupes, and diuers great personages were in that Armie who receiued good pay of the Venetians. The Generall at his arriual made certain attempts vpon the enemie, but of no great moment, and therefore not worthe of memorie. But in the hottest of the warre he gaue ouer his place. Those Authors whome we haue read giue no reason why he did so.

Malateste giues ouer the Generalls place.

Whilest these things were done on the firme Land, the nauall armie had no better successe at the Lakes. Marco Gryman Generall of the Fleet which the Senate had sent forth against the Tyrant; hauing remained for a time on the Lakes neere to the enemies, and caused a great number of light boates to come thither, did violently force certaine of the Garrisons: but being assailed on a fodaine by the Paduan, neere to the Church of Saint Hilarie, he was defeated, hauing lost the greatest part of his vessels, which the enemies drew on shoare with hookes of Iron; and himselfe being taken prisoner was committed to the keeping of the Saccians.

The Venetians nauall Armie defeated.

Malateste his dismissal being knowne at Venice, they beganne carefully to consider, whom they should appoint for their Generall. At the last among so many noble persons as were then in great number in the Armie, Paulo Sabello a Roman Gentleman for his valour and great experience was alone thought worthe of that place. By his conduct diuers places were in short space taken from the enemie, and the Venetians beganne to haue better successe vnder this new General. But the Tyrants arrogance did no whit diminish; whereby they knew of a certaine that he was to be dealt with in more places than one. And therefore they leuied new forces, and a new Campe as great as the former, which should spoile and ouer-runne the territorie of Verona. They made Francisco Gonzaga, their associate in this warre, Generall of that new Armie. He comming fodainely on the Veronois, did spoile all places, and brought away with him a great bootie, as well of prisoners, as of Cattle; he burnt the Farmes and Countrie houses; he tooke certaine strong places, and among the rest Hosilio; and in a word, he left the enemie in a manner nothing. Carrario being then assailed in two fereall places, that great vsual heat of his beganne by litle and litle to coole. For he could not intend both places together, nor were his forces sufficient being diuided into two, to resist the enemies attempts. His affaires therefore were of necessitie to goe backward in both places, or at the least in one of them.

Francisco Gonzaga Generall of another Armie of the Venetians.

Albert of Este makes warre on the Venetians in the behalfe of Carrario.

In the meane time Prince Albert of Este being moued with compassion of his friend and allie, proclaimed warre on the Venetians, who were readie enough to accept it. He first sent aid to the confederates, and after draue the Venetians forth of the Pollesin. Some Authors say that it was Nicholas Sonne to Albert, which made war on the Venetians, to whom Carrario had giuen his daughter Lilolato wife. But whether it were he, or the other (according to the Venetian Annals) who at the same time relieued the Carrarians; the Venetians being displeased thereat did repeale Accio D'Este from Candie, whither they had in time before confined him in fauour of Albert, and hauing giuen him forces, they caused him to warre on the territorie of Ferrara.

Accio D'Este is repelled from Candie to make warre on Albert.

This Accio was before that time a deadly enemie to Albert, and had without doubt driuen him from his estate, if the Venetians the Florentines, and those of Bologna, had not ouerthrowen him in the height of his good fortune, and confined him farre from Italie. There was then some likelihood that so soone as this man should assaile the Ferrarois in his Countrey, that he would either greatly molest him, or enforce him to laie aside his Armes against the Venetians: Therefore they armed certaine Gallies, and gaue them to Giovanni Barba, who at the mouth of Po failed vpon the Riuer, where he did greatly affright those of Ferrara. In the meane time diuers and sundrie skirmishes were made on the Riuer and else-where. And the Citie of Ferrara being thus hardly pressed by water and land, Albert, to quench this great domesticke flame, inclined to peace, the which he obtained of the Venetians on these conditions: That no more salt should be made at Comaccia; and that hee should sweare besides to continue euer a friend to the Venetians.

The conditions of peace made with Albert of Este.

These things were done neere to Ferrara, but on the Paduan territorie they fought fiercely. The Venetian had fortified his Campe at Nogara: Then the Generall being gone from thence with part of his troupes, came and encamped at Bassanelto. Those Authors whom we follow expresse not on what occasion he did so. The sonne of Francisco Carrario, surnamed Tertius, a valourous young man, being sent by his father with a choise troupe of horse, came and assailed the Campe. The Venetians at the first were so affrighted, as the enemie came euen to the Generalls Tent, and trode the Venetian Ensignes which where there erected vnder his feet, before any man made resistance. Sabello in this amazement with much adoe recalled his Souldiours; and by earnest intreating now one and then another he restrained their shamefull flight, sharply reprehending their feare. Then he commanded them to turne their faces towards the enemie; and as he exhorted them hee marched foremost. But so soone as the enemie perceiued the Venetians in armes, and furiously bent to begin the fight, & fearing if he should ioyne with them he should be enforced to bring all his forces to the battaile, turning his backe, he retired on a gallop towards his Ensignes, who alreadie by their Captaines command had begunne the retreat. The Venetians not being able to cause the enemie to stay suffered him to depart with certaine of their Ensignes which at his arriual hee had taken from them.

Sabello endeauoreth to stay his amazed Souldiours.

The enemies retreat.

Some say that they fought at Mansana, and that the Venetians lost six hundred horse; but they altogether conceale the losse of their Ensignes. This victorious young man returning to the Citie as it were triumphing, presented the people with a ioyfull shewe. It is reported that afterwards diuers and sundrie exploits were executed, and that diuers Townes were taken from the enemies, as well of the Paduan as the Verona territorie. Whilest these things were attempted, Paulo Sabello dyed. His bodie being brought to Venice, was in great solemnitie accompanied by the whole Clergie, the Prince, and Senate, to the Church of the Friars Minors. His Image is to be seene on horse-backe before the high Altar. Galeas Grumello of Mantua was by the Senates decree subrogated in his place. Others say that Gonzaga brother to Prince Francisco, succeeded him; and not Grumello.

The death of Paulo Sabello.

Galeas Grumello of Mantua subrogated in the place of Sabello.

This man beganne his charge with as great care and diligence as could be desired in a great Captaine. In the meane time Giacomo Suriano, who lay in Vincenza, because there was no doubt to be made of the Vincenzans loialtie & affection towards the Venetians, resolu'd by the permission of the Prince and Senate, to goe with a companie of men at armes to the Venetians Campe on the territorie of Verona. The enemie lying in ambush came forth and assailed this troupe of men at armes at Soana, and easily defeated them, and being thus broken, they tooke Suriano with diuers others, prisoners. The Veronois being wearied with so long and tedious a siege, were alreadie determined to yeeld. For they likewise did detest the Carrarians. Giacomo Carrario commanded in the Citie, who (as we said in the beginning) was giuen to the Veronois for their Lord and Prince. Hee of himselfe perceiving all things to be doubtfull, and imagining that he should bee safer abroad than in the Citie being out of hope to keepe it, attempted secretly to flee thence. He came first to Hosilio, and from thence crossing the Po, he was taken on the Riuers banks and brought to Venice. But I know not what should moue him to goe to Hosilio.

lio, seeing it was at the same time vnder the power of Francisco Gonzaga, whelke it were so that he came thither in disguise, thinking to deceiue the enemy in that habit, till such time as he had crossed the river. Some say that he was surprized at Asellario a village of the Veronois. But be it that he were taken there or elsewhere, it is certaine that he did not depart from the Citie before such time as he knew that the inhabitants intended to yeeld.

Those of Verona being reduced to the Venetians obedience, all the Castles neere to the Citie did the like. The yeelding of so mightie a Citie gaue the Venetians great hope of executing higher enterprizes. And this victorie was as much and more pleasing to the Senate, than any other which they had obtained for a long time before; and not without cause. For Verona (to speake somewhat thereof) is among all other Cities of Lombardie, the most famous, as well for the reputation, as the situation thereof. It is thought that the Gauls were the first founders of it, because the most famous Cities of Lombardie were built by them. And likewise Trojanus Pompeius referreth her original and foundation to those Gauls which came with Brennus into Italie. But whosoever the first founders were, I doe thinke them to haue bene famous men, because they undertooke so great & admirable a peece of work, and likewise that they were wise and discrete persons, and not blind like those founders of Calcedonia, whom in times past Apollon's Oracle thought to be so.

In what esteem the Citie of Verona is.

The goodly situation of Verona.

Bathes in time past at Verona.

Two forts at Verona.

An Amphitheater in Verona.

For besides that the terricorie neere to the Citie is most fruitfull in corne, oyle, wine, and cattails; and that it hath goodly stone-quarries, rivers, lakes, and ponds; among which is that of Benac, the pleasantest of those of all Italie, streames of water both wholesome and profitable; the which I dare asseure to haue in times past serued for bathes, by reason that they are hot, and because at this day the ruines of the walles are to be seene, which doe verifie the opinion which the common people hold thereof. VVhat shall we speake of her situation and structure? There is nothing to be seene more faire and pleasant. Neuer could any Painter how excellent soeuer he were, represent a place of more delectable recreation. For the whole Citie almost being seated in a plaine cuntry, looking towards the South, East, & VVest, it hath a little hill on the North side, the top whereof by a short and pleasant circuit doth in a manner represent the forme of a Theater. The bottome betwixt them both is filled with vine-yards and goodly gardens, so delightfull to those who behold them a farre off, as their spirits (as it hath happened to some) surprized with a sodaine and vnlooked-for ioy, are instantly (as it were) deprived of all sense. On the top of the hill two goodly Fortes are to be seene, the one of which doth in a manner hang ouer the river Ladissa, which with her pleasant streames watereth a great goodly bottome, the other seated in a higher place, and almost ouer the valley, looketh on the Citie walles which are below, and extendeth her view on euerie side, ouer all the plaines watered with the Po, and in a manner ouer all Lombardie. There are to be seene besides, diuers goodly bridges richly builded ouer the river; an Amphitheater in the midst of the City, with diuers old triumphal Arches, with a thousand other antiquities, which declare how notable the greatness of this Citie hath bene in former times. That which we haue hitherto said is verie great, but that which followeth is much more admirable.

This Citie hath had from the beginning a certaine Seminarie of excellent men, and as famous in all sciences, as any other Citie whatsoeuer. All these things being knowne, to the Venetians, did make their victorie more notable.

Gonzaga besieged Padua.

They forthwith manned it with a strong Garrison, and sent Pietro Arimondo thither for Gouvernour, and Rubro Marins for chiefe Iustice. VVhilst these things were done at Verona, Gonzaga hauing spoiled all the Paduan territorie, and taken diuers townes, came and besieged Padua. There is a place without Holy Crosse gate, called Terra Negra, or the blacke land, in which place the Venetian was in camp, and held the Citie steightly besieged, keeping the Paduans in continuall alarme. The Carrarians in the meane time (perceiuing their affaires to bee in great danger) did brauely defend the Citie walles, opposing themselves euerie where against the Venetians attempts; they ceased neither day nor night from labour, they fortified their Citie, placed the guardes, and encouraged the to wntmen, and did at times sallie forth vpon the enemy as occasion serued: Both sides had labour and care sufficient.

But whilst Padua was thus besieged and defended, Majolerio the Venetian was suspected secretly to haue shot arrowes into the Citie with letters tied to their heads, wherupon being imprisoned he was sent to Venice, where being conuicted of the crime he was hanged from the highest place of the Palace with a long rope. The same day his brother and two young Priests, were put alieue into the ground betwixt the two Colunnes their heads downwards: The which punishment being not as yet vnuall, did greatly terrifie all men. The common report was, That they had determined in the night to set the Citie on fire in diuers places, and that they had diuers complices, some of whom were found within a while after dead in sacks on the shore, not being knowne who they were, Gionanni of Padua likewise who had great pay in the Venetian Armie, being accused to haue had secret conference with the enemy, was sent to Venice, and there hanged betwixt the two Colunnes.

Majolerio the Venetian being accused and convicted of treason is punished.

Accruell and vnuall punishment.

Gionanni of Padua is punished for having secret conference with the enemy.

These executions did greatly trouble the tyrant, for besides that he perceiued all meanes to be cut off from him of discovering anything in the Armie, he was certaine that the shamefull death of a noble person did serue for an example to others how to cast themselves headlong into apparent dangers. Now therefore to discover his enemies designs, he tried another way. For pretending as if he ment to harken vnto peace, he craued a safe conduct saying that he would confer with Gonzaga, and treat with him of peace before all men. A passport being sent him, he came to the Campe, where these conditions (as it is reported) were propounded to him. That he should leaue Padua to the Venetians, and that he with his children should goe and dwell an hundred miles from thence: That the Venetians would deliuer vnto him Giacomo his sonne, and would permit him to carrie away all his creature, apparel, and other rich moueables that he had, and that they would ouer and aboue giue him for a present the summe of threecore thousand crownes. The enemy contemning these conditions, returned to the Citie without effecting any thing, resolving rather to hazard all than to accept of so base a peace.

Conditions of peace propounded to the Paduan.

The Venetians then perceiuing that the tyrant had lost that haughtie and proud spirit which he was wont to haue, did presse the Citie more furiously than before. And at the last, hauing about midnight reared ladders to the wall, diuers went vpon them: where those of the guard being heauie with sleepe all were murdered with out noife at the gate of holy Crosse, whither all the troups speedily ranne, & forthwith entred the Citie. Padua is circled with a triple wall, the vttermost wherof being lost by the enemy, he kept himself within the other two. But his forces being already broken, and being hopelesse of better fortune, hee sent to entreate Gonzaga to take him into his protection; that he would cast himselfe betwixt his armes, with his children and all his meanes; requesting that hee might come safely to him to parley and compound with him about his yeelding. But Gonzaga by the counsel of his friends sent him word that he should doe better to haue recourse to the Prince and Senate, and that with teares casting himselfe at their feete, he should perhaps obtaine of them more than he hoped for. Hethen craued assurance that he might safely goe to Venice, but he was answered that the Senate would send Commissioners to Mestra, who should heare him. Both sides being come neere to Mestra, the matter was a long time debated without any conclusion at all, wherupon they departed thence without doing any thing, and the tyrant returned being conducted by Gonzaga into the Citie: where being arriued without tidings of peace, he was so badly welcomed by the inhabitants, as diuers were so bold to tell him; That the Paduans were no more resolu'd to liue as they had done. They willed him then to depart thence, & (if he did mean to looke well to himselfe) to embrace such peace as the victorious Venetian would offer; and not such as he desired. That the wretched inhabitants had still then endured too much by their Princes arrogancie; that the enimie was already within their walls: and therefore nothing else to be expected, but that the Souldiers hauing forced the inner Rampire, would come & spoile the Citie, which God rather than any mans valour had till then safely preferred: And that it was madnesse, rather than wilfullnesse, not to yeeld, when men could not helpe it.

The Tyrant being daunted with these ignominious, speeches, sent again to Gonzaga, and with teares entreated him to take pittie on the affliction of his familie, and to procure so far as he might with honor, that his own and his childreus liues might be saued: Then at the Citizens request, they without any further fight entred the Citie on the 22. of Nouember. Padua being recovered, Novello with Francisco surnamed Tertius and William, his children (for Hubertino, and Mazilia, before the Citie was ycelled, were fled into Tufcan) were brought to Venice. The Senate caused them to be carried into the Island opposite to the Hall where they vled to meet, and placed diuers smal boats for the guard thereof for feare lest they should escape. Zacharia Trevisano was the first gouernour that was sent to Padua after it was taken, & Marini Caraualla was Iudge: who did forthwith fortifie the Citie with a strong rampire, and a good Garrison: Then they did put diuers forth of the towne whom they knew to affect the Carrarians, bannishing them into sundrie places, and by that meanes did carefully provide for what soeuer they knew necessarie to keep so excellent a Citie vnder their obedience.

The Tyrant and his children being by night transported into severall prisons (to the end that the people should not see them, who for the great hatred which they had a long time borne them would haue torne them in pieces) were by the Senates commandement strangled. The Father was buried in S. Stephens Church, and the children in S. Georges monasterie. Such an end had the Carrarians, who not long before did fill all places with feare and menaces: and who not being satisfied with commanding so excellent a Citie, did rashly prouoke those by whose meanes their predecesours had acquired the name of Princes. But diuers did iudge that the cruel tyrannie of Francisco deserued such an end.

The report was that he kept dogs of a meruailous bignesse, vnto whom he gaue the wretched inhabitants to be deuored. There is to be seene at this day in the great Hall where the councill of the Tennes do assemble, two Scorpions, with verie sharp stings, who did sting such strangers, as he called thither to talke with him. I conceale his impudent and vnnatural conditions, wherewith he was infected, as vnworthie to be mentioned.

By this so triumpharit a victorie the Venetians purchased Vincenza, Verona, Cologna, Feltra, Belluna, and the last of all, Padua with her confines. The expence of this warre which lasted two yeares, was so great, as two millions of gold of the publicke Treasure were spent in it: And yet neuerthelesse this excefliue cost was verie pleasing in regard of the profit and renowned victorie which ensued it.

At the same time as the warre was ended, whilst the whole Citie was busied euery night in making of bonfires, and other signes of ioy for the good newes which daily arriued from all parts, the top of the Tower, which is neere to S. Marks church was burned; but it was forthwith reedified, and guilded with fine gold. That side likewise of the Palace which looketh towards the South, and had been a long time before begonne, was then ended. All things being quiet, fortie Gentlemen of Verona, clothed in white, came well accompanied to Venice. And their comming being expected, because the people should receiue the greater content thereby, the Senate commanded a Theater to be set vp richly furnished neere to Saint Marks Church: whereupon the Priuce with his familie clothed in white, did stand, all his Ensignes being for that day white. He was attended on by all the Magistrates of the Citie

The Veronois being come to the Theater, went vp in order, where after they had saluted the Prince and Senate, they laied downe their publicke Ensignes, and the keys of their Citie-gates at their feete, entreating them to accept thereof, and beseeching God, that the offer might be both to the Venetians and themselves as fortunate and profitable, as that was an assured and perpetuall pledge of their fidelitie, as well publicke as particular, towards the Venetians; requesting them of their accustomed goodnesse to continue in the defence, preservation, and maintenance of them, their Citizens, their meanes, fortunes, with all other Diuine and humane matters: And as for their vnfeigned loue towards them, they durst freely say and affirme, that they would be extremely sorry, if among so manie people as did obey them, any should goe before them in loue, dutie, and affection.

The Ambassadors being curiously entertained, receiued great thanks: And they were assured, that so long as they did continue such as they had promised, the Senate would ere long let them know, that the greatest happinesse which can befall those which haue not meanes to maintaine and defend themselves, is to be shrowded vnder a lawfull gouernment; and that they would finde it to be as pleasing in that they had recourse to the only Fort of libertie, hauing cast off a Tyrants yoke, as doth that man which hath escaped out of a terrible tempest, when he entrencheth into a safe Harbor: They might then depart when they pleased, and take with them the Venetians Ensignes, (and in so saying, the Prince gaue them to the chiefe Ambassador) and erect them in the middelt of their Citie, which he wished might proue to the Venetians and them, alwaies profitable and honourable: and being so erected, to hold them in reuerence: Then he willed them to execute iustice and equitie, in regard they had in times past obaied the vnjust commandes of Tyrants. In this sort the Ambassadors of Verona were dismissed.

Those of Padua following their example, came soone after to Venice. They were entertained as the former, and the only difference was, that in sted of white, the Paduans were clothed in purple.

Each continued three, whole yeares, as well within the Citie as abroad; All which time, according to those whom we follow, we finde no memorable accident to haue hapned. In the end whereof, being the year of our Saluation one thousand foure hundred and nine, Ladislaus leauing Italie, departed towards Hungarie, to possesse his Fathers Kingdome. He made a stay in Dalmatia before Zara. This Prince was sonne to the same Charles, who in the time of the Genoueses warre, did for a while besiege Treuis; from whence being afterward called, hee went into

Apulia, to reuenge the death of King Andrew on Queene Ioane his wife, where he conquered the kingdom of Naples; but returning afterwards from Italie into Hungarie, he was murdered by his owne subiects. He left behind him his sonne Ladislaus, who in processe of time, being likewise called to recouer his Fathers Kingdome, came, into Dalmatia, and recouered Zara, after hee had for a while besieged it. In the meane time being aduertized by letters, that the Neapolitanes with diuers great Lords of the Kingdome were readie to rebell, fully resolving to returne into Italie, he sold that Citie with her Territorie, Hauen, and other appurtenances to the Venetians for the summe of one hundred thousand crownes. Whereupon Francisco Cornari, Leonardo Mocenigo, Antonio Contaveni, and Fantino Michaele, were sent thither with a strong Garrison to take possession thereof.

We finde in some others, that the Venetians received Zara before the Paduan warre was ended. This negotiation was very pleasing to the whole Citie, as well in regard of the hauen, which is one of the most commodious in all Dalmatia, as also, because it being reduced vnder their obedience did seeme to promise them the entire Dominion of Dalmatia, as it fell out soone afterward. Some say that the Venetians did together with Zara, buy of Ladislaus all his Title to Dalmatia. Whereupon they made generall Profections in the Citie; and a decree was made, That the same day should be kept holy.

Great contentment among the Sibenfians.

Within few Moneths after, there arose great dissension betwixt the Sibenfians; the Nobilitie holding for the Venetians, and the rest of the people for the King of Hungarie. This seditious multitude did put on Armes, and hauing thrust all the Gentlemen forth of the Citie, they tooke the publike gouernment into their owne hands. Those who were expelled went to the Venetians, and hauing promised to yeeld themselves vnto them, entreated them speedily to passe ouer into Dalmatia, to recouer Sabenica. The Venetians did forthwith arme foure Gallies, with about fiftie other smaller vessells. The Citie being besieged, was not only well defended, but the Venetian was expelled thence with great losse, whereby they knew that it behoued them to haue a greater Armie: whereupon, the Senate sent thither Lodouico Bucccherino with great supplies to besiege it by Land.

At this arriuall they built a Fort neare to the Citie, and all the passages were shut vp, that no victuals, armour, nor reliefe might come vnto it. And besides, Ambassadors were sent into Hungarie (Giouanni Barba, and Tomaso Mocenigo, both of them being Prouidatori of S. Marke, went thither.) The affaires of the Sibenfians being for a while debated, was by the consent of the Hungarian and the Venetians, referred to Pope Iohn to be decided.

But in this meane time Marsilio Carrario, and Brundino of Escalla, being then fugitives in Germanie, did each of them by Letters and trustie Messengers sollicite their friends to stirre vp rebellion: whereof the Venetians being aduertized, it did greatly trouble them. At the last it was knowne by letters intercepted by chance, that Marsilio would be shortly at Padua, where certaine of the Inhabitants, who were louers of noueltie, had put him in hope to be kindly welcomed. One of those who were faultie, being taken, and conuicted of the fact, was cut in foure quarters: And another of them being brought backe from Ferrara to execution, lost his head betwixt the two Columnes. Diuers were reported to haue a hand in the conspiracie, but the Senate were of opinion that it was better to defer the punishment till some other time, thinking in the meane time that they had sufficiently provided for the Common-wealth, if by containing the Paduans in their dutie, they should for feare of danger keepe the Tyrants farre from Italie. They appointed fise thousand crownes for reward to any that should bring either of their heads to Venice.

Secret practices of Marsilio Carrario, and Brundino of Escalla, The conspiracie discovered.

About the same time, on the thirteenth of August, there hapned in the Citie so great a Tempest of Winde, Hail, and Raine, as diuers ships were cast away, some being swallowed by the waues, and others dashed to peeces against the Sea-banks. Diuers buildings as well publike as priuate were ouerthrowne, and among others S. Sauours steeple: Trees were pluckt vp by the rootes, and carried farre off by the violence of the winde. This was reputed for a wonderfull prodigie. And that which some affirmed, to haue scene diuers monstrous and terrible representations in the aire, did encrease mens feare and amazement. Two Moneths after, newes was brought to Venice, that the Scythians had robbed and spoiled the Faïres of Tane, with great murder of Christians, and that among others, diuers Venetians who were come thither with very rich merchandize, were slaine by the Barbarians. They had assured testimonie that this losse happened at Tane, on the selfe same day, as that horrible Tempelt did afflikt Venice. The steeple of S. Johns Church at Rialto was the same year finished. The order of the Celestines which was founded in the Church of S. George of Alega, was at the same time, by the pursute of Lorenzo iustinianno, and other Honourable and deuout Persons, made very famous and much frequented. This Order had at the beginning besides these men, sundrie other more rich Benefactors, among whome was Gabriela Candelmaro, who being afterwards Pope, and called by the name of Eugenius, did much beautifie that place with buildings and reuennues.

At the same time one of those foure Gallies which returned home laden with rich merchandize from France, was cast away at the entrance of the Sicilian Sea, not by the violence of the winds or waues, but by the only ignorance of the Marriners. Those who were within it were almost all saued, and the most part of the goods were recovered.

Such was the state then of the Common-wealth abroad and at home. But this quiet was disturbed by the inualions of the Hungarians. For Pipus the Florentine ouer-running Italie at the same time with ten thousand Horse, made incursions on the Venetian confines. The Venetian Annales make no mention, for what cause the Emperour Sigismond (in whose name the Tufcan made these stirres in Italie) did beginne this Warre: But it was to bee presumed that it was by reason of the ciuill Warre of the Forlani, the Lords and People of that Prouince contending about the publike Gouvernement. Some of them would haue the Venetians, others the Hungarian, or the Bishop of Aquileia: whereupon it came to passe that at Pipus his arriual, Frederico Sauergnane with all his faction, being retired to Venice, those of Vdina yeelded to him. Pipus hauing receiued Vdina, did forthwith come vpon the Treuifan, and tooke from the Venetians, Serauall, Belluna, Feitre, and La Motte. It is certaine that the sale of Zara made by Ladislaus, and the siege of Sibenfa were cause of all those troubles. Some Authors neuertheless doe affirme, that the King came into Italie at the pursute and entreatie of Brunora of Escalla, who did still aspire to his Fathers Principalitie. But whatsoener the occasion of this Warre was, it is certaine that Pipus after diuers warlike exploits, being corrupted with money (as they say) did leaue the Prouince, and returned into Hungarie, where the Hungarian caused him to die, by pouring molten gold downe his throat: And that soone after he came downe into Italie with fortie thousand men; others make the number lesse. His latter attempt of Warre, albeit it carried a greater shew, yet was it not so fortunate as that of Pipus, for he did hardly passe the confines of the Forlani. Some Historians say that Sigismond did make Warre on the Venetians with Pipus. But whether it were so, or (as others affirme) a-part, it is certaine that the Venetians at the first report of this Warre, made great preparations of Souldiers and munition, and chose Carolo Malatesta for Generall of their Armie, who was a man of great reputation, whom for that purpose they had called from his house. It is reported that they fought at times on the Treuifan and Feltrian confines, as occasion was presented, & that the Hungarian did still vse such crueltie, as all those who fell into his hands, came from him lame of some of their members. For he did cause the prisoners hands to be cut off, and their eies to be put out. After hee had in this manner prosecuted the Warre for a time, they sent Ambassadors to him. Francisco Foscarei, Thomaso Mocenigo, (who were afterwards Princes) and Antonio Cornari, came to his Camp and concluded a truce with him for five yeares.

Armes being laid a-side against Sigismond, Prince Steno soone after deceased in the thirteenth yeare of his Gouvernement. His body was laid in S. Marimies Church.

Thomaso

THOMASO MOCE NIGO, the
64. Duke of Venice.

Thomaso Mocenigo who was absent, was subrogated in his place. Hee was at the same time Ambassadors at Cremona to Gabrino Fondulo, from whence being called, hee came to the Citie, and was receiued of all men with great ioy.

At the beginning of his Government certaine Magistrates were by the Senates decree translated to Rialto: And to the three Tables which were there from the beginning, the fourth Profenitica was added, called vulgarly the Messetaria. For that purpose a Palace was builded on La Riua de Ferro, where these foure Magistrates doe at this day execute Iustice. The great Douana was there at the beginning. Since then, it being diuided into two, that concerning the affaires of the firme Land hath still remained there, and the other for marine matters, was transferred neare to the Church of the T rinicie.

The Citie was not long at rest, a new warre being raised on the confines of the Forlani, concerning the contentions of Vdina. Lodouico Techia was at the same time Bishop of Aquileia, who at his owne pleasure governed the whole Prouince, which lieth betwixt the Riuers of Liuenza, and Timaui, the Adriatick Sea and the Alpes. Some Authors say that this Prouince belongeth to the Forlani. But the vulgar doe at this day call it Friul, and the Inhabitants the Countrie of Friul. There arose great strife betwixt this Bishop, and those of Vdina, by reason that the Vdinois would haue those of Sauergnane his faction, who in the last war tooke part with the Venetians, and in regard thereof being in a sedition driuen thence, and were retired to the Venetians, to be called home into the Citie. Techia on the contrarie did impugn it, saying that he would neuer permit it. Whilst the Citie of Vdina was in this contention, and by consequent the whole Prouince almost, the Venetians seized on Sacila. The Bishop perceiving that the matter was to bee determined by armes, had recourse to the King of Hungarie. For hee felt himselfe too weake to deale with the Venetians.

In the meane time the Ciuidilians did yeeld to the Venetians, who kindly receiued them, not as vassalls, but as associates. The Bishop soone after returning from Hungarie with foure thousand Hungarians, came (with the aide of the Patrians who had still continued faithfull to him) and besieged the Ciuidilians. But being strengthened with a good Garrison, which the Venetians had left there, they did without feare receiue the enemy, The Hungarians were before the Citie for the space of fifteene daies, who hauing spoiled all places round about, being enforced by the great frost and snow (for it was winter,) they raised their Campe.

The Venetians
recovered Feltré, Belluna and other places.

The Bishop being out of hope to effect any thing, did follow them into Hungarie: The Venetians recovered Feltré, Belluna, and other places which had bene lost in that warre: they entred the Patrians confines, where they wholly ruined the Citie of Prata. Philippo Arcia was General of the Armie, one of the best experienced Captaines of his time. He (Prata being ruined) marched towards Vdina, where the gate on the side of Ciuitade, being opened to him by Fredericke and others of his partie, the Citie was then like to haue bene taken by that treacherie: But a great noise raised on a sodaine, and the alarme giuen on euerie side all men ranne to armes. 10 The Bajdetti being amazed at this sodaine and vnlookt for feare, hauing lost diuers of their Souldiours who were at hand with the armed Squadrons of the Citie, retired without doing any thing. Afterward the Venetian Ensignes, ranne here and there vpon the Patrians territorie: and the Vdinois for certaine yeares were in danger. Diuers Cities and Lords of the Forlani did acknowledge the Venetians.

to the Venetians

But the Vdinois perceiuing, that it was in vaine to expect reliefe from any place, and that the Bishop his arriuall was vncertaine, they resolved likewise to yeeld. Therefore they sent their Agents to Venice, to offer vnto the Venetians their Lands and meanes as well publicke as particular, and in Generall all matters both diuine and humane. The Agents being friendly entertained, the Senate decreed that Fredericke and his associates should be restored to their Citie and their goods. By which decree not onely the Sauerignans but their adherents and all those who had bene banished, returned into the Citie and their inheritances. The whole Countrie of the Patrians in Friul, followed the example of the Vdinois. The Bishop being aduertized of the Vdinois yeelding, thinking it no time to delay, came through Germanie with great troupes of Hungarians, and fell furiously on the Forlani: and at his arriuall in the freights of the Alpes he tooke the Castle of Clafino, a most strong and well defended place, and neere thereunto that of Mutiano, a place then as now well fortified. And the Patrians were like to haue receiued a great losse, if the Venetian forces sent thither for that purpose, had not opportunely 30 by their arriuall, broken the enemies designs, who were still in the freights of the Alpes.

The enemies did not onely refuse to fight, but they durst not attend the Venetians who came towards them; for they came into Italie with an intent rather to robbe and spoile, than make warre. And by this meanes within few daies after this great stirre, all the Countrie of the Patrians was at quiet, all those places which the enemy had seized being easily recovered. Within a while after, the Bishop returned into Italie with a greater Armie, and entring the Patrians confines, he assailed Manfred, and soone after Rosafia. But this journey prooued as vnfortunate as the former whereof we now spake. The Venetians at the first newes of the enemies coming were in the field, whereat the Bishop being greatly astonished, departed forthwith out of Italie: And within a while after practicing nouelties he deceased. By his death the Vdinois and Patrians were afterward at quiet vnder the gouernment of the Venetians. These things hapned abroad. But the Citie sustained great losse by fire as it had oftentimes done before. The fire breaking forth on a sodaine from the Dukes Palace, did in an instant take hold on Saint Marks Church which is verie neere to the same, where the flame did so terribly encrease as the lead beeing melted, (wherewith it was then covered as it is at this day) there was nothing left but the open vaults. They tooke great paines neere to the Church to keepe the fire from the neighbour-houses. The fire being quenched, the Senate decreed, that 40 no man vnder paine of forfeiting a thousand Ducats, should dare to propound to the Senate to pluck downe the old Palace and to reedifie it more sumptuously. It is reported, that then the Prince, preferring the honour of the Common-wealth before his owne priuate profit, brought the same summe to the Senate, and requested

sted the Senators that they would permit & command, that the fore-part of the Ducal Palace, which was much defaced, might be reedified in more sumptuous manner as was befitting for the maiestic of the Common-wealth. The publicke Aduocates and Procurators, did forthwith craue that the Prince might pay the forfeiture for that he had infringed the Senates decree. The Prince hauing liberally paid the summe, did so constantly pursue his proposition, as the Senate reuoked their former decree, and ordained that the Palace should bene built, whereupon the ancient structure was plucked down, and another more sumptuous was begunne. But the Prince dyed before it was finished after he had gouerned ten yeares and almost 10 three months. His bodie was buried in the Church of the Twinnes. Francisco Foscart succeeded him.

the warre against Philip Duke of Milan.

Is promotion was so pleasing to all the people, and to the whole Venetian State, as in signe of gladnesse there was no holy day for one whole yeare, wherein fight at Barriers, running at Ring, or other sundrie shewes were not presented. The yeare following the Porch of Rialto was builded at the charges of Scipioni Boa, and afterward built new againe by him, because the former building was thought to be of no long continuance. The same yeare likewise, warre was begunne against Philip Duke of Milan. The cause of which painefull and tedious warre we must fetch from farre, to 40 the end that all men may know that it was not undertaken rashly or without cause against so mightie a Prince, and a great friend as then to the Venetians, but that they were constrained so to doe.

This Philip was sonne to Galeas Visconte, who being left verie young with John Maria his eldest brother, did loose a great part of his Principalltie. For Galeas being dead, diuers Tyrants and pettie Kings, beginning to stirre here and there, each of them seized on one or many Townes of his Dukedome: and like a bodie, being left in the midst of them, they tare it in peeces. But in succession of time, as well by his owne valour as that of Francisco surnamed Carmagnolla, one of the greatest Captaines of those daies, hee did not onely recover the greatest part of 50 that which did belong to his deceased father, but by a wonderfull course of victorie became master of diuers Townes which were neuer possessed by his Ancestors. At the last comming to besiege Genoa, and the Genoueses being brought to all extremitie, it is certaine that they were relieued by the Florentines with a great summe summe of money, on condition that they should giue them for assurance of the lent summe, the Citie of Liorno a verie strong place on the mouth of Arno. Philip perceiving that the same warre would beget matter of new dissension, did neuerthelesse dissemble, deferring the reuenge till some other time.

He had determined (as he said afterward) to succour Pope Martin, whom he vnderstood to be basely dealt with by his neighbours: Whereupon he gaue out that he tooke armes for that purpose, and marching forward, he did fight with and defeat the Florentines neere to Zagonare, because (as he said) they would haue stopp'd his passage. But it was sufficiently knowne to all men that Angelo Pergolesi, who at the same time did so fortunately winne the battaile against the Tuscans, was sent by Philip to raise the Florentines campe before Forli, the inhabitants having entreated him so to do. But vpon what occasion fouer it was that the Armie came thither, it is certaine that the warres being begun in those quarters, it came to passe afterwards that the Florentines by the carelesnesse of their Capitaines (or rather by their owne malice as some haue thought/being vanquished at diuers times, after sundrie losses, thought vpon nothing more than how to preserve their libertie. And because there was some likelihood, that they could not long without some forraine aide resist the force of Philip, they resolu'd to haue recourse to the Venetians, whome they had attempted at the beginning by diuers Ambassadors to draw into that warre.

At the last they sent Lorenzo Ridolphi their Ambassador to Venice, to entreat and exhort them to contract alliance with them against Philip, with this charge: That if their entreaties would not moue the Senate, that he should aduertize the Senators of the danger that was like to ensue; that hauing ouerthrowne the Florentines, he would striue to doe as much to the Venetians. For as touching the euent of the present warre, he should giue them to vnderstand, that they would defend their libertie against that cruel enemy, so long as their forces and meanes would giue them leaue: but if he should perceiue the Venetians to incline and giue eare to the prosperous successe of Philip, to assure them that it would be too late to talke of peace at such time as Florence being besieged, all things should fall out contrarie to them. But because it was for one man to commit the error, they would endeavour to free themselves of this warre, in becoming tributarie to him, and then it would come to passe that the Venetians would perceiue how that it had beene more expedient for them to haue made warre in the Florentines companie, vpon him who would one day become their enemy, than afterward to vndergoe the whole burthen alone. And being thus instructed to moue the Venetians on all sides, he departed from Florence.

But the Senators hauing beene already sundrie times importuned by the Florentines (for they had still for two yeares space continued their sollicitings for that purpose) had to that end sent diuers times to Philip: First Andrea Contareni, and Lorenzo Bragadino were sent vnto him. Then Nicolas Maripetro, who was afterward followed by Andrea Mocenigo, and the last of all was Francisco Serra one of the Secretaries; all of them being commaunded to entreat, & exhort him to giue ouer the warre against the Florentines, and hauing laid by Armes, to referre himselfe to the Venetians for all wrongs which he could pretend to haue receiued of them, albeit they knew well enough that if the Florentines had offended him, they had already receiued sufficient punishment. Besides, that the Venetians did highly account of his alliance, the which they were resolu'd to entertaine so long as they should perceiue it not to be preiudiciall to their libertie: Neither had they forgotten humanitie, which did constrain them to haue pittie and compassion of a free people. They did then entreat him if he desired to continue their allies, and to haue them for his friends, to make peace with the Florentines, the which ought to be as pleasing to him, as to any of those whom it nearest concerned. Philip heard them verie courteously, & gaue them to vnderstand both by gesture and word, that he would in fauor of the Venetians grant their demands: yet neuerthelesse, he did not cease vnder hand vnderstand straightly to presse the Tuscans, alledging now one reason, and then another, and by dissembling drew the matter forth at length. The Venetians albeit they knew whereunto Philip's designs tended, neuerthelesse because they would not seeme to doe any thing rashly, they did last of all send Paulo Cornari to him, to giue him to vnderstand what the Senate had determined to doe, if he did not presently cease from molesting the Florentines: Francisco Carmagnolla his comming to them (who had forsaken Philip) had in some sort heartened them to warre, if so be that he did not lay aside his armes, seeing they were before then doubtfull openly to denounce warre against him. This man hauing vnderstood by vicious young men (for so he termed them) that Philip did no more beare him the same affection that he was wont, with cholerick speeches and threats he forooke him, and came by bywaies to Treire, and from thence to Tremiso.

Carmagnolla leaues Philip, and commeth to the Venetians.

Now this which followeth is in effect that which Cornari spake to Philip. That among all the Princes of the earth he did not know any man who was more bound to giue thanks to Almighty God than Philip: Because he had not only recovered his lost principallitie for the most part, but likewise by an admirable successe had wonderfully increased it: That he did peaceably enioy that part of Italie, the which in fertilitye of soyle, in goodly and rich Cities, and in number of skilfull and ingenious men, either in time of peacetime till the earth, or in time of war to beare Armes, was not only to be compared, but wholly to be preferred before any other Region whatsoever. But his estate being such as it was, he did not referre the successe thereof to the diuine providence, by saying that his youth, industrie, strength, and wildom were not worthe of such a fortune, the which without all doubt were sufficient to conquer a verie great Kingdom or Empire, & being conquered, brauely to defend it; but that his speech rather tended to this, to put him in mind, that being placed in so high degree, he ought not to forget humane affaires, nor the vncertaintie of them, but to be contented with his owne estate. The which the Venetians did hope would fall out according to their desire: in regard whereof they had freely made firme alliance with him for ten yeares, which was not a limited treatie, but a perpetuall league of friendship. Which being so, the Venetians did greatly meruaile that hauing recovered his fathers Dukedome with many other Cities, and among others Genoa, enemies in times past of their greatnesse, at such time as in the midst of so many felicities he ought to take his ease, he had seized on Forli in Flaminia, and had marched into Tuscany against the Florentines: That they were not ignorant of the pretence he alledged, that the Florentines had contrarie to the agreement relieued the Genoueses with money, that they had seized on Liorno, at such time as Genoa was already in a manner taken. Nor were the Venetians likewise ignorant, what these pretences were, and whereunto they tended; that the common prouerbe was true: That man who is cunningly dealt with, doth sometimes as plainly perceiue the deceit as he that vseth it. And that it oftentimes cometh to passe that bad designs fall vpon the Authors heads. Besides, that the Venetians held nothing in this world so deere as libertie, that vnto it alone they referred all iustice, clemencie, pietie, and all other duties as well publike as particular; thinking all things to be well done, which are done by the onely contemplation thereof. That there was no contract, agreement, nor any diuine or humane law, that was able to impeach the publike libertie: And to come to the matter in question; That the Venetians were no lesse moued with the Florentines danger, than if they perceiued the Armie of Philip to ouerrunne the lands of their obedience. For by being careful of the libertie of other men, in regard they held the same forme of government, as the Florentines did, it hapned to them as to diuers others, who were as sorrowfull for the harme of their neighbours, as for their owne. And that they did not doubt but that he who as an enemy doth assaile the libertie in Tuscany, would likewise if he could do the like euerywhere; and chiefly tyrants, who do ever feare & detest this name of libertie. That when the Venetians made a league with Philip, it was with with this intent to continue friends and allies with him so long, as he being satisfied with his Fathers principallitie, should abstaine from molesting his neighbours, and should liue in peace and quiet: But that they could not allowe, nor would by no means suffer him by a continuall warre still to molest the Florentines, whose only fault hath bene in that they did not valiantly defend themselves: wherefore if he did not speedily dislodge forth of Flaminia and Tuscanie; if hee did not remaine within his owne confines limited by the agreement, and satisfying himselfe with so flourishing an estate did not hereafter liue at peace: the Venetians, as well to defend themselves as their friends the Florentines, would both together make warre vpon him, and leaue the greatest forces against him they could, as against a Tyrant and cruell enemy.

Philip his answer to Cornari

Cornari his speech did greatly moue Philip; who dissembling his anger for that present, answered him with a smiling countenance in few words, saying, That hee was well assured that the Venetians by their constant and faithfull promise would euer obserue the agreement sworne betwixt them; and that hee could not beleue, though there were none at all, that they would preferre the Florentines friendship (whose treacheries, deceits, and thefts, the Venetians did greatly detest both in publique and particular) before his: That there was no occasion (if the Venetians would call to memorie the ancient friendship of his Ancestours, the affection of his Father Galeas, and the respect which hee had euer borne to them) whereby hee ought to expect any wrong or discontent from them. But as concerning warre, albeit hee knew for a certaine that the Florentines treacherie and rafhnesse would be punished, before that the Venetians or any other, could come to their succour; their affaires being in very great hazard: yet neuertheless hee was content for the Venetians sake, vnto whome hee would refuse nothing, to referre the whole matter, (if the Florentines were so contented) to be decided by them, and Nicholas of Este.

The Ambassadors of Philip come to venice.

The Florentines Ambassadors at Venice.

Cornari being dismissed with this answer, returned to Venice. Giouanni Arctim who had bene Secretarie to deceased Galeas, and Bertrand Lamponiano did soone after follow him. For, the report was that new Ambassadors were come to Venice from the Florentines: And therefore Philip fearing least the Venetians who were already of themselves sufficiently enclined to leaue him, should make a league with the Florentines; he would likewise haue his Ambassadors to bee there, to the end that if need were, they might plead his cause in the Senate.

So soone as they were arriued: the Ambassadors were scene to walke vp and downe the Citie in different manner. Lorenzo (as it became him) representing with a sorrowfull countenance the miserie which afflicted his Countrie, went here and there peniue and disconsolate, entreated the Senators whome hee met with, and visited others at home at their houses, omitting nothing that hee knew might serue for his purpose. On the contrarie those of Philip, besides their brauerie and goodly shew, being full of hope and confidence, went vp and downe viewing the Citie, and the admirable situation thereof, wondering to see it all Sea, and yet all Land. They did curiously salute all men: being demanded any question, they gently answered, and generally in their gesture, speech and gate, they represented the greatnesse and prosperitie of their Prince. Now the Senators were of opinion first to giue audience to the Tuscan, who being brought into the Senate spake in this manner.

The Oration of the Florentine Ambassador.

Ye may easily coniecture, most excellent Prince; and yet conscript Fathers, albeit I were silent, what businesse I haue to handle in your presence, and whereunto this last Ambassade of the Florentines doth tend. Those who haue scene my speedie coming out of Tuscanie vnto this Citie, haue vnderstood, that an Ambassadors of a free Citie, is come to demand aide of a free people for the conseruation of their libertie. This is the summe of our demands, the which I reque for our Countrie, which hath begotten and bred vs, and raised vs up into some degree of honour about the vulgar, and if it bee possible, by our entreaties, to obtaine it. If I shall be so happy, most excellent Prince, and ye Senators, as to perswade yee to accept of the Florentines alliance, and to ioyne your armes with ours against this cruell Tyrant who this steth after our libertie and yours, my Ambassade shall bee most fortunate, and my Countrie being highly contented, shall welcome mee home with teares of ioy, will embrace me for such good newes, and will account it selfe by your meanes to be freed from all danger. My desire maketh me to hope well, and chiefly when I consider, that I come vnto those, who besides their knowledge (which doth no lesse concerne them than the Florentines) how to quench and roote out the Tyrants neighbour forces, as though it were a new fire, are esteemed to be so zealous of libertie, wherein their Citie is borne an encreased, as they will likewise wholly maintaine, and free all such places from wrong; where they perceiue any sparke of libertie to shine, and will with a mutual consent hate all Tyrants, as enemies and disturbers thereof. I could allegre diuers examples, how for loue to this libertie, the Athenians accounted Philip of Macedon for an enemy, the Romans Mithridates, Antiochus, and diuers others, who with an vbridled desire of rule, or rather enuying the libertie of other men, did rashly stirre up against themselves, the Armes of that invincible nation. But wherefore doe we seeke ancient or farraine examples, when we haue in abundance, so many new and domestick: There is none of vs (as I thinke) which hath not scene or heard of their Fathers and Mothers, how vehement an enemy to this Citie Prince Carrario shewed himselfe, during the Warre with the Genoueses, first at Chioggia, and then at Treviso. What did King Lewis? what did many others who haue not ceased to disturbe the peace and quiet of your state? And we likewise haue euer without intermission had an hereditarie Warre with the Viscontes, euer since the Principallitie of Luchin. And to speake truly, it is common sense, that those who haue vsurped other mens libertie, doe hate those vnto whome they cannot doe as much. I esteeme your Common-wealth most happy, and your felues O yee Venetian Fathers, in that yee haue extinguished the Carrarians race your capital enemies, before such time as this rauening Lyon, with whom we haue to doe, was growne great: For if he had now found them liuing, he would not haue bene satisfied with assailing you only on the Lakes of Bebia, (as they did) but coming both by Land and Water, he would not only haue endangered your state, but your libertie it selfe: whereupon I thinke that it fell out well for us that day that you swallowed that neighbour flame; vnto the great assurance which you haue conceiued by that victorie, doth binder you from thinking on the danger, which threateneth you from this cruell Tyrant. He is your enemy, beleue me, he is your enemy, and lieth in wait on every side, and therefore so much the more dangerous as he is yet least knowne; and there is nothing so difficult, which he presumeth not to achieve by his good fortune, or dareth not to attempt. For, having with few thousand men assailed our forces, who were then excellent in Armes, meanes, and good fortune, and sometimes twise or thrise greater than his, hee hath neuertheless broken and defeated them; sooner than we thought that he had defeated them. He hath no Gyants (according to the Poets fictions) or cruell Centaures in his Armes: They be men like ours, but much more hardie and valiant, vnto whom he hath giuen in marriage, the Daughters and Wives of our best Citizens, with their Houses, Lands, and Possessions. Where vnto doe you thinke that their haughtie courages will not aspire? Is it likely that they thinke or desire any other matter, than after that they shall haue ouerthrowne our forces, how they may one day assaile the Venetians more mightie than mee in reputation and power, so greatly greatly hath their good successe encreased their boldnesse. Let vs then finde meanes to overthrow their wicked Councils, and detestable vowes, to expell their Wives and Children, with their Governours of Cities, Fields, and Townes, from the confines of Lombardie, and to enforce them to busie themselves about their owne domesticke affaires, or else to take forraigne pay. I am affraid, most excellent Prince, to speake what I thinke; yet I will tell it, (seeing that necessitie enforseth me therunto: That vnlesse yee speedily ioyne your forces with ours, Florence being subdued, will bring Philip to that passe, that vnlesse the aide of any else he will come to disturbe and beate downe the Venetians State.) But (say yee) the Venetians are accustomed to maintaine their alliances as sacred and inuiolate. I beseech God, most excellent Prince, and yee conscript Fathers, that those vnto whom he hath given so good a minde to obserue 10 their promise, may likewise know the cunning and deceits of those with whom they are to deale, and being knowne, to auoide them by speedie wisdom. I thinke yee remember, with what subtiltie and craft he deceived you when as he expell'd Pandolfo Malatesta from his State, and from that of his Mother, whose yee so much desired to maintaine in the Principallitie of Brescia. Yee haue heard how by deceit, and contrarie to the agreement, hee hath suppressed the Soueraigne Magistrat of Genoa, and brought that mightie Citie into bondage. Yee are not ignorant likewise, how contrarie to the assurance of peace, infringing all lawes and customes, he hath ouerthrowne vs by a sodaine and vnlookt-for assault: who is it then which doth not plainly see how often he hath broken all Diuine and Humane lawes? It is not lawfull to keepe promise with a perjured person. But your silence doth make me abash 20 die in a manner to beleue, that yee doe sufficiently know, that I doe not so much trauel by this mine advertisement the safetie of our Common-wealth, as your prosperitie, good fortune, and preseruation, the which thus perfidious, craftie, and well aduised, great Souldier, so these audacious than readie, doth daily lay wait for trusting to the fidelitie of his Souldiers, to the treasure which he hath gathered together, and to the great yearly tribute which he receiueith, deferring to make warre on you, till he hath wholly ruined vs. But doe not contemne our alliance, although we seeme to be reduced to all extremitie: For albeit we haue without measure spent great wealth, we haue yet greater, though not publike, yet particular, the which we are readie frankly to employ, for the preseruation of our libertie. Ioyne then your armes, ioyne 30 your forces with ours, and by wholesome Counsell and Sacred alliance, conserue both our Liberties, Common-wealths, and Countries. And as concerning the meanes how to accomplish it, we prescribe no conditions, but are readie to embrace such as yee shall propound.

Lorenzo hauing ended his speech, all the Senators were greatly moued; not one against another, but in themselves being of sundrie opinions, each of them debating with himselfe the power of Philip on the one side, with the Common-wealths danger, and on the other the Florentines example; with the great expence of the warre. Whereupon they concluded to heare the Ambassadors of Philip, before they would giue an answer. And to the end they might make an easie reply to that which Lorenzo had vttered, certaine Senators were commanded to relate to the Milanais, vnder colour of particular friendship, that which he had spoken: Whereupon, a day being appointed for their coming to the Senate; Giouanni Arctin famous for humane learning, and eloquent in the Countie language, with the consent of his fellow, spake in this manner.

The Oration of Giouanni Arctin.

Understand, most illustrious Prince, that the Florentines who are great enquirers after newes, are desirous ouer the whole Citie to know wherefore, and upon what occasion, Philip Duke of Milan hath sent vs hither to you, and in 50 this most Sacred Senate: whome in some sort to satisfie, I will in few words utter the effect of our Ambassade, and I assure my selfe that when they shall vnderstand it, it will not greatly content them. We are not then come hither, conscript Fathers, to stirre up any troubles, nor sort to ouerturne any Diuine or Humane Law. Philip

leaueth those cunninges to the Florentines, vnto whom by nature they belong: For he thinketh on nothing more, than carefully to obserue the precepts and documents which he hath received from his Ancestors, and how to reuerence by all good meanes and offices your friendship, confederacie, and good will. And seeing that by the diuine bountie it is come to passe that it is not needfull in such a bond of friendship, to renew any treatie of peace or alliance betwixt you and him, the Florentines must giue place, and with their good loue (if they please) to permit Philip according to his owne manner, and that of his Ancestors, to salute you, most excellent Prince, and all these well-beloued Senators, by his Ambassadors, together with the whole Citie: Let it be lawfull for vs to say, that Philip liueth not but for the good of the Common-wealth: that the Duke of Milan an inward friend to the Venetians, liues not but to 10 preserue their dignitie and greatnesse: who for the great loue he beares them, and in regard of the sound alliance and contract betwixt you two, and in respect of the correspondence of all fortunate and happie euents, that he hath with you, giues yee to vnderstand, that his enemies the Florentines are ouerthrowne & vndone, who by euill counsell, would with a shameles boldnesse haue ouerwhelmed him, if hee had not diligently preuented it, in a most dangerous warre. This is most wise Fathers, this is the chiefe end of our Ambassade. This is the cause why Philip hath commanded vs to come hither. Moreover because we haue vnderstood, that these men goe about with an affected speech, wherewith they naturally helpe themselves, and with teares and sighs, say, not onely in the Senate, but likewise in the streets and publike 20 places of the Citie, that they are not the cause of the warre, for which they are at this day so badly delt with; that Philip did beginne it; he willingly referreth the whole matter to your iudgement, being resolu'd to embrace such conditions as yee shall propound: Let the Florentines if yee please, come into this place, and extolpe themselves: but let them not inuent vnheard off falsities, whereby they endeavour to animate against all right and alliance, your Authoritie & constancie against Philip. Ye must (say they) beware of him, if his power doe encrease: For all Kings Princes, and Tyrants, doe enemie and are enemies to Common-wealths, and doe abhorre that name. They alleadge Philip of Macedon, Mithridates, and Antiochus; would he had remembered Porcenna, who by a sodaine warre did in a manner (mother the Romans libertie at her first birth: But he did of purpose forget it (as I thinke) because he would not haue it 30 knowne that Tuscanie hath in times past brought forth any, who hath attempted on others libertie. But if they take such delight in Histories, why doe they not rather alleadge Hieron, Massinissa, the Ptolomies and Attalus, who were trustie friends to the Romans. King Lewis was a capital enemy to the Venetians, so were the Carriarians; but the Viscontes, for a hundred yeares space that they haue enioyed their excellent State, were neuer enemies, but alwaies friends and allies to the Venetians. The Tuscan hath not knowne this; nay rather, knowing it, he hath like a subtil and cunning Orator of purpose concealed it. Let him produce but one onely example of this family which doth so much affect you, he cannot doe it, and therefore it is sufficient to overthrow his vntruthes, fables and flanders. And not to speake of his Ancestors, so farre off were the Venetians from euer suspecting the forces of Galeas father to this Philip (which vndoubtedly were 40 verie great) as on the contrarie he did not let to ioyne his Armes with their forces, the better to helpe to increase theirs. As it fell out at such time as being your allye, he tooke Verona, Vincenza, Padua, and last of all Treuise. Yee haue scene this my Lords (to the end that no man may reprocue me of false-hood) or you may haue heard it of your fathers who were there present. But the Viscontes haue euer bene enemies to the Florentines; and haue still from father to sonne euen till now, made warre vpon them. Doe you not thinke that they had iust cause so to doe? Were they not by wrongs prouoked to take Armes? For to speake of the occasion of this present warre, by which they say they are greatly molested. They complaine of the taking of Forli contrarie to the Contract as if wee had neuer heard of this fable till now: 50 Philip hath giuen you all authoritie together with Prince D'Este, to enquire this matter. Why doe they not rather tell, vpon what cause against all right they did succour the Genoueses with a great summe of money, whilst Philip besieged them? why did they attempt to shut vp all passages to the Armie of Philip, which went to succour Pope Martin? what moued them

them to passe their bounds on the confines of the River Migra? why did they seize on Li-normes? and would not give audience to the Commissioners of Philip, till they had head-long throwne him vnto the hazard of an open warre? These are the causes which haue now mooued Philip to undertake this warre: The same cause likewise had the Vilcontes in times past. They can impute it to nothing but to their vaine manner of life, their pride, and conuentionnesse. Let them case then before you to blame our Prince, a friend to peace and quietnesse, and one that is stuffed with all bounty and liberality. But we are satisfied being prouoked therunto, that we haue answered this little, for much more which might be said, which is so true as they themselves, albeit they are vaine iyers, dare not affirme the contrarie. As for the rest, we haue already said and will againe say, that Philip is readie and resolu'd to referre the whole matter to your iudgement, wisdom and equitie. We are come hither to this purpose, and not (as the Tuscan presumeth) to renew the alliance, which hath not yet beene violated by you nor by vs euer shall.

Carmagnola is called into the Senate.

So soone as Aretime had made an end of speaking, the Ambassadors were put forth of the Senate: And then the Senators opinions were diuers: Some cried out that Philip was to be preuented, and warre to be denounced against him, who drawing forth the matter in length, durst not assaile them till he had vanquished the Florentines: Others said it behooued them to beware lest they vnderooke such a matter inconsiderately; and that it was verie easie for any man to beginne warre, but verie hard to end it. Vpon this diuersitie of opinions, they decreed to call Carmagnola into the Senate, and to heare him.

This man after his arrival at Treuifo, was euer highly extolled, both in publick & priuate by Prince Foscari and all his adherents, publishing his great renowne and experience in martiall matters, with his long and faithfull seruice to Philip a most vthankfull Prince. They affirmed that without all doubt vnder the conduct of such a man, (who knew Philips forces, and was well acquainted with all his designses yea with his most inward secrets) they might easily breake and ouerthrowe all the attempts of the Milanois. That which the Prince and his favorites said of Carmagnola was true, but many did suspect his loyalty, fearing that after he should haue throwne the Venetians into the hazard of warre, being wonne by faire promises, hee might againe returne to Philip.

But to cleare this doubt, it happened at the same time as this matter was debated, or not long before, that he had like to haue bene poisoned by Iohn Alitprand the Milanois. This man had in time before married the daughter of Bernabo Visconti, but because he had fauoured Hector de Monze whome Philip besieged, fearing the vanquishers furie, had retired with his wife to Treuifo. And in regard thereof Carmagnola did often visit him, as one whome he knew to be greatly hated of Philip. He in meane time being reconciled to Visconti did determine to poison his friend and guest, but being apprehended by the accusation of his maide-seruant, and put to the torture, he confessed the matter, and had his head stricken off. The Senators then imagining that which fell out, that the same had more animated Carmagnola against Philip (for he was at the same time come from the firme land to Venice) they called him into the Senate, where (being by nature cholericke) he beganne to inueigh against Philip, complaining with great vehemencie of his treacherie and ingratitude, saying That by his skill and diligence, hee had not onely recovered his fathers state, but much more beside: That by his conduct and dexterity, he had reduced vnder his dominion, Alexandria, Nonarra, Monza, Lusda, Coma, Fauia, Placentia, Bergamo, Cremona, Brescia, and last of all Genoa, enuious in times past of the Venetians greatness: And that thereby he had extolled the name of Philip, not onely beyond the confines of Italie, but of Europe, in regard of the taking of Genoa. And that he would not haue them to thinke that his labours had bene recompensed because that he had bene greatly honoured by him and married a wife of that kindred, and taken vpon him the surname of that familie: for that was no remuneration for his paines, but a board of his militia, so as by that meanes, this vthankfull man had had tye'd him to serue him till such time as he perceiued his affaires to be settled according to his will, as the euent did afterwards manifest. For besides his suffering of certaine shamelesse and detestable persons, whome he abused, to slander him, and in this regard holding him in some suspect, he had enforced him retire thence, he had moreover being thus banished attempted to take away his life. But that it fell out well for him, for that escaping the present danger in recompence of his Countrie, wife and children, and all his meanes left to a Tyrant, he had met with another true miserie of all integrity and iustice, where euery man was rewarded according to his deserts, where vertue and valour were honored, and where bad men had none access nor retreat: which being so, he did not thinke on his lost wealth, but that he had purchased much greater: That he felt not himselfe to be dented by any aduerser fortune, but that he was well recompensed for all his losses, were it not that his wife and children did so abate his courage, as he had not the meanes to hurt that Tyrant. As for the warre which they propounded, he said that Philips power, nor his forces were not so great as men boasted: And that the Florentines were not vanquished by the valour and conduct of their enemies, but by the malice and rashnesse of their owne Captaines: Nor that the other victories obtained in former time, were gotten by Philips conduct, but by his alone. And besides, that he was but needie in regard he had spent all his meanes on those Armies which he had sent forth by Sea and Land against the King of Aragon, so as that Armie which he now had in Tuscany had not of a long time receiued any paye. That he durst affirme, that Philip whome they thought in 20 shew to haue already surmounted all men, was in effect nearer to be vanquished than to vanquish: That his treasure cleane was exhausted, his subjects consumed, & his reuennue in a manner wholly engaged, and that little which remained, was by his detestable and shamelesse leues, rob'd, spoiled, and consumed: That he knew of a certain that his Armie had not bene paid for the space of a whole yeare: and that the report of some was not true, which said that his Souldiours followed him to the wars freely and without money. He willed them then to consider what might happen, if the Venetians should a roundly assaile the people of Lombardy who were drawn out of their wealth by continuall subsidies: If the Lombard merchants were prohibited their traffick with them, which was onely left the of all Itali: If their husbandmen and cattell should be enforced to retire into the circuit of their walls, their lands would become barren & vnfruitfull: If after the spoile of one years fruit famine and want of all necessaries should afflict them, they should then perceiue that he who now was thought a Conquerour, and whose only name was fearfull to all men, being by these meanes vanquished, would find enough to doe to defend himselfe and his subjects. And that they should not find him such an one in beating backe his enemies, as he had been before, in invading & pursuing them. Moreover that the Florentines forces were great at the first, but that those of the Venetians were much greater. That there was great difference in making warre in a forraign Countrie, & in a mans owne. That his reputation could much auail them in that enterprize, as hee who had fortunately ended all the warres which hee had begunne, and vanquished all those against whome hee had fought, and had learned by so many hazards, dangers, and labours, both to obey and command.

40 But as concerning Philips good will towards the Venetians (because by longe onuersing with him, hee knew all his secrets) hee assured them that he did deferre the warre, which he had long since resolu'd in his minde against the Venetians: till such time as hee should wholly ouerthrowe the Florentines. Hee willed them then whilest they had time to quench this flame which was so neare them: and if they thought him fit to manage the warre for the service of the Common-wealth, hee entreated them to vse the power which they had over him. Because hee was determined in regard of Philips ingratitude, to march against him with the same zeale, affection and heat of courage to his ouerthrow, as hee had done when hee was his friend to purchase him the soueraigne Principalltie. The Venetians should doe well then to embrace so faire an occasion, who in so doing should not alone defend 50 their owne estate, but mightily enlarge it, and should aide the Florentines their fellow brethren in libertie, who were then greatly afflicted. And this ought chiefly to excite them so to doe, in that they had him for their General in this warre, whom if they thought fit to serue them they might dispose of at their pleasure. They might peraduenture employ others more excellent in valour and reputation than himselfe, but none who was more affectionate to the Venetian people, nor with more iust cause and vehemencie animated against their enemy.

Carmagnola by his discourse had so well moued the Senatours, as all of them in a manner inclined to warre. Prince Mari thinking it vnfit to stand still in so faire a way, did with great vehemencie pursue the same discourse. For the Venetians good happe was, that the Common-wealth had then a Prince, who besides his admirable wisdom was borne for all haughtie enterprizes, and an immortall and daily enemy to Tyrants. Hee then spake in this maner.

Prince Foscare his Oration.

Here are two things in the Common-wealth (most excellent Fathers) which though in effect and name they seeme to bee very sweete, haue oftentimes neuerthelesse brought many mischiefs to very great and noble Cities; namely, peace, and sparing of the publique treasure. For being only considered a farre off there is no danger seeme in them, and being viewed neare at hand there is yet none to be scene, or if there be, men will so flatter and fauour them, as they despise it, in such sort as wee sooner fall into an euident danger, than haue any lesure to redresse it by a sharpe warre, or by some expence, which is odious to the Common-wealth. The which wee haue found to bee most true by diuers leses which our Ancestours haue sustained, and by some likewise happened in our time. The Florentines losse may serue for a sufficient present example, who being able to haue ouerthrowne the power of Philip at such time as it increased, many goodly occasions being presented vnto them, they would not doe it for feare of expence. What is come thereof? They doe now unprofitably spend the Golde and Siluer which in time of Peace they had so curiously gathered together. And that which is more to bee lamented, they cannot, (their libertie preferred) obtaine peace, nor giue end to their expences. I say then that it behoueth vs to foresee future dangers, and being foreseene to prevent them by counsell and mature deliberation. It is in a manner one selfsame gouernment (and no man doubts thereof) that of a Common-wealth and that of a Shippe at Sea. I demand of you, if any man in calme weather (as they call it) the windes gently blowing, holding the helme shall fall asleepe and take his rest, without considering from farre such dangers as may happen: or whilst other men make use of the sailes, mast, and saile-yards, should omit that which were needfull to remedie the suddaine fortunes of the Sea, nor exactly consider the time when hee saileth, vnder what climate or planet, or in what Sea, what rocks and helues hee ought to auoid: would yee not say that such a man suffering shipwrack by a sodaine tempest did iustly meritt such a losse? The verie selfsame is now happened to the Florentines: And the like will still happen to such, which doe not foresee from farre the imminent dangers which threaten Common-wealths: or hauing foreseene them, doe not speedily apply the remedie hauing the means to doe it. The Florentines might (not to stray from their example) easily haue ouerwhelmed, if they would neuer so little haue attempted it, the power of Philip, when it began to increase: but they would not intend it, either through negligence, or rather conuincence. What is come thereof? Being often vanquished in battaile, and brought to the verie hazard of their libertie, hauing lost their means they are deuided; and in stead of being accounted wise, well-advised, and prudent people, they are esteemed dull fooles and senselesse creatures. Wee must beate backe (I say) we must beate backe mischiefs, not only those which hang ouer our heads, but those likewise which doe nearely presse vs. Besides, were I in the farthest partes of Libia (let other men be of what minde they please) or beyond the Riphean mountains, and should heare tell that the libertie of any Nation were troden vnder foote, although I could not succour them, yet certainly I could not choos but be a partaker of their griefe. And shall we suffer a proud Tyrant, to teare in pieces, opresse, and abolish the libertie of a Noble people our Neighbour, borne and bred up in our common Mother, Italie? VVee doe not well consider that which wee see before our eyes, nor that which all Italie saith, that The same day as Florence shall loose her libertie, will be the first that Philip will assaile the Venetians. The which seeing all men doe thinke will come to passe, I greatly wonder some men, who albeit they say they haue well considered the matter, are neuerthelesse of opinion, rather to endure any thing, than to redresse the Florentines, and bad people, acinus of our navigation. It is a madnesse certainly, it is a madnesse, belicue me, to be contented to sustaine a great losse, so as the enemy may suffer a greater. And yet, thanks bee to God, their affaires neither abroad nor as home are to be compared to ours. If vntill now their forces haue beene so great, as wee had good cause to suspect them, they are at this present so abated, as of a long time they will not be able to recover their former strength. Yet neuerthelesse, I doe not say they are so minde, but that so soone as they shall understand that the Venetians will toyne with them; they will then vpon hope of better fortune bring forth so much gold and siluer as shall be sufficient to entertaine the one halfe of the Armie. And besides, Philips forces are not so great, as false report hath made vs to belicue. Carmagnola hath sufficiently acquainted vs with what he is able to doe. Moreover, the hope which wee may conceiue to recover and ioyne to our state, Brescia, Cremona, Bergamo, and all the Territories of ancient Venice, is no small spurre to animate vs to beginne the warre. This is it I know which yee haue along time thought on, and for which ye daily studie. But he who durst demand of the Prince of Mantua (whome he knew to be our friend and alie) the Citie of Pescara, do yee thinke that he will not attempt to haue by force, if yee will not giue it him with good will, Verona, Vincenza, and in a manner all that we possesse in the firme Lands: Therefore if yee will create me, there is none expence, the which, God be thanked we may easily beare, nor labour, seeing it is to purchase vs an assured peace, which may bee of force to hinder vs from spending in the Florentines to make warre on the Tyrant; I say a warre no lesse profitable than necessarie.

The Princes vehement speech, with his authoritie, which herein exceeded the Ducall dignitie, did in such sort moue the Senatours, who already of themselves were inclined therunto, as the Alliance with the Florentines was by a generall consent of them all concluded. VVhereupon their Ambassadour being called before the Senate, the agreement betwix their two States which was to continue firme and inuiolable betweene them during the whole time of the warre following, was solemnly concluded and confirmed in such manner as hereunder followeth.

It was therefore concluded that the Venetians and Florentines should Arme at their common charge, sixtene thousand horse, and eight thousand foote. They should furnish two Nauall Armies; with the one the Venetians should saile vp the Riuier Po, to resist the forces of Philip; and the Florentines, along the Riuier of Genoa with the other: That no man should speake of peace neither before, nor otherwise, till the Venetian should commaund it. That all the Cities, Fortes, and Townes, taken on the confines of Flaminia, should belong to the Florentines; the others should be ioyned to the Venetian state, or giuen to whom the Venetians should please.

So soone as Lorenzo in the Florentines name had allowed of these written conditions, he did cast himselfe at the Princes feete, and voluntarily with a loud voice began to protest, That the Florentine people should bee for euer mindfull of such a benefite, and besought God that the Venetians affaires might daily prosper better and better: And that if euer it did happen, that the Venetian people should haue neede, the Florentines would be euer readie according to their means, to aide the Venetian Common-wealth. This new alliance was strengthened by Nicholas de Asse, Francisco Gonzaga, Amadeo Duke of Sauoy, King Alfonso (reconciled not long before to the Florentines) and by those of Sienna, in respect of their neighbourhood.

denounce warre
against Philip.

The Venetians sent Francisco Serrano one of their Secretaries to Philip, to entreate him speedily to desist from making warre on the Florentines, who were newly allied to the Venetians, and vpon his refusal, he should in the Common-wealths name, according to the custome of their Ancestors, denounce warre against him. But he was so farre off from condescending to the tenour of this Ambassade, as on the contrarie, he did with great courage entertaine their defiance, imagining by how much the matter was more painefull and dangerous, so much greater did he hope the honour and glorie would bee, if hee should chance to winne the Victorie.

ARMAGNOLLA Captaine Generall to the Florentines taketh Bressia. The Armie of PHILIP returning from Tuscanie besiegeth Bressia. The great Trench which the Venetians made about the Castle of Bressia: The enemies being wearied with the long siege, yeeld up the Castle of Bressia. Peace being concluded with PHILIP, doth not last long through his owne fault. The Milanois Oration to PHILIP to stirre him vp to renew the warre. The Venetians having renewed their alliance with the Florentines, doe againe beginne the warre. The banished Fregoles being vanquished in battaile by the Genoueses, were driven from the Genoa Coast. The small Armie of PHILIP, broken by the Venetians, a little beneath Cremona: two unfortunate encounters hapning soone after to the Venetians, not farre from Cremona. The enemies falling into an Ambuscado neare to Bressia, doe loose many of their Horse. The enemies sodaine sallie on the Venetians Campe neare to Otholenga, doth greatly trouble them. A battaile neare to the Riuer of Olia, where they fought on both sides without any losse. Last of all, PHILIP is wholly put to rout at Macal, whereupon peace ensueth.

Arre being thus denounced, the Senate did forthwith make a speedie leauie of Souldiours ouer all Italie. But in the meane space, not to loose any time, they gaue to Carmagnolla their Captaine Generall all those troupes which they had then readie. Hee hauing receiued them, being full of courage, beganne to thinke in what manner hee might by some braue exploit begin the warre. For his hatred to Philip on the one side, and on the other the great opinion which the whole Senate and people of Venice had conceiued of him, did animate him to high and difficult enterprises. Hee attempted first of all to enter the Castle of Bressia by intelligence, hauing to that end wonne diuers, who promised him in the night time to kill the Governor uermour of the place: But the businesse falling out vnluckily, he practised by goodly promises the chiefe of that faction, whome hee certainly knew did not affect Philip, and especially Pietro, and Achilles Auguades, very courageous persons, and great enemies to Philip. Hee drew both of them by promises and exhortations to this point, as they granted about midnight to breake downe the Citie wall, and to ler in the Venetians. This being executed, diuers of the contrarie part, being awaked forth of their sleepe by the noise in the night, did in great feare retire to the strongest place of the Citie where the Garrison (which Philip had a few dayes before sent thither) did lodge: Oldrado Captaine of those men at Armes kept them backe that night, as they would haue runne into the Citie which they possessed, thinking if he could but defend that part of the Citie, with the Castle seated aboue it, that the Venetian after a notable losse should be at last enforced to quit the place which he had inconsiderately surpris'd.

Bressia hath a Castle (as is already said) on the top of an hill, which doth command the Citie, from whence two walles doe fundrie waies descend towards the bottom; that which looketh Eastward, enuironeth the Citie; and that which goeth athwart, cutting through certaine houses and old buildings, separateth the remnant of the hill, and is called the old Cittadell. But this old Cittadell was so named three yeares before this happened, when as by Philips commandement they made a wall ioyning to it, which was called the new. None els in a manner dwelt in the old but those of the Gibelline faction. Some say that Pietro Auguades at the first report of the warre entred the Citie with a great troupe of Peasants of the mountaines, and that the Prince of Mantua followed him with two thousand horse, and that at last Carmagnolla came thither with his troupes. But in what manner soeuer the Citie was taken, it is certaine that so soone as the Venetian was master thereof, he did sodainly fortifie that side, where the wall separated him from the enemy, fearing lest they about should make some sodaine sallie vpon them.

They say moreover, that at the same time as Bressia was taken, Nicholas D'Este Captaine Generall to the Florentines in this Warre, entring the Territorie of Cremona, brought thence a very great bootie. Philip, although at the first he made no shew of any great feare for being engaged in so great a warre (for neither in Milan nor abroad he had not leuied any new forces) and had besides suffered those which he then kept in Flaminia for want of victuals and pay, as if they had bene disbanded and cast, to retire themselves into the Townes of that Prouince which he possessed, was neuertheless by these two notable losses hapned in so short space, greatly troubled, and grew fearefull of his state. But nothing moued him so much as the losse of Bressia. Yet neuertheless when hee knew that the Castle, and that part of the Citie next to it, did yet hold out for him, he had some hope to be able to recover it, and determined to send aide thither, and to raise an Armie: but being doubtfull with what troups he might first of all oppose himselfe against the enemies attempts, the newes which hee heard how that King Alfonso had forsaken the Venetians and the other Confederates, did not onely giue him hope to attchieue some great enterprise, but did wholly assure him thereof. His first resolution then was to recover Bressia. And on a sodain he commanded Francisco Sforza, whom he then called from Flaminia to Milan with a few Horse to conferre with him about the Tuscan warre, speedily to march to the succour of his people who were besieged within the enclosure of Bressia. Other Authors say that Sforza Camp lay then in Lombardie, and not in Flaminia, where hauing notice of the losse of Bressia, he came with speed to meet Philip. But it is most certaine that all the Cadallerie which Philip had in Lombardie at that time, did not exceede two thousand Horse; with which and certaine other troupes leuied in haste, he marched against the Venetians. Others say that he had but foure hundred Horse.

The way was still open to the besieged, so as of themselves, before they receiued any supplies, they came from aboue and gaue the Camp many hot alarmes. It was thought thought at the first, that the Venetians hauing receiued some losse were desirous to leaue Bressia, and that they remained there till Sforza came thither with his cadallerie, who was commaunded by Philip to molest by all means the rebellious Bressians, and especially to keepe the Castle, if hee could not driue the Venetians thence, till such time as his forces were come from Tuscanie into Lombardy. But the Venetians Generall in the meane time, hauing made a strong Rampier, enuironed with a great ditch, opposite to the enemies Fort, dealt in such sort, as albeit at Sforza arrivall many sallies were made, yet neuertheless, they did not greatly terrifie them: and they fought likewise at times neere to the walles with different euent. But these skirmishes were light, and such as were vsually made vpon the like occasions.

Carmagnolla considering the enemies attempts not to be so terrible as he had in the beginning imagined: and that albeit Sforza presence, and courageous vigor, did make the enemy more bold and audacious, his furious sallies neuertheless began daily more and more to coole: hauing left the guard of the Rampier & trenches to Francisco Gonzaga, a braue and courageous person, he went and assailed the gates, called the Piles: Where he omitted nothing that was necessarie for such an assault and hauing approached with his engines of batterie, he would not suffer the enemy day nor night to be at rest.

But his watches and continuall trauaile, did renew in him a weaknesse and disease in the sinewes, which had in former time seized on him at Treviso by the fall of an horse, whereupon he was enforced to goe to the bathes at Padua.

It is reported that in his absence, all things were so carefully gouerned by Francisco Gonzaga, as the Generals presence was no whit lamented: For albeit in that meane time, the enemies made more sallies on the Venetians, than they were wont: he was so farre from being discouraged thereby, as on the contrarie he did brauely resist all their attempts, and did besides place Corps-du-guard without the Citie to surprize those who were accustomed till then to carrie victuals to the besieged.

At this stay stood the affaires of Bressia, whilst Philip by diuers messengers one after another, did call home his troupes forth of Tuscanie and Flaminia. The Senate by reason heereof were greatly troubled, how to hinder if it were possible their passage into Lombardie. For they feared if all Philips forces were assembled into one bodie, that in sted of taking the Castle and Rampiers of Bressia, the Venetians might be enforced to leaue the Citie, and fall into the hazard of receiuing some notable and vnlooked-for ouerthrow. In the meane time then that they were busied speedily to prevent so many of the enemies attempts, because they were faine to be alreadie on their way, the Venetians hauing no towne on the Po, nor neere to the Alpes, where they might resist them, they sent to Nicholas D'Este who commaunded great numbers of the associates troupes of horse, that breaking all the bridges and ferries on the Modenoi (where are the Appenine hilles and the riuer of Po,) that he should encampe neerer to the Marishes. They sent likewise Victor Barbaro a Venetian Gentleman with sixe thousand choise souldiers as well horse as foote, to hinder (if it might be) at Vignolles, which is the middle way betwixt the Alpes and the Po, the enemies passage. They did moreover by letters entreat Carmagnolla, who continued still at the Bathes of Abbana to retorne speedily to Bressia, for feare least in his absence the Commonwealth might receiue some losse. The which he did: and being returned to the campe, he did in such sort stay the enemies boldnesse, as they durst not onely make any more sallies, but they did suffer themselves to be braued and prouoked euen in their owne Fort.

In the meane time Philips forces came and encamped on the Bolognian territorie neere to Vignolles, there being a great deepe riuer betwixt them both. These great marishes doe emptie themselves neere to Creuacore, and doe make a riuer which runneth into the Po, which is in no sort foordable. The enemies hauing tried all possible meanes to passe it, were enforced to their great griefe to remaine on the bankes thereof thirtie daies. At the last hauing made a bridge at Percicere they did on May day by day-broke passe the riuer neere to Scultenna. The bridge was made in this manner. The enemies tooke twentie great Tunnes of one length and bignesse, binding them together verie streightly, and being made fast to trees on both sides the riuer, they laid vpon them great hurdles of Ozier twigs, which they couered with small shrubs and grauell, by which meanes they did easily passe ouer their cauallerie.

Hauing crossed the riuer, the enemies by their sodaine cries did so greatly amaze the Venetians who were incamped in the neighbour Forrest, as none durst present themselves on the riuers bankes. Mirandola and Concorda, two Cities neere thereunto, and trees which were heere and there cut downe, did afford a safe place of retreat to the Venetians. Guido Fabriciano being sent with a Squadron of horse to reinforce the troupes of Barbaro, arriving inconsiderately on the same side of the riuer which the enemy had passed, and thinking that the noise came from the Venetians campe, was cut in peeces with all his cauallerie. Some thought that Nicolaso à Eslo might easily haue stopp the enemies passage, but that he would not do it, for feare least the whole burthen of the warre should fall vpon his territories. And thus as if hee had not bene able to stop the enemy, he suffered him to passe on without any fight.

Certaine venetian troups are defeated by the armie of Philip.

Philip fearing in the meane time least the Florentines should seize on those places which he had taken in Flaminia, being disurnished of Garrisons, commanded that they should be deliuered as from him, into the hands of the Legate of Pope Martin, who was resident at the same time in Bologna. Two moneths were almost spent betwixt the ruolt of Brescia, and the returne of the Armie from Tuscanie. Whereupon it was plainly perceiued, that if it had come sooner, or if that forthwith after it was come they had fortified the Castle and other Rampiers, (as they might easily haue done) the Venetians would haue bene enforced to leaue the Citie.

Angelo Pergulan who brought backe the enemies troupes into Lombardie, being come within two mile neere to the Castle, did there encampe and fortifie the place, refusing on a battaile if the Venetians would hearken to it. Carmagnolla, (whose counsels and designs only tended to take the Castle) would not suffer them within the Citie to attempt any thing.

The Venetians in the meane time were not idle in so great danger, but forthwith made a new leuie of souldiers, and sent them in hast to Brescia, to assure their forces. The Florentines likewise with the other associates sent supplies thither with diuers Captaines, among whom was Nicolaso Tolentino, a man besides his great exploits in warre, most expert in the besieging of Cities. He hauing viewed the Venetians Fort with that of the enemies, told them that the Castle would not be taken, though they should besidge it neuer so long, vlesse by a Rampier and trench made round about it they did cut off the victuals which was brought thither, saying, that for the effecting thereof, it behoued them to haue great numbers of pioners and labourers speedily to end the worke. This being resolued on, great numbers of workemen were called thither, and the Rampier was made within three thousand paces of the Castle: whose forme was after this manner.

A double ditch was made euerie where of equall bignesse, with a rising in the midst of thirtie foot high, and by how much the two Dikes advanced forward, by so much more did the furthest points of the rising shew higher by the clods and turfes which were heaped one vpon another in forme of a wall. The Rampier followed after, being strengthened on all sides with many wooden towers verie neere one to another, so as in lesse than threecore paces foure towers were to be seene.

This Rampier had besides, twelve gates well fortified with strong towers, to issue forth vpon the enemy when need should require. Some say that the newes of this Fort newly begun being brought to Philip, one of his courtiers said presently, that the

the Duke ought to wish nothing so much, as that the Venetians would but continue such a work, wherein they would not only consume all their wealth, but as much as Xerxes was reported to haue had, before they should end it.

Pergulan in the meane time was not idle. For to diuert the enemy from his purpose, he entred furiously on the Mantuan Territorie, putting all to fier and sword; yet for all that he could not cause the Venetian to giue ouer his new worke. And not being able by any meanes to draw him thence, he brought his campe neere to the Fort, and fortified it on euerie side. But he could not be perswaded by Nicolaso Piccinino a great warrior, nor by Sforza, and other great Captaines of Philip's Armie, to giue in vpon the new imperfect fortifications, telling them often times that hee was satisfied by his incamping in that manner to please Philip, who had giuen him the honour of Generall; and to be assured of his intent.

The Fort in the meane time being defended, the Venetian Generall encamped betweene the enemies Fort, and the rising of the new-built Rampier, hauing in his Armie, (with the troupes of the associates) foureteene thousand horse, & ten thousand foot, & besides Carmagnolla the Generall diuers noble personages; namely, Giovanni Francisco Gonzaga, Lodouico Sanseuerino, Paulo uersini, Lodouico Vermio, and Lo renza Contemoli. And vnder Nicolaso Tolentino diuers ancient Captaines and olde Souldiers, who had a long time followed the war. The most part of the foot-men were placed in Garrison vpon the rising, and they were expressely commanded not to stirre from thence in any fort, not though they should perceiue the General with his troupes to be enuiromed on all sides by the enemy, and to craue their helpe, yea though they were sure to free him by their aide, but to keepe good guard, and carefully to looke to the Fort, that the Common-wealth by their carefulnesse might not receive any losse.

The number of the Venetians Armie.

The enemies campe consisted of twelve thousand horse and eight thousand foot, beside those foureteene hundred foote which Francisco Sforza had left within the Castle and Citadell, when, as at the arriual of Pergulan he came to his Campe. Foure great Captaines did command these foote companies that were left in the Castle and the Citadell, being denominated after the names of their natie Townes, the Bressan, Plaisantin, Bergamese, and the most noted of them all Andrew of Treviso.

The number of Philip's Armie.

Carmagnolla, in regard of the great number of men that he had, euermore found worke for those foure Captaines. Some times he reared ladders against the Walls, and then on a sodaine would make approaches with his engins of warre, being assured though it did no present good, yet at leastwise that shew of an assault would expose the enemies to the mercie of the Venetian Archers (of whom there were great numbers in the Campe) vntil that their number should be so diminished, as it would be afterwards an easie matter to ouercome them. This determined overthrow of the enemy did not deceiue him. For within a short space, more than a thousand of the enemies were either slaine or hurt by the Venetian Archers. But notwithstanding all that, the enemies seeing their Captaines to be alieue were no whit discouraged. The continual batterie had beaten downe a great part of the Wall, so as the ditch was almost filled with the ruines, and especially neere to the Gate called Gazette.

Now because there was some likelihood, that the Souldiers by taking some little paines might with ladders easily enter on that side; the assault being resolued on, the Magistrate of the Citie promised the Souldiers this reward, That he who first should mount the Wall should haue foure hundred Crownes; the second three hundred; the third two hundred; and a hundred to each of those ten who should second them; and tenne Crownes to each of twentie who should follow next after them. Both sides fought at this assault with such vehemencie and courage, as those who beheld them could hardly iudge, who defended best, either those who mounted the Wall, freely exposing themselves to danger, or the same number of the besieged.

ged. At last the enemies after great losse remained masters of their Walls, and were ready to endure as long a siege as the Venetian would, had not famine which overcommeth all things, afflicted, and enforced them to craue truce for tenne daies, conditionally if within that time they were relieved by Philip with sufficient aide, to defend the Fort, otherwise (that time being expired) to leaue that place to the Venetians, and depart thence with their Armes.

This Treatie being thus concluded, the Souldiers in the Rampier were commanded to keepe good guard, and to watch more carefully than before, to the end that no supply of men and victuals might from any place come to the besieged. In the meane time those of Philips Campe did fret with choller, and stuck not aloud to take the cowardize of their Commanders; saying that by their malice or baseness, the Castle was as well betrayed as Bressia was sold to the Venetians by her own Citizens: That there was no doubt, but if such an Armie as theirs was had at times giuen in vpon the enemies Fort, they might easily haue beaten downe the Rampire and the Mount, and haue raised the siege.

Pergulan made answer, That it was no reason in that manner to expose the Souldiers to their deaths against an Armed enemy, who kept himselfe locked vp in his Fort; that it was much better (for that present) that the Garrison should come forth of the Castle, safe and sound, and leaue the remnant to the enemy. That it might so fall out, that hauing receiued those supplies which they expected, they might assault them at their departure thence, and enforce them to fight, and requite them with some greater losse. Picinino thereupon being bold and sodaine, said, That it was ill aduised, to giue ouer a place of safety, and afterwards to fight for it in plaine field without any aduantage. But if there were any man which desired the good & commoditie of Duke Philip, or would bee held worthe of such an enterprize, hee should follow him vpon the enemy, and hauing so spoken, he departed on a sodain in a rage forth of the assembly, and as he went forth Francesco Sforza promised to follow him. But whilst he ordered his Souldiers to march against the Venetians, Sforza staid behind to perswade Pergulan and the rest to take Armes.

The Venetian Captaine, whose Souldiers were well instructed for such an enterprize: so soone as he perceived a bow-shot off the enemy comming towards him, opened the Gate, and commanded his Souldiers to set forward. Then Picinino perceiving that no man followed, made a stand, blaming the want of courage of his fellows, and without other fight returned to the Campe. Those in the Castle perceiving the retreat of their Countre-men, did abandon the Gates of Pilles and Garzette, and retired into the Citadell, where they willfully held out for certain daies after the time of truce was expired: but at the last being vanquished by famine, they did not giue ouer, but left that place to the Venetians.

The Souldiers comming to assaile the Castle, the Plaizantine presented himselfe with fiftie braue Souldiers. The Venetians in few daies space, did so batter the walls, as the vtermost in a manner fell into their Campe: whereof Philip hauing notice, he sent word to the Plaizantine and the rest, that (their liues being faued) they should leaue the place to the enemy. In this sort the Venetian entred the Castle seuen moneths after the taking of Bressia.

Carmagnolla being freed from the siege, and commanded to goe against the strong Cities and Townes thereabout, he receiued on their faith and homage the Salodians, with all the inhabitants of the Lake of La Garda, which lieth towards the Bressian Countre, before euer he tooke Armes against them. Soone after at the arrival of the Popes Nuncio, they began to talke of Peace; & Ambassadors from each side were sent to this end to Ferrara, where the assemblie was held: which was concluded on these conditions; That Philip should friendly quit to the Venetians, besides the vale Commonica, Bressia with her confines, together with that part of Cremona-Territorie, which is contingent to the Riuer of Olío in the Bressian, being 40000 paces in length; and That the Duke of Sauoy should keepe all that he had taken.

Peace between Philip and the Venetians.

The articles being thus agreed vpon on either side, and sealed with the scale of Philip and the rest, the Nuncio for the better assurance of them would needes carrie them to Milan, where finding Philip (who complained of the wrong that was done him, accusing sometime the pride of the Florentines, who had throwne him headlong into this Warre, and then the Venetians courtoisnesse, who not being satisfied with taking Bressia from him, did likewise seize on a part of the Cremonois,) he had much to doe by faire speeches and exhortations, to cause him to condescend to that which had beene agreed vpon: Which the Nuncio hauing at last obtained, so soone as he perceived the Venetian Commissioners, (who were come thither according to the Articles to receiue the Townes) to bee despiightfully vsed in his presence, he returned to Rome and left the businesse vnaccomplished.

Some thought then that this sodaine change did proceede from the hope he had to make an atonement with the Duke of Sauoy; and others thinke that the entreaties and exhortations of those of Milan were the cause thereof, who so soone as they had heard of the conditions of peace, came to him in the name of the commonwealth, and spake in this manner.

Philip his complaints to the Popes Nuncio.

The Venetian Commissioners: dealt with at Milan.

The Oration of the Milanois to Philip.

Our subiects of Milan (most excellent Prince) come to you to obey your commandments: and there is nothing how grieuous soeuer to be borne (so as it be profitable for your greatnesse) which doth not seeme light and sweet to them. For we are all of this minde, that if euer heretofore we haue beene readie, to doe you all service which a good Prince can expect of a most obedient Citie, we are certainly much more readie now at this present: and we may freely speake it with so much more affection, as we haue scene you in this wretched time most to distrust our forces and means, or else to be ignorant of them, when for one iniurie receiued in hurt from the Venetians, you are so mightily discouraged, and transported beyond your selfe, as you haue shamefully giuen ouer to the courtois enemy, that which the hazard of warre had not yet taken from you. For what else meane you by giuing ouer to the Venetians all the strong Townes of the Countrey of Bressia, and a great part of the Cremona-Territorie, with the shore of the Riuer Oglio, but only to present the Citie of Cremona to the vsurper of Bressia? Is it not a meane more to animate this audacious enemy, who hath along time aspired to the entire Dominion of Lombardie? and to embolden him to enterprize greater matters? For if your affaires were so desperate (which God forbid) that you were of necessitie to giue place to the enemy, and to grant him all, we would then consent with you to attribute it to fortune and to time. But seeing you haue a mightie Armie, with which the enemy being often prouoked durst neuer fight, what may we else thinke hath moued you to embrace so dishonest a peace, but only your feare that you haue not sufficient meane to entertaine so great an Armie? But you haue wealth enough as well of the publike as of your particular Subiects of Milan, of whom when you please you may freely dispose. You haue besides a very great and rich reuenue, sufficient to entertaine not only those troupes which you haue at this present, but others greater than they, if neede require. Make vse then of your subiects meane which lie open to you, and doe not suffer the Venetian vnder colour of libertie, to come and subugate the Milanois with the residue of Lombardie which doth obey you, but rather trie how we stand affected to your State, and to that great libertie which your Dominion promiseth vs. For we are ready in respect of that not only to expose our goods, but our liues likewise where neede shall be.

Philip gaue them a very gentle answer in few wordes, laying the whole blame of the Warre on the Florentines, and the Venetians, who by their ouer-weening and treacherie had forcibly drawne him into this Warre. But because hee was of necessitie either to obserue the contract or to renew the Warre, as they counsailed him, he told them that he was desirous to know in what sort they could assist him:

Philip answered to those of Milan.

willing them to depart, and to conferre with the people about it, to the end that hee might bee assured on what ground hee might againe vndertake so great a Warre.

The Milanois offer to Philip.
The matter was debated in a generall assembly of the Citizens, who concluded to giue the Duke this answer, That if he would suffer the Milanois to gather the Cities reuennue, they would furnish him while the Warre continued in Lombardie, with ten thousand Horse, and as many Foot.

It was thought that Philip would haue granted it, had it not bene for one of his Courtiers who knowing this Prince to be naturally fearefull and suspitious, withheld him to consider what he did: For, to permit Citizens to gather the reuennues of Cities, was nothing else but to reare them ladders whercon to mount to libertie: That without all doubt it was a most dangerous matter for him, making warre on two free Common-wealths, and both of them very mightie, to giue his subjects any hope of libertie, which of all men is chiefly to be desired.

Philip reuengeth the Warre with the Venetians.
Philip lent a willing eare to this aduertizement. And being resolu'd not to accept those conditions which should be propounded to him, nor yet openly to refuse them, because he would not by a scornfull answer displease his Citizens, hee sent word to those who were appointed to come to him, to report to Giovanni Riccio what offer they had to say to himselfe. This did by little and little coole the former affection of the Milanois, and being thus cooled, the business remained vnperfect. But Philip hoping by art and subtiltie to draw from them that summe so liberally offered, if they would not giue it gratis, renew'd the Warre; first of all prohibiting to yeeld vp those strong Townes lately promised by the treatie, and soone after making a furious entrie on the Mantuan Territorie.

The Venetians aduertized by letters from the Popes Nuncio, that Philip wholly tended to Warre, being thereby iustly incensed, they renewed the warre with greater furie than before. But because whilst the treatie of peace lasted, they had dismissed a great part of their troupes, they forth with made new leuiues from all places: And when they vnderstood that the enemye made incursions on the Mantuan; the Senate forthwith decreed to renew the warre with all speede. First, they renewed their alliance with the Florentines; who (albeit they were tired with warre, and desired nothing so much as peace) did neuertheless by a generall consent take armes. Amadeo Duke of Sauoy who in the precedent warre did in a manner no memorable matter, vnder promise of doing better hereafter entred into the league. The Marquis of Montferrat, and Orlando Paluicin, who then possessed diuers Townes in Lombardie, would needes be registred in that new alliance. The like did the Bandetti of Genoa, promising to molest the enemies on the Sea-coast, who being forsaken by King Alonso were vnable of themselves to doe any thing at Sea.

Philip, albeit he perceiued so many to take Armes against him at one time, was no whit discouraged; neither did he shew himselfe slow in assembling his forces, and providing all things necessary for the war: And because he would make a shew of the greatnesse of his forces, he resolved to assaile the enemye in three severall places at once: For, hauing armed certaine vessells at Cremona, hee seized on Urri- coles, a Castle on the Parmelan, seated at the mouth of the Tarro: which the Venetians had for a time possessed. Likewise presuming on the great numbers of his Infanterie, he made incursions on the mountaines of the Breslan Territorie, and at the same instant hee foraged the plaines with his Cauallerie, vnder the conduct of Pergulan. The third and most fortunate exploit was against the Bandetti of Genoa, vnder the command of Francisco Sforza. Thomaso Fregosa (who being followed with great troupes of banished Genoueses, and with the Florentine succours, had in times past so disturbed Genoa, as he durst at times assaile the Citie) being aduertized of Sforza's comming, had commanded his brother, a couragious yong man, to tarrie for the enemye with part of his troupes at the entrie of the Valley of the Swine.

The Florentine forces in the meane space hauing receiued no pay from Florence of long time, began by little to drop away, and hauing neither victuals nor command, they left their ensignes so bare and vnfurnished of men, as Fregosa could number but eight hundred in his Camp. The which being by spies reported in the Citie, presuming on Sforza's his comming, who was said not to be farre off, the Citizens made a sodaine sallie vpon Fregosa's troupes, which at the first they defeated. Thomaso and Baptista his brother with certaine others escaped to Recchia; the residue were taken, and their Camp stuffed with great wealth was taken and spoiled. And thus by Sforza's his arriuall, as if a more fortunate Starre had shined on the Genoueses, their affaires till then wholly ruined by warre begunne againe to prosper. Pergulan, on the other side, placed Garrisons in the most commodious places of the Breslan, whilst Picinino with his troupes drew neare the Riuier Po: who hauing caused the nauall Armie to come to Casal-Major, a Citie of the Cremonois, hee besieged it by Land and Water, and enforced it to yeeld. Then, crossing the Riuier he seized on the Citie of Brissoles on the Po, by treacherie: But the Castle could not be wonne.

In this fort the enemye beganne the Warre. But the Venetians slept not in the meane time: For they likewise sent forth a mightie nauall Armie whereof Francisco Bembo was Generall. Now vpon the report that it was gone vp the Riuier Po, as far as the Mantuan Territorie: Eustace of Paui, Captaine of the Enemies nauall Armie determined to leaue the Camp at Brissoles, and to oppose himselfe against the Venetians who were not farre off. Picinino was of a contrarie opinion, and would haue the siege to be continued. The Captaines being diuided by this diuersitie of opinions, the siege of the Castle of Brissoles went forward more slowly; by means whereof those who were sent from Brescia to relieue it, did enter into it without any impeachment.

Those of Brissoles presuming on this supply, and on the comming of the Venetians nauall Armie, did recouer the Towne, and expelled the enemy, who left many warlike engines and instruments of batterie behinde him. Certaine troupes were speedily sent from Brissoles against Eustace, who was incamped a little beneath Casal; but in the meane time he was come within foure miles of Cremona. Bembo hauing there ouer-taken him, did on a sodaine embattaile his Souldiers. The Gallions on both sides were neare to one another: so doe they terme these Vessells, being like to those which the Greekes call Dromons. This kinde of Vessell is long, the belly thereof being nothing like to a ships bosome, but in a manner all flat, couered sometimes with two or three floores of planks: at the toppe of the mast there is a place made where ten or moe Souldiers, if neede be, may fight. When one of these lieth at an Anchor ready for fight, it resembleth a well-rampierd Fort.

Bembo placed eight of these vessells fast ioyned together in the foremost ranks, and commanded the residue of the Fleet closely to follow them. The enemye did not refuse the fight, but embattailing his Armie, he placed foure Gallions in Front; who were forcibly carried by the tide and strength of Oares vpon the enemye. But being come before one another, the enemye passed on beyond the Venetians, and turned his prowes on the Venetians Poores; thinking that being followed by his Vessells, the Venetians finding themselves to be assailed on their backs, those which were in the foremost ranks would be easily defeated: But it fell out otherwise. For Bembo presently accounted those who had passed on beyond him for lost, and brought his ships into a round compasse, so as in a manner hee filled the whole current of the streame, to the end that with more courage and lesse difficultie, he might assaile those which had passed by. Picinino stood with his troupes on the Riuier banks, who not being able to helpe his fellowes by armes, did by his tongue encourage them in the heate of the fight. The battaile was for a time doubtfull. At the last the victorious Venetian tooke foure Gallions from the enemy, besides those which we said were shut in at the beginning.

Euflace then thought too late perceived himselfe nothing equall neither in strength nor dexteritie to the Venetians. whereupon perceiuing the enimie builed in defeating those whom he had enuironed, on a sodaine he turned the Prowes of the residue of his fleet, and went a pace towards Cremona: where being arriued, and fearing that which came to passe, to wit, That the Venetians would soone followe, he disturnished all his ships. Those who at the first were inclosed, perceiuing the flight of their fellows, made towards the Land, and leaping on shoare, forooke their vessells. Bembo seizing on them, pursued the enimie, whome he could not ouertake. Being come neere to Cremona he was enforced to fight after a new manner.

Philip neere to that place had caused three Castles to be made in the midst of the Riuier, which did in such sort shut vp the channell of the Po, as he verily imagined that no nauall Armie, how mightie soeuer, could come to besiege the Citie, or passe on farther into Lumbardie. Two of them were opposite to the Citie and builded on Piles which appeared aboue the water and the bankes. The third was builded in the midst of the water of a more grosse substance with so small a space on both sides, as no ship could passe either on the right hand or left without being greatly molested with arrow-shot. Bembo resolved to assaile that which was farthest from the Citie, and with easie took it: Then comming to the other which was neerer to it, hee became likewise master thereof with like facilitie: but the assault of the last was more painefull, because the Souldiours which were in it had more hope to be relieved, by reason they were neerer to the Citie: but the Venetian assailing it by night, and by that meanes with more labour, did take it by force.

ners defeated by

Bembo being victorious caused these Castles to be burned, and the Piles where on they were builded to be pluckt vp, fearing least the enemies should seize on them, and make the like vse of them. But the Venetian abusing his victorie larded part of his Souldiers and Mariners in that small space of ground which lieth betwixt Cremona and the Po, nor hauing sent before to discover the place: whereupon Christoforo Lauellano Gouvernour of the Citie, making a sodaine sallie vpon them, did put them in great feare. All his Sailers were in a manner Histrrians and Dalmatians, who being well whited with Wine doe apprehend no danger whatsoever: Lauellanos troupes comming vpon these men, did in a moment kill three hundred of them.

A skirmish neere to Cremona where the venetians had the worst.

Bembo being angrie at the Pilots for landing them without his knowledge, took them in againe, & commanded the fleet to row vp against the streame, & hauing taken the Fort, which was on the verie point of the Riuers Po and Adda, he went vp against the streame of the Riuier Thesina, and came to an Ankor neere to Paui. This Citie was in times past called Ticina in regard of the riuier Thesina which is neere to it. But finding that place to be desert and abandoned, fearing some ambushe, he returned towards Cremona. The General being arriued there was desirous to reuenge his late losse, and landed diuers of his souldiours, hoping if he were but to fight onely with Lauellanos Souldiours, he might be recompenced for the same: But about the same time Nicolas Guerrieri was come to the Citie with a troupe of horse, which being mingled with Lauellanos troupes, would haue more rudely entertained the Venetian than before, had not Bembo who at the first perceived diuers of his Souldiers to droppe downe, caused the retreat to be founded in time.

This happened on the water. But on the Land, Sommer drawing on, and the troupes which the Venetian had then leuiued being readie on the Mantuan, Carmagnola being departed from Padua, hauing from Lanzifia to Salles crossed the Lake of Benac, was come within fiew miles of Bressia, at such time as Alberico Count of Cunies, and Petrino of Dortonne, surnamed the Turke, leaving Ottoleng (where they lay in Garrison eight miles distant from Bressia) came and made a sodaine incursion euen to the verie gates, and did greatly amaze the Bressians, and carried away foure hundred victuallers prisoners who were taken in the Suburbs, when as Pietro Lauretano Gouvernour of Bressia hauing intelligence of the enemies being there, sallied forth of the Citie on horse-backe vnarmed at Saint Azazeres gate, where finding many without order who would willingly haue gone forth, he did sharply rebuke them, & would not suffer it, nvtill Panlo Vrsino who was within the Citie was armed, vnto whom hauing giuen three hundred horse next at hand he willed him to lead them by a shorter way towards Ottoleng, and that in the mid-way he should ambush himselfe, and presently the residue of the Cauallerie to the enimie, with expresse commaundement still to amuse them going forward by light skirmishes vnto the verie place of the ambuscado, where they were commanded on euerie side brauely to charge them, that none might escape. This proiect fell out luckily; For the enimie falling into the ambush was hardly delt with, and Petrino with a hundred and fiftie horse were taken prisoners, the residue were put to route.

The verie same day, Carmagnola entred Bressia, who was much discontented that the first exploit was executed by any but himselfe; And hauing assembled whatsoeuer was needfull for the warres, captaines and Souldiours being sent for from all places, the Venetians General departed from Bressia on the fiftenth day of March with fouretene thousand horse and six thousand foot, and incamped first at Monteclaro where hee tarried till his other Troupes were arriued with his warlike engins & instruments of batterie. Certaine daies being spent rather in expecting his own forces than in besieging the Town, which was strong in situation and well fortified, Carmagnola thinking it but lost time to besiege it, raised his Campe and marched directly towards Ottoleng.

A thousand horse of Duke Philips were within it: The Venetian being in great hope to take both them and the Citie, came and encamped with great noise neere to the walles: But not long before Guido Tarsello, Christoforo Lauretano, and Nicolas Guerrieri were come thither with their Cauallerie: These men without any noise kept themselves a while enclosed in the Citie, that they might more commodiously make a sallie vpon the enimie. The Venetians being come before the Citie, most of them wearied with the extreame heate lay downe on the ground disarmed, others fell a sleepe, expecting nothing lesse than the enemies sallie. Some of Nani his troupes whome the Marquis of Ferrara according to the conuention had sent to the Campe with foure hundred horse, kept the guard: vpon these men, to-wards the euening Philips horse-troupes gaue a furious on-set: Strossi did brauely sustaine their assaults: but being too oblitinate in defending that place, and being oppressed by the great number of the enemies and his owne Souldiours he fell downe dead. But the alarme being giuen ouer all the Campe; some being halfe a sleepe, and others vncertaine vnder what Enignes or Captaines to place themselves, & diuers running inconsiderately vpon the enimie with their Armes were ignominiously defeated: and this amazement continued vntill Carmagnola being followed by a braue troupe of Souldiours marched forward with the Ensignes. For then, the Venetians numbers encreasing at the sound of the Trumpets and Drummes, the enemies in a manner triumphant and victorious retired into the Citie, with the losse of fiftene hundred horse. The Venetian General would not stirre from thence till the troupes not long before leuiued at Padua were come to the Campe. Blondus makes mention hereof, who (as it is reported) was the same time in Bressia, and perhaps in the Campe.

But wee reade in the commentaries of Mariot Montano who was present in all these exploits, that they fought the same day with equall fortune, and that the Venetians sustained no greater losse in that fight, than of a few who by reason of the extreame heate were smothered in their Armour. Carmagnola euer after encamped after another manner. For hauing two thousand Pioners in his Campe to make plain the wayes for the munition Waggon and engins, and to digge Trenches and Rampiers, he diuided them into bands, and to euerie band appointed a Capitaine to command it, who should make sure the dislodging of the Campe, and the carriage of the engines of war. And he commanded them besides that so soone as the Camp should be set, to place all their carriages in forme of a Crescent or halfe Moon, which should in manner of a Rampier enclose the Camp, to the end it might serue in sted of a strong Fort, against the enemies sallies and incursions.

Determining till to encampe in this manner, he departed thence, and albeit he left behinde him diuers Townes and Fortes of the Bressian country which were possessed by Philips souldiers, he resolved neuertheless, because he would not spend much time in surprizing them, roundly to besiege Cremona, imagining that the taking of so famous a Citie, would excite the rest without further fight to submit to the Venetians.

The River of Oglio which diuideth the Cremonois from the Bressian and Mantuan, hath two bridges well fortified, the one more high and neere to the mountaines of the Bergamuse, and the other at the bottome of the plaine called Bina. The Venetian with great furie assailed this, as being lesse, and therefore more easie, to the end that from thence he might haue free passage from the Mantuan territorie to his campe if he should chance to passe the river. The neighbourhood of the Po did likewise moue him thereunto: By which he might with lesse labour and danger haue all things brought to him which was needfull for a siege. Having in foure daies taken it, hee marched with his forces into the enemies countrey, and came and encamped within seven miles of Cremona along the river of Po.

Philips having notice of the enemies great numbers, (for the Venetians Armie was of eightene thousand horse, and eight thousand footmen, sixe thousand of the associates souldiers, not accounting the souldiers boyes, landresses, & other troupes of followers of the campe: besides, the nauall Armie conducted by Bembo, was not farre from thence, amounting to more than two thousand men) was astonished at their great attempts, and began to feare & doubt his owne estate. Therefore leauing his former wilfulness, he called for the Citizens of Milan (whereunto he could neuer before be induced) and told them that the time was now come for to know who were his truest friends, and who till then had dissembled: That it was not needfull in so dangerous a time to vse many words to acquaint them with his meaning: That all those who did mean to preferue their goods, should goe along with him to helpe to quench that fire, and that he did not wish them all in generall to go with him, but such as were fit for the wars: He caused the same to be published by a trumpet through the whole Citie, and then departing from Milan, he marched towards the enemy.

Great numbers of the Milanois, and those of Pavia followed him to the warres. He encamped betwixt Cremona and the enemies, within three miles of the Venetian: He had before then in his Armie twelue thousand horse, and halfe as many footmen, and he brought with him as well of his friends and associates as of others, fiftene thousand horse and foote: so as both the Armies were reported to haue thirtie thousand men apiece at one selfe same time. The which was scarcely euer seene before; That since the declining of the Romane Empire, two Italians to haue had two such mightie Armies readie to fight one with another. The presence of Philips had greatly animated his souldiers to enterprize some great exploit, so that they craued nothing more than to fight, they wholly desired it and with loud voice did cheerfully beg it. Then being embattelled they marched courageously against the enemy. The Venetian was at the same time encamped at Suma, and his campe was not fortified with trenches nor Rampiers, but enuironed onely with wagons, and with a river which diuided the plaine: the enemy hauing no way to come at him but by a bridge distant three Stadij from his campe.

The enemy coming to that place made a stand, expecting that the Venetian in regard of his great numbers would fight beyond the bridge. But the Venetian attended him in order of battaile, on the plaine neere to his campe, determining to ioyne if the enemy came forward. Pergulan and Taurello counseled him not to passe the bridges but the bold counsell of Sforza and diuers others was followed, who were of opinion to march directly against the enemy. These being commanded to march before, and the fight already begunne, all the rest followed in order to the battaile, a few excepted who staid behind for the guard of the bridge, to the end that thereby the retreat to their Campe might be assured: They fought from noone till night, running with such furie and vehemencie one vpon another, as on a sodaine there arose a great dust like to a blacke clowde which did in a manner blinde them, by meanes whereof they did inconsiderately throw themselves into danger: Eyes were to small purpose in that darkenesse, they onely knew one another by their voices: the fight was doubtfull, and the adventures of the combataunts vncertaine. Euerie one might iustly boaste in fighting to haue come euen to the enemies Ensignes, or to haue performed that day some generous exploit. Somesay that diuers of Philips Armie thinking in that confusion to retire to their fellows who kept the bridge, did neuer perceiue that they were in the enemies Campe, till they came to the waggon: at the last, the retreat being sounded both sides retired without any aduantage.

Carmagnolla was wont to say that he had taken that day more of his own souldiers than of his enemies, and that the enemy might sundrie times haue taken him if he had bene knowne. The same likewise hapned to Sforza, Picinino and diuers other noble men. Philips being glad for that which had bene done in his presence, and imagining that he had wonne the victorie, because he had not lost the battaile, being speedily called home by sundrie messengers, because the caualerie of the Dukes of Sauoy and Montferrat entering by Vercelles on the Milanois made incursions euen to the gates of Milan: he forth with departed, hauing dismissed those forces which he brought with him, whom he willed (if they so pleased) to goe home to their houses.

The Venetian perceiuing Cremona to be strongly manned (for excepting those troupes whom Philips had dismissed, the residue of the Armie after the battaile was retired thither) imagining that a Citie so well fortified would not easily be forced, came and encamped at Casal Major. (for so is it called) Bembo with the nauall Armie came thither likewise soon after. Francisco Sforza with a braue troupe of souldiers pursued Carmagnolla in his march, but perceiuing his Armie to be so well guarded and circled in on all sides, and being loth to attempt any thing rashly for feare of ambushes, he went backe againe, and without any difficultie recovered Bries, where he threw those whom he found in Garrison there into the Riuer, because the Venetians not long before had done as much to their souldiers.

Casal for a time was in vaine besieged by the Venetian by land and water, by reason of the strong Garrison that lay in it. Antonio Pisani a valiant Capitaine was Governour there: who day and night keeping good guard on the Rampier with foure hundred braue souldiers, did by his prouidence frustrate all the enemies attempts. The Citie was enuironed with good Rampiers and banks which defended it from the engines of batterie. But it is reported that there was a tower neere to the gate of Po, the which being battered with greatest violence did wholly in a manner fall downe into the vitermost ditches. The Venetians hauing by sundrie assaults attempted to enter in at that place, and the Garrison of the Citie being repulsed with great slaughter, the inhabitants stubbornnesse being daunted, they were received by them vnknewne to Pisani.

The Venetians Generall being proud of this victorie did determine to make a bridge over the Riuer of Adda, to the end to send his troupes to spoile and rauage the Milanois. But hee wanted vittuals, and it behoued him to provide for that. And therefore he encamped still at Casal, till all necessaries were brought him from the neighbour Townes.

Philips in the meane time perceiuing his Captaines to bee diuided among themselves, euerie one thinking himselfe equall both in valour and reputation with the best, best, and by that meanes refusing to giue place to one another either in counsell or authoritie, in regard whereof there was some likelihood that his affaires might receiue some notable losse if it were not speedily remedied, hee made Carolo Malateste General of his whole Arme. It is thought that in this choice of General he had not so much respect to the valour of the man, as to his wisdom and Nobilitie in blood. Some say that hee did it, because that euer since Pandolfo his gouernment, hee had bene greatly beloued of the Bresians; and that hee did hope by his meanes the Citie would reuolt from the Venetians. The Venetian in this meane time was gone from Casal. And Carolo hauing accepted the charge was not idle, but leading his Arme through by-waies hee did opportunely frustrate the enemies designs.

At the last, the Venetian came and encamped before Macodia, (called by the vulgar Macale) a Citie of the Cremonois. Philipps Captaine and his whole Arme did hardly digest the enemies boldnesse, and did greatly blame their owne patience and their Generalls, saying, that there were many Cities in the Cremonois and Bergamese besides lett by the enemy which they might with more safetie besiege, and yet neuertheless hee had encamped before Macale, as if the taking of that Towne would much auail him; but that hee did it in his owne and their disgrace: and therefore if he desired to purchase the reputation of true General of an Arme he should doe well to take from himselfe and them who vnder him fought for Philip that shame and reproch. At the first this was spoken secretly among a few, afterwards publickly ouer the whole Campe. Sforza and Picinino desired a battaile: Pergulan and Tauarello contradicted it, saying that they were to deale with an enemy, who might more easily bee vanquished by temporizing than by fight: That a battaile was that which the Venetian General demanded: That they were most assured that the same day as Philipps forces (who were lesse in number and good fortune to the Venetians) should fight with them, Philipps affaires would altogether receiue some notable losse. Carolo did heare them, but hee fixed his eyes on Sforza and Picinino whom hee was wont publickly to call his Heftors: Hee did besides willingly giue care to the residue of the Arme, who craued that they might come to 30 battaile.

It is reported that those two who more courageously than the rest were of opinion to fight, being requested by Carolo to deliuer their opinions whether it were necessarie to assaile the enemy, made this answer. That hee among many other was giuen vnto them for their Commaunder, and that it was his Office and not theirs, to commaund what hee would haue to be done. And that if of himselfe he knew not what was fittest, he should doe well to follow the aduice of others: For as concerning themselves they were both ready to march in what rancke he should please either in the first or last, because no man doth euer undertake great and difficult matters, so much at the perill of another man as at his owne.

Carolo at last confidended to a battaile, and commanded Tauarello and Pergulan with strong supplies to remaine for the guard of the Camp, Lanceliano and Sforza to fight in the first ranks, and Picinino to follow the Ensignes with the residue of the troupes. But Pergulan and Tauarello, thinking they had great wrong to be placed out of the danger of the battaile, because they had been of opinion not to fight with the enemy, did runne to the foremost ranks, and spake aloud, that they would with all their power repulse that mischief and losse which by their counsell they could not diuert. Carolo granted it, and by changing the ranks, commanded Picinino to stand ready with the succours, and hee first marched against the enemy with the troupes of light Horse, as hee had determined in the beginning. Hee commanded Tauarello to follow him in the fore-ward, and Sforza and Pergulan to come after, and so the residue in order. The way was plaine, though somewhat crooked, from Pompiano, from whence the Philippians came, euen to the Venetians camp, without any hedge or ditch, because in Winter all those places are Wet and Mould, and in Sommer

Sommer full of Thornes and Shrubs; and neare therunto is a goodly fruitfull plaine on which to march, because on the fore-part thereof the marishes are neuer drie: the hearbs and grasse in diuers places being drie in Sommer, it made a way both drie and beaten, but the paths were very crooked, and the Venetian had fortified some of them with deepe Trenches, and others with shallow Dikes. Tauarello hauing viewed these places in part fortified, and partly abandoned, turning towards Sforza and the rest, he cried out aloud, and said, that God was Almighty, but that no man could diuert the ouerthrow which did that day threaten Philip and his Captaine.

So soone as the Venetian General perceived the enemies to approach, hee commanded Tollentino to goe with two thousand Horse to the marsh which lieth neare to Terentiana, and to returne afterward to assaile the enemies on their backs, whilest they should bee busied in the fight: Then hee placed great troupes of footmen on both sides the waies in the marishes, and himselfe with the residue of the Arme marched furiously in front against the enemy. Carolo at the very first had bene enuironed and defeated, for that hee had inconsiderately sent his light Horse before, and a great part of his Footmen, had not Tauarello, Sforza, and some others with the Ensignes, forthwith come to his aide, who after they had repulsed the enemies forces, made the fight in that place equal. Then there beganne on either side a cruell bickering: But the Footmen who were hidden by the way in the bushes & shrubs, 20 did in short space with their darts and arrowes make a great slaughter of Horse. Tauarello who at the first did follow Carolo to the fight, being assailed on euery side, made a retreat, and escaped on the other side of the marishes: In the meane time in the rereward a great shout was made (for Tollentino was come thither): Pergulan retired forth of the battaile, perceiving that all was lost: Sforza followed him with his troupes in a manner whole. But Picinino being enforced to fight in front, in Flanke, and behinde, had much to doe to get forth of the midst of the presse; but at the last by the valour of his Souldiers he escaped to a place of safetie: Then they beganne openly to flie, and great slaughter was made euery where. Carolo was taken, and with him eight thousand Horse and Foote, as many of the one as of the 30 other. Some say that sixe thousand Footmen were taken, and three thousand Horse. All the baggage of the Arme fell into the Victors hands, where they found great quantitie of gold and siluer, and much rich stuffe.

It is thought that Carmagnolla had at the same time meanes to haue driuen Philip from his state, if hee had kept the prisoners, and had forthwith after the battaile marched against the enemy, but he knew not how to make vse of this victorie, or rather would not doe it. Being returned to the Camp the night following hee set all the prisoners at libertie, not being intreated so to doe, which did purchase him the ill will of the Venetians: Some thought that it was the chiefe cause of his death. Three hundred more being brought vnto him the morrow after, whom hee had 40 not seene the night before, he gaue them leaue to depart likewise, saying aloud that therein hee followed the ancient custome of the Warres.

Vpon report of the losse of the battaile, all the Townes and Forts of the Bresian did freely yeeld to the Venetians, excepting that of the new Orge, which being besieged by the Venetian was in few daies taken by force: But whilest this siege lasted, Philip made hast to renew his Arme, and in short time made great leuies of armour and horse, in regard the Commanders, and the most part of the Arme were escaped. There were at the same time two Artificers in Milan who did undertake in short space to arme as many thousands of men, as were reported to haue bene taken in that battaile.

50 Sforza and Picinino were not in the meane time idle; For ioyning with those that escaped, they surprized the Venetians viduals, and did greatly trouble the forragers, and those which went to the enemies Camp. Picinino did moreouer attempt by night to recouer Pontoglio; but it was in vaine. Captaine Bressan a very famous Gentleman died at this enterprize, being surprized by the Townes-men.

Although Philip perceived his affairs to be reduced to great extremity, yet nevertheless he did not omit all possible means to stop the Venetians, pursuing the course of their victory. He sent to the Emperour Sigismund (unto whom hee had in former times bene as great an enemy as to the Venetians) to entreat his aide, and that he would send Brunora of Escalla with an Armie into Italic against the Venetians. He did afterwards practise with Amadeo Duke of Sauoy, with whom (having quitted Verfeill unto him) he did not only make a league, but entered into his affinity, taking his Daughter to Wife, whom he neuer touched after the first night. He did moreover entreat Pope Martin to vse all means to disvite the Florentines from the Venetians. But the more he went about by these means to raise himselfe, the more did contrarie fortune deject him, by the death of diuers of his best Captaines. Angelo Pergulano died within a while after, who was followed by Fabrizio Campana, and diuers other notable persons who died one after another. At the last Visconte being afflicted with this latter losse, consented to peace.

This businessse was for a time debated at Ferrara in the presence of the Popes Legat, where peace was granted on these conditions: That the Venetians should haue Brescia, with all the Bressian and Bergamese Territories, and that part of the Bergamese which stretcheth towards the River Adice, together with all the Castles which they then held vpon the Cremonese. The Florentines had little or nothing given to them, but only this, that it might bee lawfull for them to fixe their owne Ensignes vpon their Gallies, in regard that before then, by an accord made with the Genoueses, they were wont to vse those of the Pisians. Those of Ferrara, Mantua, Paluicin, Montferat, and those of Sienna likewise, at the entreatie of the Florentines their associates were freed together with those Countries vpon the River of Genoa, which lay towards the Leuant. But the Malspini, the Fregozas and the Fiesci, very Noble families of Genoa could not obtaine leaue of Philip to returne home to their houses, notwithstanding that the Florentines did earnestly sue in their behalf, yet nevertheless he promised to reckon them in the number of his friends. Carmagnolla received his wife and children, and Palace, which he had most sumptuously built at Milan before his banishment.

The Venetians are put to the worst in the Camonian Valley. And lastly peace is concluded with PHILIP.

Peace was not alone in Lombardie, but (which had not bene scene of a long time) ouer all Italic, at what time the rebellion of those of Bologna against Pope Martin did disturbe this rest: and within a while after warre was renewed betwixt the Venetians and Philip. And the better to vnderstand the occasion thereof, we must fetch the matter from farre.

Peace being concluded with Visconte, the confines of that part of the Cremonese which had bene adjudged to the Venetians were cause of continuall controuersie betwixt them, and of procuring that warre which ensued. For although the Marquise of Este was at the beginning chosen Vmpier for both sides, the same nevertheless was some cause of renewing the warre. Besides, the next Sommer after the peace, Philip made fierce warre vpon the Fiesci and Fregozas which were banished from Genoa, whome during the treatie of peace hee would not comprehend in the Florentines Articles, but had promised to hold them in the number of his friends. He tooke from them diuers Townes and Castles, first by meanes of the Genoueses, and afterwards by Piccinino, whome he sent against them with a mightie Armie. But these matters, which were not small, were neuertheless too weake to renew this warre all at once.

Another farre greater subiect, which was neuer dreamt on, ministred a lawfull occasion to take Armes. Paul of Luca of the Guenejian Familie, had for the space of thirtie years usurped as a Tyrant the Signorie and Government of Luca his native Countrie, and did in the meane time lo Gourne the Cities important affaires in his owne name, as in the middelt of so manie stormes of warre which did at that time thunder vpon Italie, he could neuer be drawne to take Armes nor to incline to any side. This had greatly offended the Florentines, for that they could neuer in their aduersitie draw any aide from him, as from their neighbour. VVherevpon all men both in generall and particular did hate the Guenejian name and enuied his prosperitie. Therefore, peace being made with Philip, the chiefe of the Citeducified by what meanes they might intangle him in some affaires of importance. They wanted not iust matter whereby to make warre vpon him. For Leclaus his sonne being in the Florentines pay, was gone from them without their leaue: knowing very well that they would not haue suffered him to haue serued against Pope Martin in the troubles of Bologna. But the people of Florence being tired with warre, would by no means heare any talke of Armes.

The principall of the Citie who detested the Tyrants power, seeing they could not be suffered to raise open warre, would help themselves by a secret meanes. To this end, they wonne privately to their side Nicholao, surnamed Stella, Nephew to that great Capitaine Braccio, who being a young man was in the Florentines pay, that he giuing ouer his charge, should openly say, that hee would (as his vncle had done) beare Armes for himselfe; and that afterwards hee should attempt vpon the Lucan Territories, telling him what claime he might pretend thereto: to wit That it was knowne ouer al Tuscanie that Guenejo was in times past tributarie to Braccio, and that by right of succession he might demand that tribute of the Tyrant which he had paid vnto no man since his death.

This young man being so daime and resolute, did not refuse the businesse. Wherevpon hauing openly giuen ouer his charge he did in a short space assemble two thousand men, and remained for a while vpon the Florentines Frontiers, as though he made preparations for a farre iourne. By reason of which assemblie the Sienois were in greater feare than those of Luca. This expeditious Capitaine disamping about twilight, the next morning by breake of day fell fiercely vpon the Lucan Territories, where finding all things to be abandoned, hee carried away with him great numbers of prisoners, and much Cattell. Hee continued two dayes incamped vpon the plaine of Luca: in which time he wasted and burnt whatsoeuer hee met with. From thence going to besiege the Townes, hee tooke from the Guenejian within a few dayes eight Castles, of which hee razed those that hee tooke by force, and perserued the rest which voluntarily yielded.

Many vpon report of this newe warre ranne to his Armie on hope of bootie. The tyrant and those of Luca being amazed at this sodaine incursion, and not knowing at first whence this tempest came, were fearefull of all things. But when they vnderstood who was the Capitaine, and how that it was a practise of the Florentines: hauing recommended the guerd of the Citie to the young Guenejian, they first sent to Florence to complaine of that iniurie as proceeding from them. The Florentines being ignorant of the matter did confidently repell that slander. But those of Luca sent to Venice to complaine vnto them of their Confederates, and at the last to Philip and to the Sienois, earnestly entreating them for reliefe in their affliction.

The Florentines in the meane time, perceiving that the exploits of yong Braccio did daily prosper: thinking that it might shortly come to passe, that by hauing a hand hand in that warre they might annexe the Citie of Luca to their State, which was oppressed with so many miseries, did by a publick decree write to Nicholao his camp, (who already of himselfe was no more able to beare the burthen of so great an Armie,) That he should continue the persuite of that warre in the Florentines name; that they were ready to furnish him with men, victuals, supplies, and monie, and generally with all necessities for the warre; that his only care should be to goe forward as he had begun and to end that warre, whereby he should purchase the peoples loue, and immortall praise; saying, That the Florentines would provide for all the rest. Those of Sienna on the other side, fearing if their neighbours should subingate Luca, this storme would afterwards fall vpon their libertie, sent to entreate the Venetians to diuert the Florentines their common associates from that war by some great menaces; if by other meanes they could not effect it. But it hapned by chance that at the same time as the Ambassadors of Sienna came to Venice: for that purpose, the sacred Sovereigne Magistrate of the Citie was by the follic of a Citizen highly outraged.

Andrea Contarini, issued from a verie noble and ancient familie, being by a disease become (in a mannery Lunaticke) fued for the office of Admirall of the Adriaticke Sea. It came to passe, that after it had bene denied him in the generall assembly, he was in the companie of certaine yong men; who jesting with him, laid the cause of that denial on the Prince, telling him he should neuer be preferred so long as Foscarini lived. This man being heereupon prouoked with rage and griefe, (two mightie spurs) became so vnmeasurably and inordinately furious, as he went and assailed the Prince, as he was comming downe the staires to Diuine Service in S. Marks Church. But the better to effect his purpose, hee made shew as if he would haue spoken with him in secret; wherevpon such as were neere him gaue place; that he might speake to him with the more priuacie: Thus hauing gotten opportunitie, he drew forth a poniard that he had hidden vnder his gowne, and had (without all doubt) slain the old man; if one of the Ambassadors from Sienna, who was verie neere him, had not laid hold on his Armie, and turned aside the blow, which strook him on the face, neere to the nose. The Senators and the Princes Officers did presently encampasse the wounded Prince, and the Traitor; they defended the one, and haled the other to execution, who made meanes to escape. His right hand was cut off in the same place, which being tyed about his neck, he was hanged on the highest top of the Palace; or (according to some Authors) betwixt the two Columnes. The Republick being troubled with so strange an accident, did in hast answer the Ambassadors, That the Venetians did desire to maintaine & defend the Sienois libertie; but that it belonged not to them to meddle with the controuerlie betwixt those of Sienna and the Florentines their associates. And with this answer the Ambassadors were dismissed. The Florentines in the meane time did hardly presse those of Luca, which at the last caused Guenejo, and the Sienois, to sue vnto Philip and to the Genoueses.

Philip, vsing the same policie as did the Florentines, perswaded Francisco Sforza; that asking him leaue; he should leaue the greatest forces he could, and march into Tuscany to the aide of those of Luca. Wherevpon Sforza being valiant and courteous of honor, did forthwith passe the Alpes, and speedily brought a great Armie to Luca. Vpon his arriual, Stella retired to the confines of Pisa, because he would not be enforced to fight at one time neere to the Citie Walls with Sforza's forces, & with the *Guenejian*s, being induced thereunto by his winkles example; whom he remembered to haue bene defeated in the same manner at the siege of Aquileia. Hereof hee therefore drew the warre out at length, vntill that Sforza's Armie should be enforced through want of all things to abandon the Lucan Territories. For, they being gone, hee determined to continue the siege so long, till he had constrained the Tyrant, or (in despite of him) the inhabitants to yield.

Sforza hauing razed the Fortes, which the enemies had builded neere to the Citie-gates, entered the Towne in a triumphant manner, where, (being received by Gueneſio with a reciprocal congratulation), he made no long aboad; but went into the Territorie of Pistoia, wherein a short space he tooke diuers places by force. Gueneſio considering with himselfe what the euent of that warre would be, supposing that the aide he then made vs of, would not continue long with him, & though they should remaine with him for a long time, yet neuerthelesse they did not seeme vnto him to be able wholly to keepe him from that warre, and that therefore it might happen that whether he would or no, he should one day be enforced to yield: And likewise because he knew, that with far greater aduantage, he might treat of peace whilst his affaires were in perfection, than afterwards, he began secretly to deale with the Florentines. But hauing acquainted his familiar friends and seruants with the whole matter, Sforza was forthwith aduertised of his negotiation: by those vnto whom hee had discouered himselfe. Whereupon Sforza, by the commandement of Philip, vnto whom he had written concerning that buisinesse, did suddenly seize vpon the Tyrants person and children, and sent them to Milan; and all his rich mouables he gaue to his Souldiers. Now hauing by this meanes restored those of Luca to their libertie, he left a strong and mightie Garrison with them for their guard. The Townes-men at his departure, gaue him manie rich and costly presents. The Florentines likewise furnished him with victuals for his journey, and presented him with thirtie thousand crownes, for that he had procured their peace.

*Picinino commeth to the aide
of the Luquos.*

The affaires of Tuscanie being thus pacified, and Sforza being growne great both in wealth & reputation (two sure ladders to ascend to greatness) he departed with his troups forth of Tuscanie, and came into Lombardie. After his departure the Florentines came againe and besieged Luca. Philip to free them from that danger, making vs almost of the former manner, sent Richelard Picinino in the name of the Genoueses, (into whose protection those of Luca were reported to haue cast themselves) to breake the Florentines deligens. He came with great forces and rumour into Tuscanie.

summons to Philip.*

The Venetians hauing notice of Picinino's iourne against the Florentines, although at the first they could not be perswaded to take Armes for the war of Luca, yet neuerthelesse being moued by the danger which threatned their associates, they sent to Philip, to let him know that they did greatly wonder, how that the Genoueses, who were vnder the power of an other man, were able to raise so great an Armie against the Florentines, for it was apparant to all men, that Picinino, and Lauellano, who went with him into Tuscanie, had of a long time beene pensioners to Philip, and not to the Genoueses; and therefore that he should doe wel, in all points to obserue the agreement, and not to wrong the associates of the one partie; or if he were determined to aide the Luquos by meanes of the Genoueses, he should not take it in euill part, if the Venetians likewise did afterwards aide the Florentines their associates with their forces. And for the rest it was at his owne choice whether he would obserue the peace or no which he had sworne with the Venetians: As for themselves, they promised to obserue the accord so long as they should perceiue the affaires of their associates not to be disturbed by Philip or by any other: which they perceiuing other wise to fall out, did with him to desist from any more troubling their associates; otherwise he should be assured that if he did continue in molesting the Florentines, that the Venetians in their defence were already prepared for war.

*The Florentines

Although the Ambassadors brought back from him no certaine resolution vpon this summons, the Senate neuerthelesse thought it not fit to take Armes vpon a so dauidine. Picinino in the meane time defeated the Florentines neere to the riuer Arno. This being reported at Venice, they decreed no longer to delay, but to beginne the warre. Whereupon they sought to draw Francisco Sforza to their partie, who after his returne from Luca had still made his aboad in Mirandola. The Florentines likewise made meanes to haue him, vnto whom he most inclined in regard of their friendship towards his Father. But so soone as Philip had an incking thereof, the better to oblige that courageous young man to himselfe by some stricter bond, he promised him his only daughter Bianca in marriage, putting him in hope, that if he had afterwards no male childe, to make him his succellour in all his Dominions.

We haue read in the Commentaries of Mortuanus, That Philip for feare of losing Sforza, because he saw Picinino his carnall to be preferred before him, and to haue the command of his Armie, did put him in hope of this affinitie and alliance by marriage. Pope Martins death did for a time delay this warre to the which both sides were well addicted. Both the one and other thought it verie necessarrie before they tooke Armes to see who should be the next Pope. Gabriels Camaldario a Venetian was chosen in the place of the deceased, and assumed to himselfe the name of Eugenius. Although this man did at the beginning of his Papacie acquaint all Princes and Common-wealths by his Ambassadors, that he would doe nothing rashly, saying, That he would be vmpier of their controuerlies, and in friendly manner establish peace betwixt them, Philip neuerthelesse suspected him in regard of his Countrie. And therefore he did not cease first secretly, and afterwards by open meanes, to practise whatsoeuer he could against him. And thus molesting him in all matters, at the last he entangled him with a domestick warre in Rome by meanes of the Colonnese.

proclaime warre

Whereupon the Venetians perceiuing Philip, in sted of acknowledging the Pope, openly to make warre vpon him, after that they had in the fourth moneth of Eugenius Papacie renewed the league with the Florentines, they proclaimed warre against him. They did moreover relieue the Marquis of Montferrat with monie, and the Palauicins, whom they receiued into this new league. Besides, they set forth a great nauall Armie, which went vp against the streame of the Riuer Po to oppugne the enemie. Carmagnola in the meane time lay with his forces at the new Orges, ready to march at the first rumour of this warre. Philip sent Tolentino and Francisco Sforza against him with gallant troups. Hee likewise put into Cremona, vpon which all men thought that the whole burthen of the warre would fall, Lodouico Colonna with braue Souldiers; and opposed Lauellano, who was well accompanied, to the Prince of Mountferrat that had small forces.

Whilst these things were done in Italie, certaine sparkes of a verie dangerous warre (which the Venetians had within a while after by Sea and Land against Asbomet Ottoman the mightie Turkill Emperour) appeared at Thessalonica a Citie of Macedonia. This Towne which in former times was verie famous, is seated on the Thermaic Sea, but in our time fo desert, as tenne thousand Barbarians did easily force it. It did belong to the Venetians, and was gouerned by Giacoemo Dandulo and Andrea Donato, who seeking to escape forth of the midst of the tumult, Dandulo was taken by the enemies. At the same time two sorts of monies were coined in the Citie; that of most value was worth eight souls, and the lesser, two. There was likewise a Bridge built of white stone neere to the Church of the Fryers Minors. It is moreover recorded, That the waters round about the Citie were so frozen; as men went drie-foote from the Citie to Tourcelles, Malamoc, and (that which is more strange) to Chioggia. It is reported that a bride was brought from Melstire to Venice in a waggon, the which before that time was neuer seene; that waggons did passe vpon those waters which are betwixt the Citie and the firme Land.

The Florentines after the losse of the bataille in Tuscanie neere to the riuer Arno, would againe haue attempted by reason of Picinino's absence, to besiege Luca (for after the bataille, he had retired himselfe towards Pontremolle to force certaine places belonging to the Fiesi neere to the Alpes) had not Bartholomæo Fornari Capitaine of five Genoa-gallies, and two ships of burthen, come and encamped before Liurone. Whereupon fearing least by reason thereof the Pisans would revolt, they were constrained to send part of their forces in Garrison into the Citie. VVithin a while after Picinino returned, who with a wonderfull speed had in a manner reduced all the towns belonging to the Pisans vnder his power. The Florentins after that they had lost all the rest, fearing least the victorious enimie would seize on Pifa, did make a verie cruell decree, That all the inhabitants from the age of fifteene yerres to thre-score should depart forth of the Citie, before that a candle lighted vp for that purpose should be burnt out, and by that meanes did vrburthen the Citie which they suspected of a great number of inhabitants.

The enimie leaving the Pisan territorie marched to that of Volterra, which journey was as prosperous to him as that of Pifa. For hauing taken all places of the country, Volterra likewise would haue bene mightily endangered, if Michaeli Attendulo sent by Pope Eugenius to aide the Florentins had not by his opportune comming freed it. These things were done in Tuscane, whilst that Philip was greatly troubled, because that Carmagnolla lay at the new Orges with his troupes in a readinesse, hauing bene there a long time; and fearing least that he would beginne as in the precedent warres by some vnlooked-for reprisall, he began heedfully to looke to his affaires, that the enimie might not enterprize vpon him, by some secret practise: VVherefore after diligent search made, he discovered that they within the Castle of Lodes had promised to giue him entrance: VVhereupon hauing speedily smothered that treacherie, he was desirous to trie if he could take the enimie in his owne trappe. He did secretly counsell the Governour of the Castle of Socinna to promise the Venetian Generall, that for a certaine summe of money, he would deliuer vnto him the Castle, Munition and garrison. The Generall did not refuse this offer, for which he promised him a great summe of money, and had a day appointed him when he should bring his troupes thither. Philip being aduertized heereof, commanded Sforza and Tollentino to march thither verie secretly with part of their forces, to seize on all the waies, and to lay an Ambuscado for Carmagnolla to surprize him and his forces if it were possible.

Carmagnolla failed not at the day appointed, and hauing sent before him certaine troupes to seize on the place, he made a stand neere to the towne with the residue of his forces. Those which were sent before, being receiued into a corner of the Castle were at the enemies mercie, when on a sodaine the Governour of the place cried out with a loud voice, calling diuers times to Carmagnolla, saying; That he was no traitor to Philip but a beguiler of his enemies. And thereupon Sforza and Tollentino arising forth of their ambush, and assailing the Venetians on euerie side, did greatly terrifie them. Carmagnolla then perceiued that he was taken in his owne subtilties, and presently turning his backe, fled in disorder as fast as he could. The report was, that hauing lost more than a thousand horse, he escaped by meanes of Tollentino.

VVithin a while after, the Venetians being rather detained than encamped vpon the Cremonese, did fearelesse runne vp and downe: Lodouico Colonna (who as we haue said was sent to guard the Citie) went and assailed them being disorderly scattered vpon the riuers bankes, where he brake and defeated them with forces farre inferior to theirs in number, and tooke three hundred horse from them. But I finde nothing recorded by Historians, concerning this second defeat. During these exploits in Lombardie, Tuscane was much afflicted with warre, and especially the Florentines, who had Picinino still at their elbowed. For hauing a long time made incursions on the Volterran territorie, he marched towards that of Arezzo, where by intelligence he had like to haue taken the Citie. But being disappointed of his expectation, he began to batter Townes and Castles of which he tooke manie; some by force, and others by voluntarie yielding. At this stay stood the state of of the affaires of these two Prouinces, when Tollentino disdaining that Duke Philip should make more reckoning of Francisco Sforza, and Picinino than of him, hauing to the one promised his alliance, and to the other committed the sole command of his Armie, and thereby as it were held him in contempt, did leave Philip partie, and retired with a gallant troupe of his own followers into Flaminia. The Venetians and Florentines fought to draw him to their parties, offering him the sole command of the Armie if he would come into Lombardie. But matters being delayed, he went from Flaminia to the Popes seruice, against the Colonnese neere to Rome. Philip was enforced by Tollentines departure, to call backe Picinino iuro Lombardie.

The Venetians in the meane time, although they well knew that they had renewed that warre with bad successe, did neuertheless leaue forces, and made great prouisions of victuals and Armour, and besides their land-forces, they made readie a mightie nauall Armie, to send it vp the riuier towards Cremona, wherein was ten thousand fighting men besides the Marriners and Pilots. Nicolas Trevisano was made Generall, and in euerie vessell a Venetian Gentleman commaunded. There was besides great store of warlik engines of all sorts, as many almost as there were men. Carmagnolla likewise was encamped neere to the towne with twelue thousand horse, and as many foot. Philip had prepared a nauall Armie vpon the Thesin, which in number of vessels, souldiers, and in all other prouisions was inferior to the Venetians, but for the valour of the Generall, and skill of the Pilots, it did not surpasse it, it did at leastwise equall it. Giovanni Grimaldi the Genouese was Generall, a man among his countrymen the most famous and expert in marine matters of any of his time, of whose choosing Philip manned the vessels with Pilots, and the best Archers of Genoa. Picinino likewise being returned from Tuscane had greatly augmented the land-Armie. But by how much his presence did further the affaires of Philip in Lombardie, by so much more did his absence cause them to decline in Tuscane. For soone after his departure, Alberto Earle of Cunes, vnto whom he had committed the charge of those troupes that he left in Tuscane, falling into an ambuscado neere to the towne of Colle lost aboute a thousand horse, whereupon he was suspected to haue done it willingly, for that he had a meaning before to turne to the enemies partie.

But whilst these things were done in Tuscane, all the burthen of the warre in Lombardie lay neere to Cremona, where the enemies were much weaker both by land and water than the Venetians. VVhereupon Picinino and Sforza perceiuing, that if to their weaknesse they did not ioine some policie, they should not be able in both places to resist the Venetian, they did by wit and discretion supplie the want of force. And therefore they made often incursions into the enemies trenches, as though they had contemned them; and not remembering their nauall Armie, which by how much neerer it approached comming vp the stream, by so much more fiercely did they prouoke both the one and other campe. But in the night they did secretly conferre with Grimaldi, discoursing by what meanes they might giue bataille vpon the riuier Po: And resoluing betwixt themselves by what policie they might obtaine the victorie, the audacious Genouese hauing from farre descried the Venetian vessels which kept the watch, did forthwith set forward against them; thereby to cause them to returne to tell Trevisano of their approach, and by the way he came before the walles of Cremona, where full of hope and courage he tooke Picinino and all his men at Armes into his ships, which were equally distributed among the vessels: Then he fell downe softly with the streame towards the enimie. So soone as they that were in the ships tops had descried him, the alarme was sounded. The Venetian who craued nothing more, did speedily command that by strength of oares they should draw neere to the enemies vessels, to the end they might come to handie strokes, the which Picinino was so farre off from refusing, as on the contrary, he did fiercely set forward before the rest with a part of the vessels. dering at first at the enemies boldnesse, so soone as he perceived their vessells to glitter with armour did suspect the truth of the matter, how that he was to fight with the Land-Armie, and presently sent message vpon message to Carmagnola to let him know that Picnino and Sforza were at strokes with him together with their whole troups, and therefore he entreated him, if he did with the good of the Commonwealth, to come speedily to his aide.

It is reported vpon this arriuall of the messengers one after another Carmagnola who was by nature cholerick grew extreame angrie, and with a loud voiced idabhorre and condemne the Venetians fault, who rejecting his counsell would not distribute that great summe of monie to the land Armie, laying that he could not believe that which they reported to bee true, but that their Generall being affrighted at the shadow of an armed man did dreame that he had seen Gyants in the enemies shippes. The battaile in the meane time rested doubtfull, and already about sun-set foure Gallies of the Venetians which the enemies drew to them by hookes did fight neare at hand, not as before with arrow-thor and warlike Engines, but hand to hand with sharpe swords and axes made for that purpose. At the last these foure Gallies being lost about the beginning of the night, the other Venetian ships which had fought with the enemy, retired to the haven from whence they came. Picnino having carried away with him the vessells that hee had taken, and caused Sforza to come into the shippes with a companie of men at Armes, commaunded Grimaldi againe to set forward against the enemy about the fourth watch of the night. The Generall of the Venetian Naue had intelligence thereof; and because he was out of hope of the aide of the land-Armie, by so much the more speedily and carefully he had ordered his forces in battaile. So soone then as daie began to breake the two Nauall Armies desfered one another, and the battaile was on both sides demanded with great clamours. The Venetian had, (like to a battaile on Land) closed his ships together, as if he had ment to haue giuen in vpon them, supposing, that by the continuall casting of Engines, hee should be able to hinder the enemies approach who in numbers of men were stronger than he: which being perceived by Philips Captaines, they presently commaunded their Marriners by force of oares to draw neare to them, that notwithstanding all danger they might cometo handie strokes: This being speedily executed, and with equal courage hauing from both sides throwne iron hookes and cordes to grapple together, there was a fierce fight, whereof not any man that was there did remember to haue euer scene the like. Stones, Darts, Pots of artificiall fire lighted from both sides on the Souldiers that were on heapes together; they thrust burning torches in one anothers faces, they slew one another with swords, poniards, axes; sundrie kindes of death being presented to their view. Then the ancient maner of Sea-fight betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses, did equally torment both parties. They did from the ships tops throw downe vpon the enemies, earthen pots full of oile and glaw, which breaking with the fall made the ships so slipperie as no man could stand vpon them; and therewithall baskets full of vnslakte lime to dazell their sight. The Venetians from the beginning had the worst, as well by reason of the fresh supplies that the enemies had taken into their vessells the same night, as for that they were better armed than the Venetians. The experience hereof together with the remembrance of the former dayes losse, had daunted the courage of Trenisiano and the rest, who perceiving fortune to fauour the enemies, and remembring that he had there with him a great summe of monie belonging to the Commonwealth, he went forth of his Admirall Gallie into a small vessell, and with the monie made hast away. Hee being gone, the residue of the Armie, trembling with feare began to flie. The enemy still keeping neare them, did breake and put them to rout. Five Gallies only, and no more, of so great a number escaped, who speedily commaing vpon the confines of the Palauicini, and being not wel entertained there went to the mouth of Po; all the rest were taken by the enemy. It is reported that two thousand men of both parties parties were slaine vpon the place; fixe thousand Venetians were taken; among whome were thirteene Senatours; and that of the whole bootie that was taken nothing was so welcome to Philip, as the vessells: the biggest whereof hee caused to be drawne vp against the streame into the Riuer T helin, and the tackling of the others that were disarmed to bee laid vp in the Castle of Cremona.

This losse, which vndoubtedly was very great, was followed by the revolt of Palauicini, and Carmagnola his dismission from his charge; who knowing that he had committed a fault would no more through his owne obstinacie meddle therein; so as it was reported, that with despight and choller, he was brought to such despaire, as the Senate by their Ambassadors had much to doe to comfort him. As for their partes, this losse was so farre off from discouraging them, as on the contrarie being readie to repell all assaults of fortune, they resolved to assaile the Genoueses in their owne Hauens, because they had conducted Philips Nauall Armie which had vanquished them vpon the Riuer. They Armed eigheteene Gallies with Souldiours, Armes, victuals, Marriners, and made Pietro Lauretano their Generall, who was a man well experienced in marine matters. He being come with his Fleet sooner than was expected, forth of the higher Sea into the lower, arriued at Liurne: where being reinforced with five Florentine Gallies, hee did honourably receiue for associates in that warre Giacomo Adorini, and Antonio Fiesca, who at that time were banished from Genoa. The Familie of the Adorini is one of the noblest among the people, out of the which the Genoueses did for a long time choose their Soueraigne Magistrate. And the Fiesca haue cuer held a very honourable rancke among the Nobilitie. It was supposed at the beginning, that the presence of those great persons accompanied with a mightie Nauall Armie of a free people would haue prouoked the Genoueses to haue recouered their libertie, to haue expelled Philips Officers, and with great affection to haue embraced their fellow-Citizens. But the Genoueses vpon report of the Venetians commaing had armed foure and twentie Gallies, among which was one ship of burthen. Franciso Spinola was by Philips appointment made their Generall, a man besides his ancient nobilitie verie famous for his valour.

The Venetian Fleet in the meane time was come vpon the Rappallitan Sea ten miles from Genoa: It laie there at an anchor, when Spinola hauing intelligence thereof did in such hast depart from the Citie, as some vessells that were of his number could not ouertake him all that day. The Genouese set forward full of courage and assurance, occasioned by the remembrance of the late victorie obtained by his Countriemen vpon the Po. Being by day-broke come to the Promontorie of Rappalla (called at this day the Cape of the mount) perceiving the enemy before him he commaunded his Souldiers to make all things fit, and to prepare for the fight. Then without any delay, making vse of a faire wind, hee hoised sailes, and hauing giuen the Signall to his Souldiers hee went against the Venetians intending to sinke the first Gallies he met with. Lauretano perceived Spinolas deligne, and as though he had not ment to fight, did speedily put forth of the Gulph, whome the Genoueses followed (as though he had fled) with great clamours. But the Venetian being come to a place where by turning his face vpon the enemy he might haue a fore-wind, he commaunded his Marriners sodainly to turne the prowes vpon the enemy, who perceiving him to returne to the fight, did brauely receiue him, and commaing to handie strokes there began a bloudie battaile betwixt them. Great numbers of arrows flying from both sides, in front and in flanke, did kill many of both fleets. And by this time three Venetian Gallies were neerely pressed by the Genoueses who had from the beginning of the fight encompassed them, which Spinola perceiving, and supposing that with small aide he might easily sinke them, by strength of oares and the force of the tide he made speedily towards them: where his Gallie striking a long Florentine ship vpon the broad side, had like to haue bene sunke. But whilst the Marriners were buied in clearing of her, the enemy fell on a sodaine vpon vpon her prow, so that in one Gallie the Genouefes fought in the poope, and the enemy in the prow. Both of them fought with such fiercenesse, as the working of the sea which was somewhat swelled, had like to haue swallowed them both. The Venetians in the meane time had with yron hookes drawne eight Genoa-gallies vnto them, who brauely defending themselves, so soone as they perceived theyr Generall to be in danger, did yeelde to Lauretano. The others being well beaten, escaped by flight, whome the Venetians being wearied with fight did not pursue.

The victorious fleet came neere to the Towne of Reca which did voluntarily yeeld to Fiesca: From thence it returned to Liurone, where they found that eight hundred men had bene slaine in the battaile, and about foure thousand hurt. Lauretano, hauing first sent Spinola Generall of the enemies fleet with eight Captaines of the Gallies, and three of his Councillors taken in that encounter, first to Florence, and then to Venice, he did put to Sea, and comming to Ciuitavecchia, did at the entreatie of Pope Eugenius tarrie there, vntill he had taken the Castle which commandeth the Hauen. That within a short space being recovered, he departed thence, and hauing coasted round about Italie, he landed at Corfu.

Fiesca and Adorini are treacherously slaine.

Fiesca and Adorini, after Lauretanos departure, going from Pisa to Florence there to spend the time till Lauretanos returne, were treacherously assaulted by one Buffetto of Paula, who valliantly defending themselves because they would not fall into their enemies hands, and being sore wounded fell downe dead in the place. These things hapned along the coast of the lower Sea. But in Lumbardie, Philip, after the victorie vpon the Po, hoping for some greater fortune came to Cremona, to congratulate with his Souldiours for that victorie. The Venetian Armie was then at Summa, a place neere the Po, whither Philips Captaines, determining to fight if the enemies so pleased, did march in Battalion. The Venetians Generall did not refuse the fight; whereupon, both sides with great furie comming to ioyn, they fought with such eagrenesse, as there was no Souldiours either on foot or horse (which doth not vially happen) but did that day fight. In the end, fortune inclining no more to the one side than the other, the retreat was on both sides founded. The other exploits of the remainder of the year were of no great moment, except that of the fifteenth of October; when as by the valor of Canaledonibus (who held a verie honorable rancke in the Venetian Campe) Cremona had like to haue bene taken.

An enterprize of the venetians vpon Cremona.

This man about mid-night had without any noyse stolen with his troups neere to the Citie, where hiding themselves in the hedges and bushes which shadowed the Dike he lay a great while, vntill that the Sunne being risen and the Sentinels retired, he perceived the walles to be abandoned. For then his Souldiours hauing reared their Ladders did forthwith mount the walles, placing a strong Garrison to guard them. Carmagnolla with a braue troupe was come within three miles of the Towne, and had sent certaine foot companies before, who being opportunely arriued, diuers of them ascended the walles by the same Ladders that were already reared, and they marching into the Citie, surprised the Corps-de-guard and seized on the next Gate; by which the others entring did easily sustaine the attempts of the Inhabitants, who ranne to the alarme. If Carmagnolla had sent his supplies, Cremona had bene taken; but failing therein, and pretending that the enemy had laid an ambush to entrappe him, those which had entred the Towne, hauing lost many of their fellows, retired to their ensignes. Some saie that the Venetians held that place which they had taken two whole daies together: And others (whome I rather beleue) eight houres onely. This opportunite of taking the Citie being thus lost, the Venetian Generall (for winter was already come, and then the great raine that had fallen in Autumne, had made both the weather and the waies verie bad) did lead his Armie to their wintering Stations.

Vpon the coast of Genoa, after Lauretanos departure the affaires had no great good successe. For after the defeate of the Genouefes vpon the Rapallian Sea, Ber-

nabo Adorini with three hundred horse, which the Marquis of Montferrat had giuen him, had caused all the coast of Genoa in a manner to reuolt, on the lands side. Piccinino being sent to pacifie these tumults hauing defeated Adorini and all his Cauallerie at Nouara, there was no kind of crueltie which he did not execute vpon the poore Inhabitants. For besides great numbers that were slaine in two battailes, hee did by the Hang-man execute all those whome the hazard of warre had pardoned. Afterwards being glutted with blood, he set to sale to them that offered most yong children, Matrons and reuerent Priests. Then he marched against the Prince of Montferrat, from whome in a short space he had taken thirtie Castles.

Piccinino defeated Bernabo Adorini.

The Generall Lauretano being come to Corfu, had acquainted the Senate with his need of supplies, together with the want his Gallies had of trimming, which were halfe broken in the last battaile. He could not speedily obtaine his desire in regard of another Naue which the Senate had a while before sent to take the Isle of Chios belonging to the Genouefes. His fleet consisted of ten ships of burthen and foureene Gallies, with diuers other small vessells vnder the conduct of Andrea Mocenigo; who arriuing in the Island with the fleet, did by Sea and Land besiege the principall Citie of that place, of the same name. And after that he had battered it on all sides with engins and warlike instruments by the space of two months, yet he could not take it, being manned with a verie strong Garison. In the meane time there was a great rumour spread that great number of vessells were arming at Genoa. Whereupon Mocenigo (hauing lost many men in that siege) perceiving that hee must needs raise his Campe: and being out of hope to take the Towne ere succours arriued, did in a rage and despite spoile the residue of the Island by cutting downe the Vines and Fruit-trees. Hee departed thence before any supplies came from Genoa.

The venetian fleet before Chios.

The enemy hauing intelligence that the Venetians had dislodged; certaine Gallies and some fewe ships of burthen sailed thither to continue there the remainder of the winter. The Summer following Pietro Spinola went thither with a greater fleet of foureene ships of burthen, seauen Gallies, and eight thousand fighting men.

Supplies come from Genoa to Chios.

The Venetians vpon the first newes of this fleet of the enemies, did likewise augment theirs which lay at Corfu to the number of thirtie three vessells, to resist the attempts of the Genouefes. Lauretano departed thence, and with wonderfull speed came whilst the enemy coasted Sicily, to Liurone; from whence the Genouefes not long before departed. Spinola being come sooner to Corfu than he was lookt for did mightily affright those of the Island who had notas yet finished their fortifications. Therefore the Senate in all hast did by letters aduertize Lauretano of the danger wherein Corfu was, if speedie aide were not sent thither. He hauing notice thereof, sent sixe of his best Gallies thither, to which the Senate hauing ioyned four more, did make Siluestro Morosino their Generall, who was commanded to follow the Genouefes whither soeuer they went, and to defend the Sea-coasts together with the Gulph.

Siluestro Morosino is sent to the aid of Corfu.

Whilst these things were done at Sea, Piccinino hauing wasted all the Marquisat of Montferrat, returned to the Cremonese, where in short space he recovered Torricelles & Bordelan, whereat all men did greatly wonder, in regard that Carmagnolla with his troups was not farre from thence. The Senate being mightily incensed thereat, did at last reuiue that which a long time before it had propounded. Many had suspected him from the beginning, who did openly crie out in the Senate, that the suspicion which they had conceived of the man was so farre off from being smothered, as on the contrary it was much increased and daily augmented, acknowledging nothing in him, but the name of Generall, which was not an enemy to the Venetians. Others were of opinion not to haue him called in question as culpable, vntill that the presumptions of his trecherie were approued. The Aduocates and Procurators Fiscall required to haue him committed to prison, and if after hee had had been tortured hee should be found convicted of treason, to haue him punished with death. His determination which was of long continuance, did manifest the Venetians faithfull and secret constancie in the managing of their publique counsells and affaires. For the Senate which is composed of sundry orders of officers, being assembled for this purpose, the Senators came in the evening by torch light into the pallace, and departed thence the next morrow by day-breake, still consulting vpon that busines. Carmagnola was at the same time in Venice, who coming in the morning to salute the Prince as hee came from the pallace, asked him with a smiling countenance, whether he should bid him good night or good morrow, in regard he had not gone to bed that night. The Prince answered smiling, that the Senate being assembled about important matters, had in that nocturnall counsell often mentioned him: Then on a sodaine he changed his discourse for feare lest he should suspect any thing. Eight moneths were spent from the time of this consultation till the day of his execution, during which time the matter was kept so secret, as Carmagnola neuer suspected any thing, although diuers of the counsell were his familiar friends, and some of them very poore, so as both the one and other might haue drawne from him what summe of money they had pleased, by discouering vnto him that which had beene concluded against him.

About the same time (for they had already begunne to treat of peace with Philip) being sent for by the Senators letters, hee came to Venice, where coming forth of his Gondola, diuers gentlemen, according to the manner, went to receive him, and after sundry reciprocal embracements, they conducted him to the pallace, although they were not ignorant of that which was concluded against him. There being imprisoned, and put to the torture, hee was convicted by his owne letters, which he could not deny, and by the testimony of his domestick seruants: wherupon, on the 19. day after his imprisonment, his head was stricken off betwixt the two Columns, and his goods were confiscate to the publique treasure. The chiefe points of his accusation were, his refusal to relieue Treuisano, and the losse of Cremona by his disloyall delay. Before his execution, and at the same time that hee was sent for to Venice, the prince of Mantua was sent to the army in Lombardy, and Giorgio Cornari and Marco Dandolo were chosen Prouidatori.

Piccinno in the meane time being puffed vp with the fortunate successe of his exploits, did very earnestly pursue his victories begunne in the time of Carmagnola. And if he had not bin grievously wounded at the siege of Pontoglio, so that the phisitions held him for a dead man, or else likely to languish for a long time, he would in a short space haue recovered whatsoever the Venetians did then possesse on the Cremonese. The newes of this hurt, was cause that the Marquis of Montferrat, being wholly driuen from his late by Piccinno, was in some sort better entertained. The Marquis, so soone as he saw his forces to be broken, passed the Alpes, and went through the Treuisan into Germany, and from thence returning to Treuiso, he made meanes to the Venetians as to his friends and associates, where hee was entertained by the Senators with such magnificent bountie, as during his abode there, he was neuer desirous (as he afterward said) to returne home into his country, nor yet to recover his state.

In the meane time *Philip*s affaires declining in Lombardie had no better successe in Tuscanie. For Tollentino being dismissed by the Pope, and soon after entertained by the Florentines, did make fierce incursions vpon the territorie of the Sienois, and with great violence did waste all the sea coasts. Afterwards ioyning with Attendulo whom he knew to be giuen him for companion, hauing taken certaine townes from the Sienois, he did in short space recover all the townes which the enemy enioyed vpon the Pisan territorie. At the last, ioyning battell with *Philip*s forces neare to mount Tepulo, he put them to rout, and tooke Bernardino Vbalino prisoner, with three thousand horse. Others say that he tooke but a thousand.

The same day of the fight neare to mount Tepulo, Sigismund, sonne to Charles King

King of Boheme and Hungarie, who at the earnest entreatie of Philip was come into Italie with foure thousand horse, did enter Luca. He staid for certaine daies at Milan, where being crowned (according to the manner) with the Crowne of Iron, and resolving to go to Rome; he did at *Philip*s perswasion come to Luca, from thence to goe to Siena, for feare lest vnder colour of hospitalitie hee should contract any league with the Florentines. Tollentino and Attendulo, by the Florentines command drew neere with their troupesto Luca, at which time it is reported that the Hungarians made a fallie; and that their caualerie did so boldly giue in vpon them, as some of them came to *Attendulo*s Tent, vnto whome one amongst them of a big stature (fighting with an iron mace) gaue him a great stroke vpon the head, but his caske being of excellent temper, he did not long delay to recompence him: For hee did presently thrust his sword through his bodie: And that the Hungarians and Liguois being brauely repulsed, did speedily retire into the Citie, hauing in that fallie lost many valiant men.

They say moreover that Sigismund, after this losse, went at last to Siena where for a time the Pope and he were at great controuersie; but by meanes of sundrie ambassades sent from either side, being made friends, he went to Rome where he was crowned Emperour.

There is nothing found worthe of memorie to haue beene done during that Sommer by Lawetana a-long the Coast of the lower Sea. The Sigistins only were for a time besieged by Sea and Land; but the businesse had no good successe. For hauing lost certaine Marriners of those whome hee had sent with Abrahamo Fregosa to giue the assault on the Land-side, hee retired from thence without doing any thing. Afterwards hee made incursions vpon those of Clauray, of whome hee got no great bootie. That being done, the Armie returned to Venice.

The Genoueses that Sommer had no better fortune, but somewhat worse. For sayling along the Coast of Sicill, they lost three Gallies by a tempest that arose, and hauing afterwards done nothing of note, about the end of Autumne they brought backe the Fleet to Genoa. In Lombardie Sancho Venieri subrogated at *Dandulio*s request in his sted, and Cornari, the Prouidators of the Armie, did exploit brauely for the Common-wealth, hauing recovered from Philip, Bordellana, Ruminenga, Fontanelles, and Socinna.

Such happie successe had the Venetians affaires, when vpon the returne of the Prince of Mantua home to his owne houle they beganne to talke of peace. The Senate at the Prince of Montferrats entreatie, sent Fantino Michaeli to Ferrara, only to know what conditions of peace the enemy would propound. The Florentines likewise sent Palla Strossi thither. Philip had already sent Francisco Gallina thither for that purpose. But whilst they treated of peace at Ferrara, the Prouidators hauing assailed the inhabitants of the mountaines, reduced vnder their obedience first the Camonic valley, and then that of T. Ellina. Daniel Vitturi, successeur to Venieri, ioyning with Cornari in the vale of Tellina, attempted to make a bridge ouer the Riuier Adda, to passe ouer into the enemies Countie. But this deligne came to nothing: the enemy valiantly opposing it. Cornari neuerthelesse did still with three thousand men keepe the vale Tellina (vulgarly called Valtellina) whither Piccinno, being sent for by the chiefe of the Gibelline faction which fauoured Philip, ran with disbanded troupes, but with some losse he was rudely repulsed. The subtle enemy knowing that the Venetians in regard of this fortunate successe wold become more bold and courageous to attempt any thing, hauing first placed his Ambuth, he returned the next day, and of set purpose began to skirmish, and drew the Prouidatur with all his troupes into the place of Ambuscado, where with a sodaine reuolt of all the inhabitants neare at hand, hee brake and defeated him with all his troupes. Three hundred horse making way through the midst of the enemies escaped into a verie thicke Forrest that was at their backs. The Prisoners, besides Cornari, were Thaddeo De Aile, Cesar Martinenga, Ilalio of Friull, Baptista Capilio

Neere to the Po likewise there were great combustions. For whilst these things were done in the mountaines, Philip's Capitaines recouered Casal-maior, and Brixielles. The losse of the vale of Telsina being reported to the Senate, they presently resolved to appoint a new Generall of their Armie. The Prince of Mantua, though some were against it, was by the Senate chosen to commaund the Armie. Hee hauing accepted the charge, went forthwith to the Campe, and on a sodaine recouered the Camonick valley, which was reuolted; Then by the aduise of Contarini, Cornari his successour, he conducted all his troupes (for winter was alreadie come) to winter in the neighbour vallies.

The Articles of peace betwixt
and Philip.

Peace being debated on all that winter, was at last at the spring-time concluded on these conditions: to wit That Philip should restore all the Townes and strong places which he had taken vpon the Bressan and Bergamese Territories during the treatie of peace: That he should surrender to the Prince of Montferrat his whole estate which he had taken from him during the warre: (although some say that he had already done it for Sigismonds sake:) That he should give all assurance to Lodouico Vermio and others who had borne Armes for the Venetians: That all prisoners of marke on both sides should bee set at libertie. That hee should likewise restore to the Florentines, all those Townes taken from them in the Pisan and Volaterran Territories, and should doe his best to cause the Sienois likewise to surrender to the Florentines within a moneth, whatsoeuer they had taken from them; and if they refused so to doe hee should give them no aide nor assistance; As concerning the Luquois, Thomas Fregosa, and Lodouico Plombino, (for this man during the warre, had likewise borne Armes against the Florentines) it was decreed that they should restore whatsoeuer they had taken from the Florentines, and that the Lord of Plombin should no more bee vnder Philip's protection: But as for Fregosa, it should be lawfull for him to follow what partie he pleased.

Cornari dyeth in Brisen.

There was a long disputation about Pontremola, yet neuertheless Philip did at last obtaine that Towne, on condition to restore to the inhabitants of the Florentines partie, whatsoeuer hee had taken from them. The Senate perceiving that Cornari did not returne, was so troubled, as they would not establish the peace, vnlesse Philip (according to the contract) did send home their Senatour: but the Ambassadors sent to Philip for this purpose, affirming that he was dead a day before, they did in Philip's name satisfie the Prince and Senate, Lastly, the Venetians fight with good success in the Camonick Valley.

BY this accord, for the space offoure yeares there was neither certaine Warre nor Peace with Philip. At the beginning vnder-hand he molested Pope EVGENIUS, and afterwards by open Warre; which caused the Venetians who withstood it, to attempt by al means though it were contrarie to the accord, to maintaine their Countreman in his Pontificall dignitie. In the meane time sundrie warlike exploits were done here and there, and in sundrie places they fought with different successe. Moreouer, many treasons and suspitions were discovered on either side, not only abroad but at home in the Citie, as shall be hereafter more at large mentioned. Wee will now briefly set downe that which happened farre from the Citie, for the better vnderstanding of the cause why the Venetian did recommence the Warre with Philip in Lombardie.

He

The cause of the renewing of the warre betwixt the Venetians and Philip.

He had entangled (as hath beene said) Eugenius at the beginning of his Papacie in a domestike warre, from whence toward the latter end of the warre of Lombardie great quarrels, and contentions arose as well without as within the Citie of Rome: which although sometimes they seemed to be raked vp, could neuer for all that be wholly extinguished. But this furie running from one place to another, did at last so farre spread it selfe abroad, that there was no Prouince, Citie, Towne, Village, nor any place belonging to the Church of Rome, which had not a feeling thereof. And not to fetch our Historie from farre; Lombardie being quieted, Francisco Sforza disdaining that Philip had made Picinino, his coriuall, General of his Armie, notwithstanding that the Vscente had promised him his future alliance, yet neuerthelesse this braue and courageous young man, being not able to containe himselfe, hauing after long suite obtained leaue to go his way, departed from Lombardie with two thousand horse, and a great number of foot, vnder colour to serue King Renatus, who laid claime to the Realme of Naples, against King Alphonso. And passing through Flaminia, he fiercely entered vpon the Marca of Ancona, where finding all things at quiet and no resistance, after that he had taken great bootie, and waited all the countrey, he reduced vnder his owne command partly by force, and partly by a voluntarie reddition, all the Townes, Villages, and Castles, and other places of La Marca. This iourney was verie commodious to Sforzas troups for their wintering.

Sforza strengthen the Marca of Ancona.

Picinino and Stella make an accord together.

Sforza his success.

Pope Eugenius leaues Rome, & comes to Florence.

Sforza and Attandulo ioyne together.

Picinino, who greatly suspected Sforzas actions, did by Philip aduise depart forth of Lombardy at the spring time with a thousand choise horse to thwart Sforzas designs, and giuing out that he went to the wholesome bathes of the Siennois, he came into Tuscany. Then by the meanes of some of his friends he dealt with Xicolas surnamed Stella, that they might ioyne their forces together, and afterwards make warre both on the Pope and Sforza. Stella at the same time possessed certaine townes neere to Rome; and as a neere neighbour did greatly molest Eugenius, presuming vpon the Coloneysi. And by this meanes the Churches patrimonie being exposed as a prey betwixt them, was at one time wasted and torne in peeces by two enmiefactions, the which although they began but to spring vp in Italie, did neuerthelesse surpasse all those that had preceded them.

Sforza in the middle of these troubles left his wintering places, and first marched into the Dutchie of Spoletta, where with wonderfull successe he tooke Tuderza, Ameria, and diuers other places by a voluntarie reddition. And hauing crossed the Tyber, and filled the whole countrey with feare and terror, he went and encamped on the Viterbian territorie. The inhabitants of Viterbo did relieue him with vituals, and did counsell him (as it is reported) to reconcile himself to the Pope, and to take his partie against the Bracchians his enemies. Picinino was at the same time encamped at Montefalcone. This caused Sforza to make halt, fearing least he should ioyne his forces with Bracchian, who lay not farre from Rome. For he had rather fight with one alone, if he must needs come to battaile, than to deale with the whole Bracchian faction, which he had like to haue done. Eugenius in the meane time being enforced by the Bracchians who were backt by the Coloneysi forooke his Palace, & withdrew himselfe all trembling to the Castle Sant Angelo, and from thence taking boate vpon the Tyber, and passing through the enemies shot, he went to Ostia, and from thence to Florence.

The Pope being thus driuen from Rome, victorious Bracchian thought on nothing more than on meanes how to defeat Sforza. But Sforza hauing ioynd the troups of Micaeli Attendulo to his owne, did raise a verie great and almost inuincible Armie. Picinino and Stella came and encamped betwixt Viterbo and Risipampane. Sforza likewise marched thither; whereby it happened that in a short space all the forces of these two great factions were ready to fight with one another. Sforza determined to giue battaile if the enemy would tarrie for him, and had already caused his foot forces to seize on the Forrest of Verrale, so as there was some likelihood lihood that the Bracchians would haue that day receiued a great ouerthrow, if Vrbano de Bertonna sent from Philip, had not arriued, who running betwixt those two Armies did with teares in his eyes entreate now the one and then the other, earnestly requesting them in Philip's name not to commit so great an error: He besought them to remember that they had in former time borne armes together vnder one Prince: that vnder Philip they began their strength and greatnesse: That those Armies though they were not friends in name, neuerthelesse they were such in effect and by alliance: That the victorie of one of the parties could not but procure all mischiefe to Philip: He entreated them then to respect him who held them both (as they well knew) so deere, and vnto whom they ought to ascribe whatsoeuer they had either of force or reputation in both their Armies.

The two armies are ready to fight.

The remonstrances of Vrbano de Bertonna to keep them from battaile.

Accord betwixt Sforza and Picinino.

The authoritie of so great a Prince, although he was absent, did mightily preuaile with both parties: and Armes being laid downe, they began to talke of agreement. At last it was concluded betwixt them that Picinino should returne into Lombardie, and that it should be lawfull for Sforza with his troups to go whither he pleased: those townes neere to Rome excepted held by the Garrisons of Stella. But Picinino (who as it seemed was not well pleased with those conditions of peace), marching within a while after against the Sabines, where he had renewed the warre, Sforza did likewise hast thither, who hauing crossed the Tyber, went to Ottricoli. Bracchians Armie lay at Maillana not farre from thence, where after certaine light skirmishes, and sundrie posts being come from Philip, Picinino craued that he might in safetie returne with his Armie into Lombardie. The which hee freely obtained of Sforza, who of a long time had beene euill disposed of his person.

Picinino had already peaceably entered into Flaminia, when neere to Imola he met with a great Armie composed of the forces of Eugenius, the Venetians and Florentines, who were leagued together. These men had assembled great troups together with great Lords and Captains, to force Bologna which at the pursuit of the Cameduli had revolted from the Pope; And they had already recovered certaine Cities of the Bologneses, at such time as those of the Pope and the associates quitting their enterprize came to stop Picininos passage. The charge of this resolution being committed to Tollentino, who with all the leagues troups went and encamped at Imola, Picinino likewise came and encamped vpon the same territorie. Tollentino was accompanied by Paulo Vrsino, Cato Mellito, Guido Antonio Fauentino, Thaddeo d'Este, and diuers other noblemen.

The Pope, Venetians and Florentines in league together.

It happened in the meane time that Mellito did surprize two hundred horse of the enemies, whereupon the others being spurred forward by iealousie, and by a desire of bootie, did sodainly and inconsiderately craue the battaile, to the which comming disbanded, and in disorder, they were broken and put to rout, and Tollentino, with Este, Vrsino, and diuers others, who till then had gotten much reputation, were taken by the enemy. Three thousand horse, and a thousand foote were taken prisoners, and such a great modestie and courtesie in warre was then vsed, as the like had not beene seene, for it is reported that foure men only were slaine in that encounter, and about thirtie slightly hurt. The victorious enemy marched towards Bologna: And it is likely that the Pope and his associates would haue done their best to haue diuerted him from that designe, for it is certaine that Philip who had sent for him from Tuscany, did openly fauour the Bologneses.

Picinino defeats the Armie of the league.

Picinino after that he had for a time at the request of the Cameduli in vaine besieged Castell-Franco, went into Lombardie, leauing his sonne Francisco with sixe hundred horse vpon the Bologna territorie. It was afterwards thought that he left that caualerie with his sonne, because he should speedily aid Marfilio Carrario to seize on Padua. This Carrario was sonne to that Francisco Carrario, who thirtie yeares before being with his two children imprisoned at Venice was by the commandement of the Senate strangled in the prison with them. Philip had sent for him from Hungary, and for a time had kept him secret in Lombardie, in which space he did by faire and great promises winne certaine Paduans, that they receiuing him into their Citie, should seize on the gates and the Castle, vnprouided at that time of Garrison, promising them without all doubt to relieve them, for he was presently ready to furnish them with whatsoeuer should be needfull for the preservation of the citie with the inhabitants, as souldiers, money and victuals, and that himselfe (which was the chiefeft) would speedily come thither with a great Armie: That those of Verona and Vincenza did secretly resolute to revolt. All which was afterwards knowne to be forged by him that he might with more ease induce the Paduans to doe what he would haue them.

Carriano being discovered was executed at venice.

Hauiug by these promises, and sundrie others, drawne diuers debauched companions of the Citie to commit this hainous treason, the fifteenth of March was the day appointed that Marsilio should enter into Padua, who was already come in disguised habite as an Almaine marchant going to Rome: and comming vpon the Vincenzan territorie accompanied with a few, that he might the next day enter into Padua, he was discovered by some that had familiarly knowne him in his fathers life time, who caused him and his companions to be apprehended, and carried to Venice, where with two of Philips friends first to assist him, he was put to death, and twentie Paduans were conuicted of the conspiracie.

Picinino within a while after returning into Flaminia with a braue cawallerie Sforza (being sent for out of the Dutchie of Spoleta by Pope Eugenius, with whom being in fauour, he had made a league) was sent to dash his attempts. The conditions of the league were, That Sforza by a decree of the Pope and Colledge of Cardinals should during his life enjoy the Marquizat of the Marches of Ancona, and should be Gonfaloniero or Captaine General of the Church of Rome, and haue entertainment giuen him for three thousand horse and a thousand foote.

King Alphonso is taken and vanquished by the Genoueses.

The Prouince had bene a long time molested, and Braccians forces had sufficiently runne vp downe: and that peace was treated on, at what time the Florentines with wonderfull speed receiued newes, that the Genoueses had defeated king Alphonso at Sea neere to Gayetta, and taken him prisoner with two of his brethren, namely king Iohn, and the Infant Henric, and Iohn Antonio Prince of Tarentum, with three hundred other noble persons which were all brought to Genoa. This caused the Florentines to hasten the conclusion thereof, which was done vpon gender conditions, than if Philip had vnderstood before of that victorie. By this peace the affaires of Lombardie, Tuscanie, and Flaminia seemed to be wholly pacified, if a new contention had not risen betwixt the Venetians and Philip about the confines of the Cremonese. To end which, besides Nicola d'Este who was chosen Vmpire for both parties, Pope Eugenius did greatly labour, at what time speedie newes were brought, that the Genoueses hauing laine Oppicino Alciat their Gouvernour, were reolted from Philip.

The Genoueses
result from Philip.

The cause of this rebellion was reported to be, because that Philip in despite of the Genoueses had commanded that Alphonso and all the prisoners should be brought to Milan, who hauing royally entertained them, not as enemies, but as his guestes, he gaue them leaue to depart. Francisco Spinola, who in the second warre of Lombardie was taken by Laurenco vpon the Rapallitan Sea, was Author of this rebellion.

The venetians
perjurations to
the Genoueses.

It is reported that the Venetians during his imprisonment did oftentimes tell him and other Gentlemen taken with him, when they came to visite him, how wretched and ill becoming a thing it was to see Genoa, a Citie verie famous for her high attempts by sea and land, borne in libertie and to command, and which at the same time possessed diuers Cities in Europe, to degenerate from the magnanimitie of her Ancestors, and to be so dejected without any remembrance of her ancient splendor, safely to obay an insolent tyrant, like some other poore to wne founded in feru-tude. They willed them then to get them home, and to shake off that vaworthie yoake of tyrannic; that they should not doubt but that they would relieue them with

with money, ships, and whatsoeuer should be necessarie to repulse such an iniurie:
That they were readie with the Florentines their associates (as well in disgrace of Philip, as because it was iust and reasonable that those who are at libertie should defend that of other men) to maintaine and defend the wealth and safetie of the Genoueses, as much as if it were their owne.

These men being animated by their remonstrances came to Genoa: But Spinola returning from his imprisonment, did voluntarily banish himselfe to Gayetta, because hee knew that Philip suspected him: Some say that Philip sent him thither to guard that Towne, which hauing bene defended against Alphonso's attempts, especially by his diligence and valour, he thought in regard thereof that hee had done a notable seruice to Philip, and giuen him sufficient prooffe and assurance of his loyal-tie: whereupon he returned to Genoa after the battaile of Gayetta, where being coldly entertained by the Officers and Magistrates of the Citie, hee did incite the people to recouer their libertie.

of the Genoueses rebellion.

Now the rebellion of the Genoueses being knowne, Picinino was commanded speedily to march against them, who hauing remained a while vpon the Genoan Territories, did nothing there worthy of memorie. The Florentines at the Ventians pursue did relieue the Genoueses with victuals and Souldiers, not caring greatly to obseue the accord, which Philip had first broken; in that he had contrarie to the treatie of peace, made a league with Alphonso, and had a hand in the affaires of the Realme of Naples. But in some Authors I finde no mention made of this accord, which lasted so short a time. The Pope had before recouered Bologna with the consent of the Cambruli, where the motion of peace was first begun. Francisco Sforza being come from La Marca into Flaminia by the Popes commandement, had caused Philip to condescend to very reasonable conditions: For the preface of this young man did in some sort qualifie his obstinacie. Truce was euery where granted by reason of the great hope the Pope had of peace, when the sodaine commotions of the Genoueses did breake all, who comming to Portoueniere which lieth vpon the Genoueses Sea-coasts, surprized the Castle, and expelled the Arragonian Garrison.

wholly broken off.

King Alphonso held three places vpon that Sea-coast which Philip had giuen him not long before. Picinino being called forth of the Parmesan where he lay, vpon report of this surprizall (for Philip did openly then take Alphonso's partie) went speedily to recouer that Fort. But finding it to be impregnable, both by situation and art, turning his forces elswhere, hee seized on the Towne of Sarfane; then taking Castel-nouo, and certaine other Townes vpon that Coast; and hauing contrarie to all ancient and moderne accords crossed the Marea, he went to Luca, where he enforced the Luquois to breake the peace which they had sworne to the Florentines; and entering into the Pisan Territorie, hee tooke diuers Townes from the Florentines. Some say that the Luquois sent for Picinino, who attempted to recouer the Towne of Bargues from the Florentines, and during the siege of Bargues, Picinino was defeated by Ciarpelson and Pietro Brunoro, sent by Sforza. He would vndoubtedly haue much entangled the Florentines affaires, if the hope to take Genoa by a commotion, had not made him to quit Tuscanie, and to goe speedily to the Genoueses Territorie.

Picinino his exploits against the

Sforza in the meantime hauing crossed the Riuer Arno, did in short space re-couer vpon the Pisan Territorie; whatsoeuer the enemy had taken by force; and hauing brought his Camp neerer to Luca, and made certaine Rampiers neare to the Gates, he beganne streightly to shut vp the Inhabitants. Picinino, being disappointed of his enterprize, marched to the Parmesan to get victuals and supplies. But whilest delays were vsed therein; The Luquois; by reason that their come was partly spoiled by the enemies whilest it was green, and partly reaped by them when it was ripe, fell into great want of victuals, as without some forraigne reliefe, the Inhabitants would vndoubtedly haue bene forced to yeeld. Sforza went afterwards

erare aide of Sforza.

The Venetians that were in the field did earnestly sollicite, that the Countrey round about Luca might bee foraged, the sooner to enforce the Inhabitants to yeeld. Sforza with a part of his Armie went into Lombardie. For they had determined, after that they had crossed the Riuer Adda, and furnished the opposite shore with a strong Garrison, to make incursions vpon the Milanois Territories : from whence Philip drew great sums of money. There was some likelihood that there by the power of that proud enemy would be so danted, as laying downe armes (which he loued too well) he would be constrained to embrace peace vpon any conditions whatsoeuer.

The Florentines being therewith discontented, conceived some enuie against the Venetians, as though they could not endure to haue Luca a very famous Citie in Tuscany, to fall into the hands of their associates. But the Venetians were so far from being blamed therefore, as on the contrarie, waiting no longer for Sforza's comming, they sent in that iourney Francisco Gonzaga as Generall of their troupes. Pope Eugenius was then (as hath bene said) at Bologna, being come from Florence to make himselfe master of the Citie by means of some excellent fortification. Whereupon with great expences he cauled trenches, and a rampier; in forme of a Citadell, to be made at the Gate of La Galera. This fortification and the murder of Bentiuoglio (who being newly received into the Citie was slaine by the stroke of a Polax by Baltazar Offidant, Gouvernour of the Citie, for that he perceived the people to make too much of him) did in such sort estrange the Bologneses from the Pope, as the rebellion which soone after ensued, happened vpon none other occasion. But whilst Eugenius made his abode at Bologna, there arrived at Venice Iohn Celeologo Emperour of Greece, Ioseph Patriarch of Constantinople, and Demetrius Prince of Morea, accompanied with the Agents of the Churches of Alexandria, Antioch, and Ierusalem, with the Ambassadors of Trapezond; and the Metropolitan Prelates of Iberia, and Misia, who from thence being come to Ferrara where the Pope was, conferred with him in an open assembly about the accord and vnion of the Christian faith. It chanced since some five hundred yeares, that from our faith which in effect and name is but one, two haue seemed to spring. For the Greekes did in sundrie points differ from the Latine Church, who although they had bene often reconciled, were by the fault and negligence of Emperours fallen more obstinately into the Heresies which they had abjured. This Conference, which was rather a Disputation, lasted diuers Moneths; and at the last the matter was concluded (as shall be hereafter mentioned) to the Popes content.

The Venetians about the same time being out of hope of Sforza's comming into Lombardie, had commanded (as hath bene said) the Prince of Mantua, Generall of their Armie, to make a bridge vpon the Riuer Adda. Those that did then beare Armes for the Venetians were Mellato Tibertino, Brandolino, Pietro Nasarini, Guido Antonio, Asturi Fawentio, Sigismondo Malateste, and Bartholomew Cioni; Guido Rangoni, Guerrero Mariano, Antonio Martinenga, with diuers other great personages. Mellato who had first counsailed the building of a bridge, being commanded to lead the first battallion ouer the water, departed about midnight with his Caualerie, which were readie for that purpose, and crossed the Riuer at a Ford; and hauing at his leisure seised on the shore, the Footmen on the other side without any noife did passe the Riuer that night in boates prepared to that end.

Now the Venetians being buised on all sides in making the bridge, that they might before day passe ouer all their Armie, a sodaine raine falling the same night from the Alpes (which the Armie had not notice of) did in such sort swell the Lake of Laris, and by the morning likewise the Riuer Adda, as by violence of the waters roaring betwixt the two shores, the worke new begunne was not only broken, but their small boats became vlesse through the swiftnesse of the current. Hereupon diuers tried by swimming to returne to their fellowes. For it was likely, that so soon as it was day, and that the Inhabitants should descry them, they should in regard of the small number of those that were past ouer, be forthwith all cut in peeces. But the first of those that in such manner with their Horses attempted the Riuer were drowned, where with the rest were so affrighted, as they durst not adventure. When the Sunne was vp, the Inhabitants of the next Mountaines descrying the enemies on both sides the Riuer, at first stood amazed at the strangenesse of the matter, and abode together in one place: but estoones perceiving the small number of those that had passed the Riuer on their side, and what feare they were in, they instantly repaired to Lodouico Sanseuerino, who wintered in the neighbour Villages, vnder whose conduct in troupes they ranne to the Riuer. Mellato for a time brauely sustained their charge, whilst his Footmen escaped to the body of the Armie, of whom many were drowned by violence of the fireame; but the most of them by swimming hauing gotten the other shore, the Horse-men soone after got ouer likewise: Mellato himselfe being the hindermost in the Rere was the last man that tooke the Riuer (therein imitating that Noble Roman Coeses) and so by swimming came safe to the Armie.

The businesse hauing thus vnfortunately succeeded, the Venetian Generall marched into the Countrey of Gyradade: where hauing surprised Lugniana, hee would in short space haue made himselfe master of diuers other Townes of the Countrey, if Picinino vpon the report of what had passed had not speedily come thither with his forces. Departing therefore from Lugniana hee came to the Riuer Po where he spent a whole day in passing ouer his troupes; then three dayes after hee went and shewed himselfe to the enemy. The Venetians being aduertized a while before of the enemies passage, did possesse a boggie place, through which only hee could come at them, and there staid for a time. But afterwarde being enforced to change place either through feare, or for want of victuals, they retired into a place of safetie; at what time Picinino perceiving them freely to quit that place, hauing speedily led his troupes through the streights of the mountaines, and overtaking them nere to the Fort of Pontoglio, hee fiercely assailed them, and in a manner utterly ouerthrow them; hauing cut off five waggons of their baggage from them.

Now this enterprize falling out contrary to the Venetians proiect, who determining to assaile the enemy was himselfe beaten by him, it caused them more earnestly than before to entreate the Florentines to send Sforza vnto them who was then on the further side of the Po: But neither hee nor the Florentines resolving to doe so, they alleaged sundrie excuses: At the last, entreating that he might at least wife come to Regio to enforce the enemy to retire for feare of loosing Parma, it came to passe as they wished. For Picinino, hauing ruined Calepia vpon the Bergame; initiated the vale of Trescotia, and taken the bridge three miles distant from the Citie, he went on courageously and besieged the Castle of Bergamo.

Sforza being importuned by the Venetians letters came to Regio. But hee was scarce gone forth of Tuscany, when Picinino being aduertised of his departure, came likewise with speed to Parma. Sforza being come to that place, beganne greatly to distrust Pope Eugenius, notwithstanding that he had bene reconciled to him, and made Prince of La Marca. For tyrannie leadeth this mischief along with it, to make a man distrust his best friends. Whereupon, fearing least in his absence they should practise ought against his brethren whom hee had left to command in the Province; he sent Malus of Friull thither with certaine troupes of horse. Hee had likewise left a great part of his forces to continue the siege before Luca: so, as after Malus his departure hee had with him at Regio but the one halfe of his Armie. During his abode at Regio the Venetians on the one side entreating him to crosse the Po, and Sforza on the other crauing according to the convention to haue his troupes troupes compleate, time ranne on without any memorable exploit. Piccinino in the meane time being mindfull of the Luquois, assembled great numbers of labouring men and peafants, and departed from Parma towards Luca to raise the siege. Sforza's troupes likewise went speedily through the Countrie of Modena to the Alpes. Sundrie atchiuements were there performed on both sides, and diuers skirmishes of small importance: howbeit as often as Piccinino (who was strongest) came to fight Sforza did not only make head, but courageously repulsed him.

During these passages in the Alpes, or within a while after Francisco Gonzaga having voluntarily giuen ouer his charge retired to Mantua. It is reported that he departed scarce well pleased from the Venetians. The cause of his discontent proceeded as some say from the Venetians distrust of him, at such time as the troupes crossed the Riuier Adda, where they said he had not done his dutie: Yet neuertheless, he carried himselfe modestly, for hee left his cavallerie behind him in the Venetian Armie: but that which followed makes it apparent to what end hee did it. Gonzaga being gone, Fredreno Contareni the Prouidator did for a time take the charge of the Armie. Afterwards, Paulo Troni was sent thither from the Citie, who by the Senates aduise accusing the negligence of some and the treacherie of others, gaue occasion vnto diuers that stood already badly affected to them to craue leaue to depart, among whome were Antonio and Asturo Fauentij, and Borisla D'Este sonne to Nicholao. These with many more being departed, such as had serued vnder them, 20 and were desirous to stay stil, did according to their merit receiue good pay.

Sforza in the meane time demanded of the Florentines and Venetians payment of that which was due vnto him. And sending to Venice for that purpose, his Agent being brought into the Senate, tolde them that he was expressly come to put the Prince and Senate in mind of Sforzaes good seruices done vnto them, and to receiue such summes as were due vnto him. It is reported that prince Foscari by the Senates appointment, answered, That the Venetians were neuer accustomed bountifully to satisfie and pay those who in any sort had loyally ferued the weale publique, according to their promise; but as for Sforza, hee had bene so farre from employing himselfe for them, as hauing bene earnestly intreated to aide them, 30 he flatly denied it. Whereunto the Agent replying, That they should doe well, rather to pay Sforza his due, or else to discharge him both of his place and promise, that he might more freely prouide for his affaires; it is reported, that thereunto all men generally answered, That the Senate was well pleased, that he should take his leaue and be gone.

Sforza being nettled with this answer, resolved to reconcile himselfe to Philip, whereunto till then he could neuer be induced, for that he would not abandon the Pope and his confederates. Whereupon being inflamed with choller and disdain, he went to the Florentines to demand that which they and the Venetians did owe him, or if they should refuse it, presently to discharge him as the Venetians had done. The Florentines promised to pay him for them both; they onely intreated him to haue patience for a while, and to execute his charge whilst money might be raised on the people, whose means were much exhausted; and that they might send to Venice to the Prince and Senate. For they knew well enough, that Sforza being gone, they should altogether be out of hope of taking Luca, and were besides doubtfull lest some other new warre should assaile them from elsewhere.

According to this promise they sent Cosmo de Medicis to Venice, a man, besides his great wealth, very wise, and beloved of the people. Hee had in former times dwelt at Venice, at such time as through enuy he was driven from Florence, where during his abode he had behaued himselfe with such modestie and curtesie towards all men, as well in publique as private, that he was generally beloved and esteemed. Whereupon, being afterwards restored to his country (for the hearty affection which he conceived to that City, where he had bin so kindly entertained) his countrymen called him, the Venetian.

Being

Being come to Venice, and brought into the Senate, it is reported, that with great feruencie he spake vnto them in this manner: That his loue and affection towards the Venetians being remembered by his Countrymen, it fell out, that, not as a Turk, and borne in Florence, but as a Venetian, hee was sent to the Venetians, to acquaint them with the Florentines great want of money, and that they were no longer able to make anie leuies upon the people for the entertainment of the Army: That his fellow-citizens were not cause of the renewing of the warre against those of Luca, but Piccinino onely, who without anie cause giuen by the Florentines, had furiously entred vpon the Pisian territorie, and had enforced the Luquois to practise nouelties against them, hauing by force draue 10 them to the warre: But that by the diuine goodnesse it was come to passe, that being enforced to take armes, they had brought their enemies the Luquois to that point, that despairing of peace from anie place else, than (according to the report) from the Venetians, they were ready whether they would or no to fall into the Florentines hands. Hee did afterwards adde; That Sforza being commanded to passe the Appenine hills, came to Regio, so that during his absence the Luquois had some small relaxation: That the Florentines had neuer hindered Sforza, who was so often intreated by them to crosse the Po: But that he, distrusting the Pope, feared by going too farre, lest some attempt would be made vpon La Marca, and that afterwards when he would be should not be able to free it from warre, resolving by all means to defend it: That the Florentines had intelligence from very good place, that of 20 along time since hee had not bene paid his pension, hee determined to reconcile himselfe to Philip; And that without all doubt, if they did continue to deprive him of his due, he would speedily doe so: if they should lose him, it was certaine that they should not onely be out of all hope to take Luca, but their affaires likewise would be greatly endangered: And therefore he did intreat and aduise them by the sacred League sworn betwixt them, and by the particular loue which he bare to the Venetian name, more safely to aduise both for themselves & their associates in so great danger, and to pay Sforza, (though he had not deserved it) that which hee had was due vnto him: But if they should still refuse to satisfie him, and that for want thereof, he should goe to the enemies side, hee did let them know, that the Florentines resolved to follow him whither soeuer he went, not as their Captaine, (seeing they could no otherwise 30 doe) but as their Lord and Gouernour.

This being said, Prince Foscari by the Senates aduise answered: That the Florentines did well in holding him for a Venetian, euer since that being driven forth of his Country, he retired himselfe to Venice: as also for that since the same time, the good will and affection of the Venetians, as well of publique as particular persons, had euer bene such towards him, as the Senate and people would willingly doe him all courtesie, and would as soone commit any charge of importance vnto him as to any one of the chiefeest Senatours: By means whereof, the Venetians had for his sake granted diuers things to the Florentines, which otherwise they would haue refused. But concerning his complaint, that the Luquois expecting to haue peace by the Venetians means, had refused to yelde themselves, he knew not 40 how to answer it, because it was the first time that euer he heard that fable: That the Florentines should find that the Luquois had inuented that report, who did secretly write so to their Countrymen, diuers of the wealthiest among them being retired to Venice: And that he should not imagine that the same proceeded from any Senator: if it were otherwise, they should doe well to shew some presumptions or letters sent to the enemy; for they would take order, that those who should be convicted of such a crime, should serue for an example to others, not to enterprize in time to come any such matter against the friends and allies of the weale publique; yet he would not deny but that the Ambassadors of the Luquois were in full 50 Senate willing to depart, and if they could not enter the Citie by reason of the siege, they should entise their fellow-citizens by letters, that if they would quit Philips party, the Venetians, who desired the wealth and aduancement of the Luquois, would in such sort deale for them, as the Florentines their allies should lease both their siege and the warre; whereunto the Luquois had neuer since made anie answer: They did likewise freely confesse, that they had giuen them such an hope, but hee denied that euer they had promised them anie aide or succour. As concerning Sforzaes demands, hee could not accuse the Venetians of auarice or ingratitude;

tude for not paying that which they had promised. For, he was to beleue that their Ancestors had appointed stipends and rewards for souldiers to this end, that their pay-masters who payed them, might when need should be make use of their service. But as for Sforza, whom the Florentines so much affected, he neuer sought for the Venetians, but rather when they stood in need of him, he had boldly denied them all fauour and aide. That he might at his pleasure depart, and that they whom he had euer so curiously assisted should take care to pay him his due: And whereas they threatened them to break the league, and to follow Sforza, he said that it was an easie matter for the Florentines to breake their faith when they pleased, but that he did hope, that ere long they might repent them of so disloyall and discourteous a resolution, and withall be punished both by God and men (who had hitherto preferred 10 them) according to their deserts, for breacking their league and alliance.

Cosmo with this answer taking his leaue of the Senate within a while after went to Ferrara to Pope Eugenius, and entreated him to send in his owne name to the Venetians, to trie whether they would quit their former resolution. The Florentines after Cosmo's departure sent Juliano de Vantati to Venice, who being entertained with lesse respect than Cosmo, and being a verie wise man, did soone acquaint his fellow-Citizens with the small account which the Venetians made of any thing that concerned the Florentines.

Piccinino in the meane time (as hath beene said) being come to the Alpes, and perceiving that in regard the passages were held by the Sforzians, he could not passe, 20 turned backe againe, and went into the Modenois territorie. Attempting againe afterwards to passe into Tuscanie, through the territorie of the Bologneses, marching by that of Emilia, he went and encamped vpon the riuer Illice: And from thence (having sent Asturo Faumetto with two companies of men at Armes to forage and wait the Florentines country) he followed him at the heeles with the bodie of the Armie, and by the way tooke the tower of Aureola. In that place he receiued certaine newes of the treatie newly made betwixt Philip and Sforza, and of the contents therof, which were (as some say) That the Florentines not mentioned in the accord (because without the Venetians consent they durst not doe it) should make truce for ten years, with the Luquois, and in the meane time keepe whatsoever 30 they had taken from the, sauing whatsoever lieth round about within six miles compass neere to Luca: That Sforza should be Iudge of the controuersies which should arise during that truce, & the reuenger of the wrongs done by either of the parties: Hereupon alliance was contracted betwixt Philip and Sforza on these conditions, That neither Piccinino nor any else bearing Armes for Philip should molest the Florentines, in regard Sforza was then as before, in their pay: And that Philip should giue him his daughter Bianca to wife, whom he should send with her traine and dowrie vpon the Parmesan to the Castle Firmiano, a place appointed for the wedding.

The Venetians were displeased with this agreement: but Piccinino much more; who after that he had mightily complained of Philips ingratitude towards him, and 40 runne vp and downe void of counsell through Flaminia with his Armie, he did at last assaile Ostasio Poletano Prince of Rauenna, who for a long time had beene vnder the Venetians protection, and neuer gaue ouer to pursue and torment him, till he had enforced him by his owne Citizens to follow Philips partie. Rauenna by this meanes being no more at the Venetians deuotion, he attempted a greater matter. For he did at the same time take Imola and Bologna from the Pope.

At this stay stood the affaires of Tuscanie and Flaminia, whilest that Mellato (vnto whom after the Prince of Mantua his departure, the Venetians had giuen charge of their Armie, and yet not honouring him with the title of Generall) after he had recovered the vallies and Castles which Piccinino had taken vpon the Ber- 50 game of the precedent winter, entered furiously into the Cremonese, where he made great spoyle. Piccinino being moued at these newes, sent for Italus of Friuli forth of Vmbria, and his sonne Francisco; and commanded his sonne to guard the Cities and strong Townes which he had lately taken in Flaminia, and the other to follow him into Lombardie with his Caualerie. Being gone forth of Flaminia, he went and incamped with his Armie neere to the Po, at that place where it neerely presseth the Citie of Cremona: Then hauing forthwith crossed the riuer, he went and besieged Casal-maior. The Venetian hauing notice of the enemies coming, and having committed the guard of other townes to the Inhabitants, put a strong Garrison into Casal-maior, and Soncina, two strong townes on the Cremonese: They did besides enioyne Mellato to guard the shoare of the riuer Oglio with all his forces. He came and encamped at Bina twelue miles from Casal-maior, where after that he had fortified his Campe, hee did aide the besieged, 10 and by manie Sentinelles and Corps du-gard defended the other shoare of the Riuer.

There was in the meane time a rumour spred, that Gonzaga, who lay still at Mantua, had secretly made a league with Philip. This being reported to the Senate, it was thought most expedient to appeale him if it were possible by their Ambassadors. And to this purpose diuers of the chiefeft Senators were sent vnto him, who had of a long time beene verie familiarly acquainted with him. They being come to Mantua, the better to winne the Princes hearty, beganne highly to praise him, and to extoll his perpetualloyaltie towards the Venetians, and their reciprocal affection towards him: And although that in their passing by the Ar- 20 mie they had found a great part of the number of the Caualerie to bee wanting, which ought to haue beene compleate, they would neuerthelesse pay him for the whole, and whatsoever he could say was due to him, though it amounted to neuer so great a summe. Afterwards they entreated him to beare Armes againe for the Venetians, and did againe offer him the place of Generall, which hee had voluntarily left. But hee excusing himselfe sometimes by reason of his small experience in the Art militarie, and afterwards saying, That hee was desirous to liue at rest, went about to stop his eares to the Venetians perswasions: Whereupon the Ambassadors entreating him that since himselfe did determine to liue at peace, hee would at leastwise permit Lodouico Gonzaga his sonne to bee enrolled in their 30 pay: he did not altogether refuse it, nor yet wholly granted it. At the last they came so farre, as to entreate him if he would not beare Armes for the Venetians, yet to continue in their ancient friendship and alliance. The which he did not only promise to the Ambassadors, but likewise by letters to the Senate, saying, That no man should euer see him follow Philips partie, till newes were first brought him (which God forbid) that Venice were either taken or ruined by him. The conclusion of their whole discourse was, That as a louer of peace he detested warre: And that the Venetians ought not to meruaile if he did reinforce his owne troups; for he did it, fearing least if he should leaue his frontiers naked of Garrison, whilst the warre was so neere him, he should not be able when hee vould, to keepe and 40 defend them from being vronged. The Ambassadors vvere herewith dismissed.

Piccinino in the meane time had for nineteen daies together battered Casal-maior: His Armie consisted of twentie thousand fighting men, and that of the Venetians of halfe as manie: But that long siege had put the Senate in hope, that Piccinino's ster- 50 rible attempts would be brought to nothing, before he could attaine to that which he had conceiued in his minde, in regard he had so long, contrarie to all mens expectation, continued before one place onely, and done no great good there: whereupon they hoped that his vehement heat would at last be cooled: And that Soncina in the Cremonese, and diuers other places elsewhere, were as strong by situation 50 and in munition as that which he then besieged; euery of which might not alone amale the enemy, but likewise altogether wearie and distaste him. These were the Senators ordinarie discourses.

But the fall of a Tower did in such sort daunt those of Casal, as they began openly to talke of yeelding. The enemy at the first would not accept their submission, 60 vling viling delays of purpose, till such time as he had made agreement with the Gotolengians & Gambarians concerning the treacherie, which they had secretly practized; who were determined to reuolt. Whereunto being solicited by Picinino's Agents they did with him vnder take an horrible villanie; which was to enclose Mellato, with his troupes, as he passed through the Breslan Territorie; to the end that the Venetians troupes being at one time assailed on the one side by the peasants, and on the other by the Souldiers, might be wholly defeated. This treacherous plot being thus concluded, those of Casal were received on composition. Picinino had thought at his first arrival vpon the banks of Oglio to haue broken the Venetians as they were marching; and therefore he would not compound with the Casalins, till hee were assured of the ambuscado laied for the Venetians, to the end, that whether they tarried still in one place, or went forward (as he rather thought) they might certainly be defeated.

netian Armie

to Picinino.

Casall being thus yeelded, he drew about midnight towards the Riuer Oglio, & hauing sent certaine light horse before to sound the foord; he learned by them, that the Venetians kept the opposite shore: yet neuertheless he held on his way, & encamped by daie-breake vpon the banks of the Riuer Oglio, foure miles beneath Bina: And forthwith, so toone as his Armie drew neere to the place, he prepared all things necessarie for an assault.

Mellato suspecting that it was but a pollicie of the enemy, and that his designs tended elsewhere than he made shew for, tooke diligent care of all things. The Mantuan Prince was likewise in person neere to the Towne of Macharia, which lieth in the mid-way betwixt Bina and the Po, with three thousand men, who exhorted the Venetian Generall to ioin his troupes with his, assuring him that both Armies being ioined together, they might with more ease breake the enemies attempts. This he said, although he was not ignorant of the enemies designe. Mellato in the meane time was readie to send Crispoforo & Giovanni Tollenino with their companies of men at Armes in Garrison to Verona. The Mantuan was not of this opinion: The Prouditors that were present at this consultation, and reposing more trust in the Mantuan than he deserued, were likewise of his opinion. He on the contrary, either by chance, or else because he had some suspicion, not of the whole matter, but of some part of the plot, did still persist in his owne opinion.

ted against the Venetians.

The enemy remoued his campe from place to place, whereupon the Venetian was greatly troubled to see him so often day and night to shift places; who after he had spent certaine daies in such like faigned shewes, all things being in readinesse, about midnight he sent the third part of his forces, without any rumor at all to passe ouer the Bridge, which was forth of the enemies view, to ioin with Gonzaga's troupes: And he in the meane time still shewed himselfe on the opposite shore the better to colour his enterprize, himselfe resolving within a while after to passe ouer at the bridges of Macharia and Caner.

The Venetian Armie had like to haue been ouerthrowne, being enclosed by the enemies ambuscado, and by the treacherie of the inhabitants. But that good God vnto whom (as we haue often said) all Republics are pleasing, and especially those whose beginning (like that of the Venetians) hath bene Religiously established, would not suffer it to be so. It happened verie fitly for this purpose that a certaine man whose name was Baretta Gottholengian sent by his compartners to the enemy to this end, was taken by the Venetian foragers, and brought to Mellato; who, after that he had promised to free him from all punishment, did discouer vnto him the danger wherein the Venetian Armie was. Mellato hearing it, made no longer delay, but sodainly discamping, did with all his troupes without any danger take the way of Brescia. Picinino had already about the fourth watch of the night sent his forces ouer at Macharia, where the troupes, sent to the Mantuans Campe, did goe and receiue them: In the meane time word was brought them that the Venetian hauing speedily dissolged was twelue miles onwards on his waie; That the

the inhabitants of the Countrey, did not dare to meddle with them in regard they saw no man pursue them.

The Mantuans reuolt being vnderstood at Venice, they presently decreed to Arme, a mightie nauall Armie against him of threecore and fise Gallies and fise Gallions, with a great number of other small vessels. Pietro Lauretano Generall of this Armie entring by the mouth of the Po, into the Mantuans Countrey, was expressly commanded to wait and spoile whatsoeuer he met with. Mellato in the meane time was cometo Bagnols, where he had fortified his Campe with trenches and rampiers. He determined to send part of his forces to Brescia, which was not farre off, wherunto the inhabitants of the Citie opposing, and crauing to haue the guard of the Gates giuen to themselves, hee thereby perceived that the Venetians were safer abroad than in the Citie. Francisco Barbaro commanded in the Towne, a man verie discreet, and well acquainted with affaires of importance. He by good aduise hindered them from so doing, & shewed them the danger wherto the Cities State would be brought; if those of one partie alone committed to the guard of the Citie, the rest should be accounted enemies, and traitours, seeing they reposed no more trust in them: For then they would practice nouelties, and would in hate to the contrarie partie, openly hazard all things possible for them. The authoritie of the man did much preuaile with them, and according to his aduise, the Venetian Magistrates which were within the Citie, garded the Gates: Then he did reconcile the Martinezaga's and the Anuogadres together, the heads and chiefe of the two factions by a new alliance; wherein by meanes of Leonardo Martinezaga, and to the great profit of the Common-wealth, he made Paris de Lodron who held certaine Castles in the Mountaines of Brescia, and Pietro Anuogadro who were mortall enemies, good friends.

Picinino resolved to shut vp the Lake of Benac, and the riuer Mincia from Mellato's Armie, to the end it might receiue no Venetian succour: and being in this manner starued (for it was certain that it could get victuals no where, but from the Towne) he assured himselfe of the entier ruine of the Venetian forces: Whereupon in this resolution he diuided his troupes into two parts. Gonzaga, and Lodouico Vermio, did fiercely fall vpon the Verona-territorie, and hauing seized on Valeza and the bridge thereof by treacherie, sooner almost than their coming was knowne, they made themselves Masters in a verie short space of whatsoeuer lieth betwixt the riuers Adice and Mincia. The sodaine losse of Valeza was cause that Giovanni Malaulotte who conducted three hundred horse from Brescia to Verona, falling by misaduenture neere to the bridge into the enemies hands, was wholly despoiled of his Cavalierie. He did besides reduce vnder his command all the inhabitants of the Lake of Benac: and the Mantuan Prince tooke Pescara, seated at the head of the Riuer Mincia, and Lonata vpon the Mountaines of Brescia, which had bene his.

The Lake of Benac, by some termed La Garda, (to speake somewhat of it) is the pleasantest Lake of all Italie, and is more long than broad. It extendeth in length from the West to the North some thirtie miles, filling it selfe with the riuers Sarca and Ponalis on the West and North side, and emptieth it selfe to the Southward into the Riuer Mincia. The water thereof is so pure and cleere, as one may see the bottome, except in the midst where it is verie deepe. But it is not so pleasant in calme and faire weather, as it is dangerous and terrible when it is tossed with tempests. It is the onely lake of all Italie which being stirred with the wind, hath her waues swelling like the billowes of the Sea. It feedeth excellent fish, of which the Carpes are best, which are in season from the end of haruest till the beginning of the spring, and are with great labour taken from forth the deepest places of the water. It is moreover enuironed on all sides with goodly Oliue trees, entermingled heere and there with delicate gardens full of excellent fruite trees, as Citrons, Pomegranates, and Peaches, which the inhabitants of those places call Adams apples. That side thereof which lockes towards Verona on the right hand, hath besides Pescara, Langissa, Bardolin, and la Garda, whereof the Lake taketh the name, the towers of Malafina which some call Malafelle. And opposite to that vpon the Lake is the Town of Sermion, the Countrie of Catulus the sweet and eloquent Poet, with that great huge stone, a marke of antiquitie, which appears aboue water. After Sermion cometh Riualtella, called by some Riualtella, Manerbia, Felician, Portuesia, and lastly Sales, the chiefe of the Prouince. It hath besides on the North-side, verie high and steepe Mountaines as farre as Riua. This place with Penetra which appears not farre from thence vpon a Rock, did in times past belong to the Territorie of Trent. The Borough of Nac is to be seen aboue the Fort of Penetra, whereby wee may coniecture that the Lake was in olde time called Penac, which wee by changing of a Letter call Benac. The Ancients called it Penac because it was so neere to Nac.

Now all the places from the Lake on the hither side and beyond the Riuier Minchia being taken, the Mantuan marched with his forces to Vidizolles, where Picinino lay encamped. Blondus saith that he departed from that Campe when he went the first time to foure the Verona-Territorie: But let it be how it will, it is certaine that Philips forces during the incursions vpon the Veronois, were encamped at that village seated vpon the Riuier Clefia, in the midway betwixt Bressia and the Lake of Benac: Against whom Mellato, being desirous to oppose his forces, went with his troups to Gauarda. Barbaro sent him from Bressia a braue troupe of young foot-men; and from the Mountaines great multitudes of Souldiers came vnto him, so as in a short space five and twentie thousand men were in the Venetians campe.

Mellato with his forces seized on all places along the Mountaines, from S. Euphemius euen to La Garda. The Riuier Clefia separated two goodly Armies readie to fight, by reason that it was too deep in that place, nor in any fort foordable. Mellato refused to fight: But vnderstanding afterwards that Picinino's Armie was mightily encreased by Gonzaga's arriual, he abstained from battaile; As also because he distrusteth certaine Captaines, who had along time followed Gonzaga's campe; but the euent did afterwards manifest whether he had cause to distrust them. For diuers of them hauing an inckling thereof, and perceiving that he took from them the meanes to do hurt, did with-draw them selues from his camp & went to that of the Prince of Mantua. Mellato then fearing least some sodaine reuolt might draw the Venetians affaires into some danger, and being desirous to take all occasion from those who practised nouelties, hauing lodged the greatest part of his forces in Bressia, he sent the residue into Garrison to the Cities, & Townes neere adioining, which were vnder the Venetians obedience. And by this meanes Picinino had time and leisure to remove his camp from place to place: whose only aime tending to keepe the Cities victuals from Mellato's troups, he went with his Armie and besieged Sales: But those within it hauing brauely defended themselves, he approached with his Armie neere to Felician and Manerbia.

Thereupon, the Forlani, and those of Montecarlo embraced Philips partie. Within a while after hauing receiued those of Sales, and all the other inhabitants vpon the Lake in Philips name, he marched to Bagnolls; from whence on a sodaine coasting about with his Armie, he first tooke Pontroglio, then Palacicia, and diuers other Townes without any difficultie. All this was done in the Champane. But in the Canonick valley, they fought at the same time with better successe. For Antonio Bechari with two thousand horse did by the consent of the inhabitants make himselfe Master of the whole valley. Barbaro sent Giuanni la Conte, Bartholmeo Coioni, & Leonardo Martinenga against him with great troups of Mountaniers, who did greatly affect Martinenga, who entring on a sodaine into the vale, and hauing made a great slaughter of the enemies, did put all those of that rebellious valley to the sword, spoiling and burning the whole Countrie.

Fallere without being forced in Venice concerning the battaile wonne at Colongnes doth put the whole Citie in danger of a most cruelledition. Mellato to attempt in vaine to goe from Bressia to Verona. Nicholas Este maketh sundrie attempts against the Venetians. The Venetians surrender the Polesino Aeste. Mellato with great travell ouer the tops of the Mountaines arriveth at Verona. A great nauall Armie cometh by the Po, vpon the Mantua Territory. Bressia is straightly besieged. The Senate determineth to renew the alliance with Seorza. Mellato being made Generall of the Armie, resolued to relieue Bressia with victuals. Paris Lodron vanquisheth the enemies neere to the Riua Sarca. The Venetians resolued to prepare a nauall Armie for the Lake of Benac. Gallies are carried by maine strength ouer high Mountaines into that Lake. Seorza allieth himselfe with the Venetians and Florintines. Picinino and the Prince of Mantua hauing crossed the Riuier Adice take diuers Townes on the Verona and Vincenzan Territories from the Venetians. The Venetians fight against the enemies by Land along the Lake of Benac with good successe.

Hill at these warlike actions were done in the Canonick valley, those of Chiau yielded to Philip. This new Rebellion was accompanied with a greater losse. For Guerriero Martiano, and Michaeli Gratti (whom Mellato had sent with three hundred foot, and a hundred and fifty horse to lie in Garrison in that place) were delected. Picinino went afterwards & encamped before Rhoades: where at the Venetians being moued, marched thither with a companie of Mercinarie Souldiers, all young men, chosen among the inhabitants of the Mountaines of Valtropia and Seroliana, to raise the siege. These troups setting forward at the beginning of the night, staid neere to Passirana and Paderna. Picinino being aduertized of their approach did presently dis campe, & returned to Colongnes three miles from Rhoades: The next day hauing placed part of his forces in ambush in the neighbour Mountaines to entrap the Venetian, he marched with the residue of the Armie against the enemies, as it were to assaile him with all his forces. And being come neere to one another. Piccinino did embattaile his Souldiers. Mellato did not refuse the fight; but sent some of his troupes disbanded to scoure the plaines, and the skirmish being begunne, he did by little and little send troupes of horse among his footmen against the enemye, and without any disorder, retired his wearied and hurt men, putting those that were able and fresh in their places; both sides dealing so cunningly, as when Piccinino's troupes came forth of the Ambuscado, Mellato's not being moved remained firme.

Now the fight hauing continued from day-broke till it was almost night, with greater losse on the enemies side than on the Venetians, both sides retired; Piccinino to Coloignes, and the Venetian to Brescia. And although Fortune at that time no more fauoured the one than the other, neuertheless to satisfie the inhabitants of Brescia, who were desirous to vnderstand the successe of that encounter, the Magistrates commanded that it should bee given forth how that Mellato had broken and put the enemye to rout. This rumour was not only spread in the Citie of Brescia, but being brought to Venice, the whole Citie receiued such content, as the people being outcryed, came running from all parts to the Market-place to reioyce with one another; by means whereof the Republique had like to haue fallen into a great and wonderfull danger.

The outlook for danger wherein to the Comm-wealth was like to haue fallen.

There were in the Citie great numbers of Histrian and Dalmatian Marriners, and Rowers, who were sent for thither expressly to furnilh the Nauall Armie which was then making readie. Manie of these fellows being heated with wine ranne to the Market-place, where hauing kindled fires in diuers places (in signe of ioy) seeking vp and downe for wood to feed it, they beganne to plucke downe the shoppes of the Bakers and those that sold herbes, which stood in the Market-place, to make fire-wood of them: and hauing beaten away the watch that went about to pacifie them, they gathered together about three thousand men, who vsing no respect to the Magistrates, nor chiefe Senators that were come thither to appeale the tumult, they beganne to breake open greater shoppes, and to fall into an open rebellion. But at the arriuall of Pietro Lauretano this sedition was soone quieted. It is reported that these Mechanick people at his verie name stood still and offred to doe whatsoeuer it should please him to command them; and he hauing giuen them his word that none among them should bee punished for that which they had done that night, euerie man returned home to his owne dwelling place.

Lauretano re-
ued of every one.

Lauretano by good deserts had in such sort gotten the loue and good will of all men, as not only those meane people of the Citie, but those of greatest place and authoritie did reuerence and respect him. The which hee had easily obtained by his curteous meekenesse and heartie loue towards the Republiack, which doth as much cherish and embrace their vertues, as it doth abhorre and detest pride and ambition. As also for that the Common-wealth had for the space of twenty yeares employed him in euerie warre of importance. And that time also when the affaires of Lombardie were in great danger, and that the Venetian forces were not thought comparable to those of Philip, the Senate did choof him, notwithstanding his great age, for to command that great Nauall Armie which it had prepared against the Mantuan.

the vessels in the Venetians Nau-
all Armie.

It consisted of greater number of vessells than had beene at any time before scene in any fleet vpon a Riuer. For there were more than an hundred and threescore vessells of all sorts, among whom were fise Gallions higher and greater than were vsually made, and about threescore and tenne Gallies; the residue being smal vessells like to little Brigantines. But whilst these things were making readie in the Citie, Piccinino foure dayes after the encounter comming backe from Coloignes to Rhoades with all his troupes, enforced the inhabitants to yeeld. The like did those of Bomedes, Paternia and Passeria. The next day after, the Monticulans, Iulians, Omians, and Brienfes yeelded vnto him vpon his word; and at the last, hauing by force seized on Isea, he did on the mountaines take Valtropia.

And

signe.

And within a while after he possessed all the plaines on the Breslian Territories, with a great part of the mountaines: the new Orges excepted, which hee determined to assaile vpon the first occasion. Mellato, Barburo, and the other officers of Brescia suspecting that Piccinino's designes did only tend to shut vp the passages from the Venetian troupes, to the end that all reliefe being kept from them, he might furnish them in Brescia; did secretly resolue that Mellato, leauing certaine troupes for the garde of the Citie, should goe his way with the residue of the Armie to Verona, or whither fortune should lead him.

Now Blondus saith, That about the third watch of the night hee came forth of Brescia with fise thousand men both horse and foot. We doe not find in Montanus commentaries, that he had at that time so manie men: Palsius of Arimini lets downe but three thousand: And because both of them were present at this warre, I doe therather follow them: But of what number soeuer this Armie was it marched speedily to the bankes of the Riuer Mincia: where after it had attempted beneath the Bridge of Valeza to passe at a foord, and could not by reason of the depth of the waters, and for that the enemies were encamped on the opposite shoare, hauing lost some horse, it returned to Brescia with as great speed as it came thence. Piccinino marched towards Brescia with an intent to surprize the Venetian, but hee was preuented by his enemies speed, whereupon he blamed his own negligence for loosing so faire an occasion; and without more delaye hee marched against the new Orges, who as hath beene said were still obedient to the Venetians. Mellato in the meane time attempted to passe by another way, which although it was as dangerous as the former had neuertheless better successe.

Mellato is confessed to re-
turne to Brescia.

Whilst these things were done neere to Brescia, Nicholao D'Este did make great complaints to Pope Eugenius who remained still at Ferrara, how the Venetians did hate him; saying, That hee knew of a certaine that they had of late prepared a Nauall Armie: And because he was assured that they did suspect him to haue beene the cause that the Prince of Mantua had forsaken their alliance, hee had cause to doubt that the same great preparation was rather made against him than any other. The Pope sought to comfort him, and to feed him with better hope, assuring him that he should not need to feare the Venetians, for their designes tended to another end; and if he did stand in feare of them, hee would take order, that all assurance should be giuen him on their partie.

The Duke of
Ferrara complained to the Pope.

But notwithstanding all this, Este leuied a braue Cauallerie, and sent for Guido Fauntio with fiseene hundred horse, and three hundred foote, and called home his sonne Borsia, who was in Sforza's Campe with six hundred horse; saying that he raised those forces only to defend his owne, and not to offend any man. Hee did afterwards cause a great quantitie of ground to bee cut whichlieth betwix the Po and Padua drawing a broad and deep trench from the Riuer to the marishes; commaunding the Ferrarois to take Armes, and that a speedie leuie of Souldiours should be made at Reggio and Modena.

Nicholao D'Este
owne estate.

The Pope beganne to exhort Nicholao D'Este who was with him, and the Venetians by his Ambassadors, to laie downe Armes, and to embrace some honourable accord, but with this condition, That the Venetians should surrender to Nicholao D'Este the Riouigo, with seuen Castles of the Pollesin Island, which seuen and thirtie yeares before had beene engaged to them. Este being overcome by the Venetians bountie, did forthwith change his determination, and releued the Venetian Armie with victuals and all other necessaries, which alreadie was going vp the Po; the like did the Ferrarois following their Princes example.

Nicholao D'Este
sued from feare
and submission.

In the meane time those of Orges in the Breslian Countrie did valiantly resist Piccinino's forces. But that which neither strength nor any attempt could execute, was done through the trecherie of Pietro of Luca. Hee being sent by Mellato with three hundred horse for the garde of the Towne, within a short space after it was besieged, did deliuer both the Towne and her inhabitants into the hands of Piccinino.

no. But whilest the enimie was busied at this siege Mellato did attempt to passe towards Verona: Barbara and the other Officers of the Citie being desirous to haue it so, to the end that the Citie being discharged of such a multitude might bee lesse afflicted with the dearth of victuals; as also because they thought it most profitable for the Common-wealth to haue some troupes neare to Verona that might make head against the enimie if he should chance to march thither.

Mellato herupon tooke that way which seemed most commodious. And because that of the champain country had proued successelesse, he resolved to iourney through the high Mountaines and Forrests that were in a manner in-accessible. Giacomo Antonio Marcello a verie valiant person, and Giouanni Villano Captaine of a companie of light horse being sent before for discoverers, did diligently view the whole countrie. Now it being resolved that Thadeo d'Este with six hundred horse, and a thousand foote, should tarry behind for the guard of the Citie, the residew were commanded, euerie man to be readie with their Armes and baggage to depart about the second watch of the night. The troupes being come forth of the Citie at midnight marched through the vale of Sabia to the mountaines. Diuers Bressians, some being perswaded, but most of them prouoked by their owne proper motion, did follow the Venetian Ensignes, among whome were Pietro Auogadre, Leonardo Martinenga, with Antonio his brother.

Those of the valley of Sabia being amazed to see these troupes, tooke armes, being assured of the hatred which the Bishop of Trent their Lord did beare towards the Venetians; but not daring to assaile them openly, they brake downe the strait passages through which the Venetians were to passe, and if they met with anie stragglers, they did either villainously murder them, or else throw them downe headlong into those deepe vallies. The Venetian Captaine dissembled all these wrongs, and intreated the souldiers to make haste, and not to abandon their ensignes. And hauing with great labour and travell passed the first dayes iourney, about the second watch of the night on the top of the mountaine of the last valley, hee made a stand, and commanded the wearie souldiers to eat and take their rest. Then by day-broke the companies being dislodged, Paris Lodron, who was before reconciled to the Venetians hauing driuen the enemies before him, came and shewed himselfe to them, and embraced Mellato, who hauing followed him with all his forces ouer those difficult mountaines of Italie, without anie feare of the Mountaniers did late in the euening encampe in an assured place.

All men thought it fit in that place to rest the tired souldiers and horses who were wearied with a continuall march of two whole daies and nights. But Mellato would by no means suffer it, saying, that it behoued him to make haste before that the Bishop of Trent were aduertised of their passage through his territories: yet neuertheless for all his haste, the enimie had notice thereof, who hauing the same night sent Polonians and Macloians to cause the Mountaniers to take armes; the armie had like to haue bin inclosed in those streights, and if it had not made great haste (as hath bin said) it would there haue received a great ouerthrow; howbeit it did not passe those streights, but in great feare.

There was in the midst of the mountaines a ragged vncasie way; on the one side whereof rockes and great ruines of stone-quarries did ouer-hang, and on the other appeared verie deepe vallies, full of torrents, & of so great a distance to look vpon, as whatsoeuer was throwne downe into the botome, of what bignesse soeuer it were, would yet appeare lesse by the one halfe. The cruell Inhabitants of those mountaines meeting with certain stragglers from the troupes throw them headlong into those deep bottoms. The enimie had seized on those streights, and the Venetians had alreadie perceiued his intent, which was, to rowle downe huge stones vpon the Armie, which would haue greatly endangered them.

Griefe and despaire had in a manner seized on all the troupes; not so much in regard of the difficultie of the waies, as for feare of their liues. Which the General perceiperceiuing, he commaunded Casualbon, Rangon, and Guido, three valiant yong men, to goe secretly with three hundred footmen, armed with swords and short pikes, to assaile the enemies in the crooked passages of the mountaines. These men hauing brauely executed his commandement, and driuen the enemies from the mountaine tops, the armie passed on in silence.

These iij. hundred men, leauing their heauie armor in that place from whence they had driuen the enemies, did the remainder of that night march before the armie to discover the waies and Forrest. Then being come in the morning to Tegena, the Inhabitants of the place at the first did not stirre, but afterwards falling vpon on the rereward, they tooke from the Venetians a great part of their baggage, and two hundred horse. At the last, the armie being come downe into the plaine, neare to Arques, the scouts brought word that the Riuer Sarca which runneth from the mountaines of Trent into the lake of Garda was so risen by reason of the former nights raine, as it could in no sort be forded.

The next day, the troupes which were to passe ouer, staying vpon the Riuer banks, descried the armed enemies on the other shoare, who were brought thither by Lodouico Vermio whom Picinino had speedily sent by the Lake. Some say that Vermio and Francisco, sonne to Vinciguerra, went to beate backe the Venetians in the Forrest of Penetra. Whether it were there, or neare to the Riuer (for those places are not farre asunder) that the enimie shewed himselfe, it is certaine that the Venetians being greatly amazed, perceiuing the enemies before, behind, and on euerie side; and the Lake on the right hand which did inclose them, sent Leonardo Martinenga to Vinciguerra Lord of Arques, whose neare kinsman he was, to vse meanes if it were possible by faire promises to draw him to their partie, but if hee should refuse the Venetians friendship, yet to intreate him to oblige the Venetians so farre to him, as not to enterprise aught against them, and to withdraw his forces forth of the forest of Penetra. Whereunto he was so farre off from giuing consent, as on the contrary he did forthwith, against the law of Nations, take Martinenga prisoner, and binding him hand and foote, sent him to Mantua where he died.

Martinenga's misfortune did much more amaze Mellato and the rest, and there was likelihood that so many braue men would bee cast away, being enclosed by the lake, mountaines and riuers, or else that their Armes being laid downe, they would fall into the enemies hands; and if they did thinke to attempt to open their way by armes, yet they would in that enterprise loose their liues, had not Pileusus a Centurion, who being come into the forest of Penetra with a thousand men, or (according to some) with foure hundred to open the passage for his fellows, opportunely arrived. It is reported, That this man deceiued the enimie by a new stratagem. For the enimie possessing the Forrest, through which they were of necessitie to passe, and the narrow passages; (where tenne resolute men would with ease haue kept backe thousands) being guarded day and night, he being not able to driue the enimie thence by force, did it by cunning.

There was a wood neare to the toppe of the mountaine where the enemies lay, wherein he placed in the night time twentieall souldiers, and commaunded them carefully to marke whether the number of those that kept on the toppe did waxe lesse, and if they should quit the place, speedily to seize on it: And himselfe, as though he had despaired of being able to passe, caused diuers Torches, and other Lights to be fastned to Lances ends, and with them faired to goe further off. This did not onely make them belue that the Venetians were gone away, but did confirme them in that opinion, in regard it did not auale them to carrie there. Whereupon those of the guard leauing their place, those twentie souldiers that were left in the next wood did forthwith seize on the hill top, whither the Centurion came speedily with the residew of his troupes; who with great noyse shewing himselfe afterward to the enimie, did in such sort affright him, as he quitted the Forrest and the riuers shoare to the Venetian. And in this manner so manie braue and valiant men men were preferred by the labour and industrie of one alone man.

By this meanes the troupes pass along in safetie. Blondus affirmeth that the Venetians lost about eight hundred Horse in that journey. Atentanus, and Pasius of Arimini doe not mention so great losse. During these exploits in the Mountaines, Laureano being come vp the Riuier Po against the streame, resolved to carrie for the troupes that were appointed for the Naue, at the separation of the Riuier, a little beneath the walls of Ficarolles. For, of eight thousand men, appointed for the Vessells, he had taken in but three thousand. But whilst the Venetians delayed time, and matters went slowly forward at Venice, the Prince of Mantua at Hostilia stopped the passage of the Po with a strong Rampier, and caused great piles to be driven into the Riuier: whereupon in euery four rankes he builded Forts, encompassing them afterwards with three great yron chaines, and placed vpon each side of the Riuier great store of warlike engines, which were planted in such manner, as no vessel whatlocuer could come neare, but in a moment was sure to receiue twentie or thirtie shot. He did likewise with the same care and diligence cause Sermena to be fortified with a strong Garrison, which lieth on the Po in the mid-way betwixt Ficarolles and Hostilia.

All this was done vpon the Po. Philip after the taking of the new Orges, was very forrie when he heard that Mellato with his troupes had escaped through the mountaines. And although Haruest was ended, and that it was time to send his troupes to Winter, yet neuertheless he sent for Picinino, and the other Captaines of his Armie, entreating them to goe and besiege Bressia, telling them by word of mouth how desirous he was to haue that Citie besieged, and that the greatest pleasure they could doe him, was to haue that Towne taken by the valorous conduct of his Captaines, the which besides the great wealth would purchase him a very notable victorie. He willed them then to goe their way, saying, that he hoped that the same Citie, vnprovided of a Garrison, molested with famine and pestilence, would in a short space either by force or faire meanes be reduced vnder his obedience. After he had thus entreated and exhorted Picinino, and his other Captaines, hee dismissed them. Picinino within a while after, and without delay, went and besieged Bressia with twentie thousand men, and brought great numbers of peeces of batterie neare to the walls, among which there were fiftene brought from Milan, of such bignesse, as the least of them did carrie a bullet of three hundred pound waight. The batterie was great and furious against the tower of Mombellane, and other places of the Citie, whereof ensued such ruine of the walls, as the Inhabitants being daunted at the very first, beganne openly to talke of yeelding.

In this siege the Officers of the Citie were for a time more carefull and diligent, than were the enemies attempts fearefull or dangerous. And therefore it was concluded among them that Christoforo Donato, the Cities Magistrate, should remaine in his owne house, and curteously entertaine as well those that should come to visit him, as such as he should expressly send for: and should with great promises exhort them to continue loiall to the Venetians: That Barbaro in like manner who was Governour, and Generall of the Garrison, being a valiant and braue Gentleman, should still be neare to the walls and gates of the Citie; should place the corps-de-guard; and by his speech giue hope to the Souldiers and Townsmen. The which he did so cunningly by feigned letters and messengers, and did so comfort them all, as there was none among them, notwithstanding death and wounds, but had rather to obey the Venetians than to fall into the enemies hands. In this resolution they fought thrise with the enemy with good successe, sometimes from the walls, and otherwhiles by sallies. And as much as the Bombards (for so we will terme these engines of batterie) had beaten downe by day, so much did the Inhabitants repaire by night with strong Rampiers. In these reparations the Women did no lesse employ themselves than the Men, among whom diuided into Hundreds, and Tens, Branda Auogadro, as Valiant as Noble, did a notable seruice to the Common-wealth.

But

But two insupportable mischiefs daily encreasing, plague and famine, the Magistrates permitted those who were lesse fit for the Cities defence to goe whether they would. Hereupon diuers left the Citie, and especially those of the Cybelline faction. The Towne was so desolate, as of seauen thousand which were numbred at the beginning of the siege for the Cities defence, there remained but three thousand with the Magistrates and the Garrison. This small number did encrease the enemies boldnesse, so as they beganne more than before nearely to presse the besieged, by new mounts and mines, and by all other warlike engines. And on the other parte the besieged did in all places very valiantly resist the enemies, not eschewing any paine or danger.

An assault being giuen to the Tower Mombellane, and the wall being beaten downe flat to the ground, they did not only make head against the enemy who was almost entred into the Citie, but valiantly repulsed him from the ruines of the wall with great slaughter and losse; and not only once, but diuers and sundrie times. In the end, the Inhabitants loialtie was so great, together with the valour and industrie of Barbaro and the rest, as the Citie being well defended, Picinino grinding his teeth and weeping in a manner for spite and rage, discamped in the middle of Winter; hauing lost in this siege about two thousand men, among whom were many Noble persons; and the besieged, accounting Townes-men and Souldiers, lost not halfe so many.

The siege being raised, the Souldiers were sent to Winter. During the siege of Bressia, Mellato accounted whatsoeuer he had till then done to be nothing, if hee did not open a way to releue the besieged with men and victualls. And himselfe with his troupes pursuing his iourney did in the Valley of Lagarina (as Pasius of Arimini writeth) take Burgo and Coruario by force: Then coming to Penetra, he received it at the hands of Francisco, Sonne to Vinciguier. It is reported that in this journey Pisus, who by his valour had in former time saued the Venetian troupes, was grievously hurt, and that the next day after hee died of his wound. His disaller being known at Venice, the Senate did speedily send the skilfullest Physicians and Chirurgians in the Citie to looke to him; but by the way they had newes of his death, whereupon they returned. The Venetian Captaine seized on Torbolles, a place depending on Penetra, where the greatest part of his Armie spent the remainder of the Winter.

The Senate in acknowledgement of these exploits and others of great consequence, performed by Mellato, did in his absence declare him Generall of their Armie, and did daily send him supplies of money, and victualls, and did by letters exhort him to releue Bressia with victualls, if it were possible. For the danger of that Citie, which by Barbaro's letters they vnderstood to be furiously assailed by the enemies, did very much trouble them.

Pietro Auogadro was present; who coming to Verona with the Venetian troupes, did afterwards goe to Venice, and being brought in before the Senate hee did vnfold the fortune and miserie of his Countie, which was most loiall to the Venetians, humbly requesting them to remember it; telling them that he knew of a certaine, that his fellow Citizens were resolved to hazard all danger, and endure all extremity, rather than to returne vnder Philips obedience. Yet hee greatly feared that vnlesse they were speedily relieved with men and victualls, they could not long withstand so mightie an enemy: That they should do well to make hast, and if they had any remembrance of their owne State and reputation, and of the safetie of their subjects, to prouide for the conseruation of that Citie, whose singular loialtie they had already made triall off; and to prepare money, men, and victualls: That he was assured that the Venetians power was so great, as there was no warre, how difficult and dangerous soeuer, but they were able to end it; and yet in this, they needed nothing so much as good will and speede: and that Time and the Venetians good fortune would performe the rest.

men were preferred by the labour and industrie of one alone man.

By this means the troupes past along in safetie. Blondus affirmeth that the Venetians lost about eight hundred Horse in that journey. Alentanus, and Pasius of Arimini doe not mention so great losse. During these exploits in the Mountaines, Lauertano being come vpon the Riuier Po against the streame, resolved to turre for the troupes that were appointed for the Nauiet, at the separation of the Riuier, a little beneath the walls of Ficarolles. For, of eight thousand men, appointed for the Vessells, he had taken in but three thousand. But whilest the Venetians delayed time, and matters went slowly forward at Venice, the Prince of Mantua at Hostillia stopped the passage of the Po with a strong Rampier, and caused great piles to be driuen into the Riuier: whereupon in euery foure rankes he builded Forts, encompassing them afterwards with three great yron chaines, and placed vpon each side of the Riuier great store of warlike engines, which were planted in such manner, as no vessel whatsoeuer could come neare, but in a moment was sure to receiue twentie or thirtie shot. He did likewise with the same care and diligence cause Sermena to bee fortified with a strong Garrison, which lieth on the Po in the mid-way betwixt Ficarolles and Hostillia.

All this was done vpon the Po. Philip after the taking of the new Orges, was very forrie when he heard that Mellato with his troupes had escaped through the mountaines. And although Haruest was ended, and that it was time to send his troupes to Winter, yet neuertheless he sent for Picinino, and the other Captaines of his Armie, entreating them to goe and besiege Bressia, telling them by word of mouth how desirous he was to haue that Citie besieged, and that the greatest pleasure they could doe him, was to haue that Towne taken by the valorous conduct of his Captaines, the which besides the great wealth would purchase him a very notable victorie. He willed them then to goe their way, saying, that he hoped that the same Citie, vnprouided of a Garrison, molested with famine and pestilence, would in a short space either by force or faire means be reduced vnder his obedience. After he had thus entreated and exhorted Picinino, and his other Captaines, hee dismissed them. Picinino within a while after, and without delay, went and besieged Bressia with twentie thousand men. and brought great numbers of peeces of batterie neare to the walls, among which there were fiftene brought from Milan, of such bignesse, as the least of them did carrie a bullet of three hundred pound weight. The batterie was great and furious against the tower of Mombellane, and other places of the Citie, whereof ensued such ruine of the walls, as the Inhabitants being daunted at the very sight, beganne openly to talke of yeelding.

In this siege the Officers of the Citie were for a time more carefull and diligent, than when the enemies attempts fearefull or dangerous. And therefore it was concluded among them that Christoforo Donate, the Cities Magistrate, should remaine in his owne house, and curteously entertaine as well those that should come to visit him, as such as he should expressly send for, and should with great promises exhort them to continue loiall to the Venetians: That Barbaro in like manner who was Gouverneur, and Generall of the Garrison, being a valiant and braue Gentleman, should still be neare to the walls and gates of the Citie; should place the corps-de-guard; and by his speech giue hope to the Souldiers and Townesmen. The which hee did so cunningly by feigned letters and messengers, and did so comfort them all, as there was none among them, notwithstanding death and wounds, but had rather to obey the Venetians than to fall into the enemies hands. In this resolution they fought thrise with the enemy with good successe, sometimes from the walls, and otherwhiles by sallies. And as much as the Bombards (for so we will terme these engines of batterie) had beaten downe by day, so much did the Inhabitants repaire by night with strong Rampiers. In these reparations the Women did no lesse employ them selues than the Men, among whom diuided into Hundreds, and Tens, Branda Augadre, as Valiant as Noble, did a notable seruice to the Common-wealth.

But

But two insupportable mischiefs daily encreasing, plague and famine, the Magistrates permitted those who were lesse fit for the Cities defence to goe whither they would. Hereupon diuers left the Citie, and especially those of the Gybelline faction. The Towne was so desolate, as of seauen thousand which were numbered at the beginning of the siege for the Cities defence, there remained but three thousand with the Magistrates and the Garrison. This small number did encrease the enemies boldnesse, so as they beganne more than before nearely to presse the besieged, by new mounts and mines, and by all other warlike engines. Then comming to Penetra, he receiued it at the hands of Francisco, Sonne to Vinciguer. It is reported that in this journey Pilosius, who by his valour had in former time saved the Venetian troupes, was grieuouly hurt, and that the next day after hee died of his wound. His disaster being known at Venice, the Senate did speedily send the skilfullest Physicians and Chirurgians in the Citie to looke to him; but by the way they had newes of his death, whereupon they returned. Prince Esgari his frequent exhortations likewise did herein much preuaile with the Senate: Wherein whilest all men were busied, newes was brought that Bressia was freed from the siege. This did not onely raise their daunted courages, but gaue them hope of better fortune, the which was strengthened with another more recent, namely, that for the better fortifying of their alliance, they might draw Sforza and the Florentines to their partie.

It is reported that Nicolas d'Este was the first that motioned it to the Senate, who being reconciled to the Venetians, came to Venice to visit the Prince and Senators, where coming into the Senate clothed in white, after sundrie speeches of his great and loyall affection towards them, he began to talke of means how to make warre, and acquainted the Senate with the goodly occasion which was then offered, not onely to withstand Philips forces, but to make warre vpon him: which was by their Ambassadors, and faire promises to draw Francisco Sforza to their side, who was reported to haue left Philips party in a discontented humour, for that he had lately refused to accomplish the marriage betwixt him and his daughter: That he doubted not but this courageous Lord, renowned for his high attempts, would snatch the present victorie forth of the enemies hands, as well in regard of his ancient emulation and hatred to Piccinino, as for his discontent newly conceived against Philip.

Este his speech did greatly moue the Senators who gaue him infinite thanks for that in so dangerous a time he had, as became a faithfull friend, manifested to the Senate his sincere affection towards them, and likewise for that he had familiarly discoursed with them concerning the profit and seruiue of the Common wealth. But the Senate told him that they would more maturely determine on that which had beene propounded. Some say that the Venetians did at that time present him with Rouigo and the whole Polesin; but I thinke that it was rather an approbation of what was already done, concerning the restitution of the Polesin.

The Senate being heereby put in some hope, had intelligence by letters from Giacomo Antonio Marcello, which were read in the Senate, That Mellato after the taking of Penetra and Torbolles, tooke great care by what means he might relieue the Bressians, and that he had certainly found an occasion to be offered, whereby to open the lake to the Venetians. This hauing more confirmed them, they did presently resolute on sundrie Ambassades. They sent Giovanni Pisani to La Marca to Sforza; Francisco Barbadico to Florence. They called Pietro Auogadro into the Senate where they acquainted him with that which Mellato had done for the victualling of Bressia, whereupon they entreated him that he would speedily goe to the Armie, to the end that both of them together might consulte on that which should be necessary for the journey. And that he should write to Paris Lodron to entreat him still to hold firme his alliance and amitie with the Venetians: and to the Bressians, that they should want no supplies nor victuals, onely they should doe their best to hold out till necessarie preparations might be made.

These things were treated of at Venice. Mellato determining to relieue the Bressians after that he had gotten together a great quantitie of wheate at Penetra, resolved to passe ouer the mountaines, seeing he could goe by no other way. Therefore he did by expresse messengers request Paris Lodron to come and meet with the foragers as farre as he could. Then he commanded foure Captaines, that after they had distributed the wheate among the souldiers, they should first goe to Paris Lodron, and afterwards to Bressia. The enemies in the meane time had placed a strong Garrison in Arques and in Tengues, and had sent Italus of Friuli (for they had notice which way they meant to passe) to lie in ambush with sixe hundred horse and foote, to surprize the foragers by the way. Mellato's souldiers had already passed through the Forrest of Tengues, and supposing that they were out of all danger, they were come downe into a deepe bottom, when the enemy shewing himselfe on a sodaine, and vnlooked for, did greatly affright them.

There

There was by chance neere to that place a little hill, whither the Venetian souldiers all trembling marched with their burthens, but being inuironed in that place on euerie side, and molested with sundrie assaults (for many were slaine there) the third day after both they and the corn fell into their enemies hands. Mellato was at the same time at Torbolles, where it was commonly reported that his designs onely tended to relieue the afflicted Bressians. Philip on the other side, the better to take all hope of reliefe from them, did in the moneth of Ianuarie, march with sixe thousand men, together with the Prince of Mantua into the vale of Sabia, where hee remained till three forts which he there caused to be built, were made defensible & manned with strong Garrisons, the one at Nofa, the other at Cagri, & the third at Solecetra, the which three Forts being well guarded, there was no probabilitie at all that the Bressians could hope for any reliefe.

Some say that Piccinino builded these Forts neere to the Citie at that time, when he raised his campe from before Bressia, namely the one at S. Euphemie Church, the other at the hill-top, and the third at the fountains Monpianes. Italus his enterprise against the Venetians being executed, he was desirous to march against Paris Lodron: But his purpose being discouered, Barbara the Gouernour of Bressia, who was verie circumspet, did speedily send sixe hundred footmen to the reliefe of Paris, the Venetians friend, vnder the conduct of Gyrardo Dandula. He being come neere to the Fort at Nofa, assailed a troupe of Philips horse, which hee easily defeated.

Then diuers of the Guelphi faction of Valtropia being ioynd with him, he went to Paris with a thousand men. Italus on the other side hauing raised two thousand peasants as well of the Mantuan as of the Gibelline faction of the Bressians territories marched with them against the enemy, together with the footmen which hee had brought with him at the first, crossing the riuier Sarca at the bridge which is vpon the confines of Romagnia. He had already begun to ascend the next mountaines, when Paris being conducted through couert vallies, went on a sodaine, and assailed those footmen whom he had left to guard the bridge, where in a moment he made a great slaughter of them. Many were slaine there, among whom were Italus his sonne, Pietro Capocia, with Polonius Colonell of the Bishop of Trents troupes. Italus cut off his iourney, and returned thither, being either called back by the great noise, or else sent for by an expresse messenger. Paris perceiving him coming downe like a tempest driuen from the mountaines, did brauely receiue him, & at last wearied him with fighting. There was a cruell battaile for the space of three howers, but in the end Italus retired the next way into the mountaines. Paris being victorious, made himselfe master of the latter squadron: and the enemy had beene wholly ouerthrowne, had not the night with her darknesse beene fauourable to him. The next morrow by day-broke Paris marched freely against the enemy, and was already come to the mountaines, at such time as the enemy (being prouoked by shame) returned likewise to the fight.

This encounter continued with greater furie than the former, wherein diuers of the enemies were slaine ere they betooke themselves to flight, but at last they turned their backe, Paris being victorious pursued them thus disorderd. A thousand of the enemies were taken, and as many slaine. Italus after this ouerthrow, with much difficultie through by-waies, and steepe mountaines retired himselfe to Riusa d' Trente, whither likewise within a while after came three hundred horse, and a thousand foote which had escaped by diuers passages.

Piccinino hauing intelligence of the route of his forces assembled those troupes which wintered neere to Bressia, and speedily marched through the vale of Sabia, and ouer the tops of the mountaines to Lodron which he streightly besieged, so as after the fifteenth day of the siege he tooke it. Then he went to besiege Romana (for this towne did likewise belong to Paris) but finding it strong both by art & nature, & that there was a strong garrison in it, by reason that it was winter he raised his camp on the first day of Februarie, and sent his troupes to winter along the lake of Benac.

manner the ves-brought to the lake of Benac.

This in briefe was all that was done in the Alpes: whilest Lauretano hauing a long time in vaine expected forces from the Citie, went (because he would not haue it said that he had done nothing) and besieged the Citie of Sermone. Gonzaga had before (as hath bene said) carefully fortified that place, which could not be taken by so small a company. The Senators were suspected to haue refused to send supplies to Lauretano, rather through enuie than for want of meanes, which happened, for that they gaue care to sundry detractors, who were desirous rather to see Lauretano's fame to decrease, than to be augmented by any notable exploit. But he falling sicke by the disemperature of the aire, and waxing daily more and more weake, was brought to Venice, Stephano Contareni was sent in his steed.

Lauretano, after he had a while bene sicke, died, and was buried (according as he had appointed it by his last will and testament) in S. Helens Church, his heere before bare, a stone vnder his head, and without any funeral pompe.

Mellato, after he had taken Penetra, did not cease by letters to aduertize the Senate, that a way lay open to chase the enemies from the lake of Benac, whereby they might afterward with ease relieue Brescia. This businesse was verie difficult, and euerie man demanded how it would be done, and how a nauall Armie might be sent into that lake, seeing there was no forreist neere, nor any riuer whereby to bring the vessels. This consultation had for certaine daies troubled the Senate, when a certaine Candiot called Soripella, who (as I suppose) had viewed the places, went to the Senate, and told them that he wanted neither courage nor skill to transport the vessels from the Citie to the lake of Benac. This being thought by all men impossible for him to draw great vessels by maine strength about two hundred miles off, he was esteemed to be a foolish and idle fellow. But being afterwards knowne to be a man of an excellent wit, and still persevering in his opinion that it might be done if they would furnish him with necessaries for the purpose, the Senate gaue him leaue, and committed the businesse to him, who gladly accepting it, did presently fall to worke; all things necessarie for such an enterprize being supplied.

The vessels were drawne vp against the streame of the riuer Adice to Verona, from thence with great labour and traualle vnto the burrough of Mora, by Oxen tied together: And after that he had laid slipperie peeces of wood to make the Gallies slide on, (and yet Pasius maketh mention but of one Galley) it was drawne by strength of Men and Oxen through a plaine of fixe miles in length to S. Andrews lake, the other lesser vessels were carried in carts. Blondus saith that they drew two great Gallies, and three other smaller ones, and with them five and twentie small vessels: Some others who were present at that action, say that there were two great Gallies, one of which was scarce finished when they carried it from Venice.

Ouer this lake where the vessels were first brought, a rocke ierted forth much like to a wall, which to make smooth and euen great numbers of peasants were employed, who hauing throwne part of that stonie substance into the lake, made the place so leuell, as the vessels with all their tackling being by little and little drawne forth of the water, began to ascend the top of the next mountaine. For betwixt the two lakes there is a verie steepe mountaine, which on the bending thereof is cut through by a streame which runneth heere and there through rocks and precipices, through which the vessels were first to passe. These rocks being on euerie side made plaine, and the streame filled with boughes, and trunks of trees, with earth throwne vpon them, the way was made so euen, as rowlers being laid to slide the Gallies on, they were as easily drawne vp the hill as on the plaine. Those who haue viewed these places, do greatly wonder and can hardly beleue it, that so great a masse could be drawne through such craggie rocks, by any labour or skill whatsoeuer, were it not that certaine old steps and traces are there to be seene, which testifie to after-ages that such a thing was done.

It is reported that they had no lesse trouble in bringing them downe, than they had to get them vp: For all men feared least that the same huge weight being carried

ouer those precepices and steepe Rockes should fall and breake it selfe in peices. The third moneth after their departure from Venice, they came downe to Torbolles, where the Gallies being viewed they found that one of them had neede of trimming before they could launce it into the water. The residue of the Armie was embattailed at the mouth of the Riuer Sarca, which was enuironed with three ranks of piles in forme of a semi-circle for the better safetie thereof. The Venetians besides built a Fort at the going forth of the Riuer, to keepe the enemies who were reported to haue a Gallie and certaine Ganzafoles at Riuoltella, from comming to them. It was thought that the Senate did vnder take this enterprize rather to feede the Bressians with hope than for any opinion it had that those fellows would doe any seruice, in regard that there were in all places vpon the lake such great numbers of enemies as it was not only impossible to enter Brescia in despite of them, but they were much enuambred with care, how they might the Summer following keepe Verona and Vincenza from them.

The Venetians affaires were (without all doubt) in great danger, when they being thus dejected, fortune turned towards them and smiled. Philip had the most part of the winter deluded Sforza with promise to giue him his daughter Bianca to wife: But excusing himselfe sometimes by reason of his daughters indisposition of bodie, and afterwards by the shapess of the winter, hee did of set purpose delay the matter. But Sforza soon perceived his double dealing, and finding by his delays that he went about to deceiue him, he sent Troilo a trustie friend of his own to Milan, to found the meaning of Philip and his daughter; from whence he bringing him back nothing but words, in rage and choller he gaue care to the Venetians more than he had done. Within a while after there arose a new suspicion. For it is reported that at such time as Piccinino exhorted his Souldiers to assault Brescia, a certaine friend of his asked him, why he did expose himselfe and Souldiers to such a manifest danger, seeing he knew very well that the same Citie and all the rest should neuer be his, but were destined to Sforza as Philip's future heire. His reply was. It is all one, let your selfe and the rest only doe your best to take Brescia; for that being done, wee will be at La

Marca before this delicate bridegroom shall haue any suspicion thereof, and then I will play the bride, and ye young fellows shall be the dancers. This being reported to Sforza, he did not only hearken to the Venetians, but did forthwith dispatch messengers to Florence, whither (as wee haue said, according to Pasius) Francisco Barbado was sent.

Blondus saith that Giulio Donato was sent into Tuscany. The Florentines, although they were well assured, that Philip, so soon as the Venetians should be ouerthrowne, would presently come and assaile them, and notwithstanding that they were desirous by all meanes to withstand the Tyrants attempts, yet neuerthelesse, because they would hardly beleue that Sforza would forsake his Father-in-law, they were not easily drawne to enter into the ancient league with the Venetians. But being provoked by this alteration, and perswaded by Pope Eugenius who was then at Florence, they did on the eight day of Februarie conclude a league for five yeares with Sforza and the Venetians.

In this accord it was expressly mentioned that Sforza should be the allie of both those Common-weales, and General of all their forces, and that they should giue him pay for three thousand horse and two thousand foot: That the Venetians and Florentines should leaue such forces as hee should thinke fit for the manning of that warre. Nicholas D'Este was receiued into this alliance, with whome they concluded that hee should entertaine at the costs and charges of those two people Guido

Eugenius with fiftene hundred horse and three hundred foot, and his sonne Borsia with a thousand horse for that warre.

I find in Montanus commentaries that two hundred and twentie thousand Ducats were appointed for Sforza's pay, whereof the Florentines were to giue fourescore and ten thousand, and the Venetians the rest: And besides, that whatsoeuer they should take from Philip should be giuen to Sforza, (Cremona excepted) which should returne to the Venetians, and if they should take none other Citie but Cremona, that then it should be allotted to the Generall. For the rest it was expressly concluded that Sforza should presently passe into Lombardie, to free the Venetians from the warre there. Pisino saith that the league was renewed in Tuscanie during the siege of Brescia; But if it were concluded on the eighth of Februarie (as Blondus saith) I cannot see how that could be done, seeing it is certaine that the siege before Brescia was raised before Ianuarie, although it was afterwards much molested by the Garrisons round about it, and the waies stoppt by the enemies, so as actually nor reliefe could come to them. But whether it were then (as hee saith) or afterwards; it is certaine that Philip was mightily daunted when hee understood of his sonne-in-lawes revolt.

But Pisino not thinking it fit to remporize, or to tarrie till the Venetians forces should be augmented by Sforza's coming, beganne to treat with the Prince of Mantua concerning the passage of the Adice. There was some likelihood that it would auail Philip's affaires, if the warre might be transported into the Paduan or Vincenzan Territories. Now this seemed easie to be done, if entering into either of the Countries, they might on a sodaine surprize some towne or other. This was reported to be the Mantuans plot, who thought it fit to find the warre farre from his owne Gates, and to draw those vessels which were vpon the Po neare to Sermo-20 na, (for by the Senates commandement Contareni had brought backe the nauall Armie to Chioggia) by the Riuer Tartar into the marshes and lakes of the enemies, and then from thence to transport them by land, (if it could not be done by water) into the Riuer Adice. Mellato by his spies hauing intelligence herreof, did sundrie times aduertize the Prince and Senate, aduising them forthwith to send a nauall Armie into the Adice.

In the meane time they were not quiet neare to the lake of La Garda. Pietro Ze-30 no Generall of the Nauall Armie which lay at Torbolles comming forth by little and little from the Hauen, did in such sort open the way to his Countrymen on that part of the lake which is betwixt Torbolles and the mouth of Ponal, as through the crooked windings of the mountaines, by which the Riuer falleth headlong into the lake, hauing to that end cut the solid rocke in forme of staires, he caused some small quantitie of corne to be carried vpon mens shoulders, first over the high mountaines, and from thence to Brescia.

But whilest these things past in Lombardie newes came from the Ambassadors that were in Tuscanie and La Marca that the league was renewed. It is reported that the letters and the accord being read and seene in the Senate, it was differently received, according to euerie mans humour. Diuers murmured, and often told those that approued it, that they should beware that some deceit did not lurke in that new league: That they were not pleased with that which the Florentines had 40 set downe conditionally: That they thought it more necessari to make peace with Philip (if they might obtaine it) although it were to their disadvantage, than to thrust the Republike into danger. These complaints had moued the Senate, and diuers seemed to be of opinion that the league newly made with Sforza and the Florentines was of no force, had not the Princes graue speech confirmed the Senators who were in some sort estranged.

The Princes speech concerning the league.

In the rebuke the Senatours say their inconstancie, who so inconsiderately had repented them of the accord so much desired: Hee told them that they needed make no feare and suspect the Florentines, who had freely embraced warre to please the Venetians, but that they ought rather to account them minisfull and not ingratefull for the benefits which they had in former times received, as men that did remember how by the Venetians aide they had in time past beaten 50 Philip their enemies from their Gates: That this then was an acknowledgement of that which was past, and no deceit: That they should beware least they rashly lost so goodly an occasion offered for the preservation of their state which came rather by diuine miracle than by any humane device or counsel. That he verie plainly perceived, that by that meane only specified in the accord, and not by any other, the State of the Republike might be preserved and maintained in so wretched and dangerous a season: He willed them then to rest satisfied, and if they were desirous of the publike good to embrace that alliance, which did not only bring them speedie reliefe but likewise opened them a way to obtaine a gallant victorie.

The Princes speech was of such force, as hauing forthwith chaunged their 50 mindes, they did generally approue whatsoeuer their Commissioners had negotiated; and decreed besides, that the Ratification sealed with the golden Seale should be sent to Florence and to La Marca. The Senate moreover leuied great summes of money, the most part whereof was by the accord appoynted for Sforza. They did afterwards raise forces ouer all Italie. Cristoforo and Giuanni Tollerino were sent for: These men came by sea to Chioggia, for by land they could not come by reason of the rebellion of Rauenna.

Whilest the Venetians made these preparations, Pisino with his troupes was come to the riuer Adice, where attempting to crosse it he was affronted with Andrea Donato on the opposit shoare; who being newly returned to Florence, was 30 sent to command in Padua, with Ieronimo Contareni in his company. Gonzaga in the meane time caufed eight Gallies which hee had made at Hofilia, to passe at the mouth of the riuer Tartar, hauing first for that purpose with great labour opened the Channell, and brought them into the Fennes which lie betwixt Legnaga and the cawsey of the Po; and it behoued him not onely to cleanse the Channell, but after all the mudd was taken out which lay betwixt the Riuer and the Fennes to make a great deepe dike, and through that to make a passage into the Riuer Adice. This riuer, the cawseis being broken downe, did emprise a great part of it selfe into those Fennes at the Borough of Castagnaria, fortie stadj beneath Legnaga, and at the place called Malapietra. But the Venetians had before stoppt vp those Passages 40 with strong Rampires, and placed great numbers of small light vessels to defend them, vnder the command of Martino Contareni, and Lodouico de Molino.

Now the enemies first attempts were at Castagnaria, where vling meanes to breake downe those obstacles, Molino and Contareni did valiantly withstand them. The enemy hauing begunne the skirmish, and perceiving that hee preuailed nothing, and that the shoare on the other side was kept by those whom Donato had brought thither in halt, hauing about sunne-set made a fruitlesse brauado hee departed thence about midnight, and failed to Malapietra; where being arriued, and the banks beaten downe, he did without any difficultie put eight Gallies into the Riuer Adice, and landed a thousand men vpon the shore, the most part of whom were 50 Archers. Donato contemning so small a number of enemies, as though hee were assured easily to vanquish them, to the end he might fight with them at his own pleasure, resolved to tarrie a little beneath the bridge of Balde, where whilest he embattailed his forces, Tibertino Brandolino did fiercely march against the enemies which were past. The Captaines likewise of the Nauall Armie hauing followed the ene-mie, beganne a cruell fight in the middest of the Riuer, where Contareni fighting valiantly was slaine, being stricken through the bodie with a dart, and Brandolino was sore wounded in the right legge. But at last the enemies being out of hope to passe that way, they retired to Sanguaneta, and afterwards sailed towards the Riuer Busset, where with six thousand Peasants they did vnder-take to cutt trench into the Adice, the which being filled by night by the Venetian Souldiers who came thither in small boates, made them to change their determination, and to vnder-take a matter almost like to the former: which was to cleanse and empty the ancient channell of Panegia. And to the end the Venetians should not hinder this worke, as they had lately done the other, they went and incamped at Angleria, an house of pleasure in the Countrey two miles from Legnaga, vpon the high way towards Verona.

The Mantuan Gallies passe to the Riuer Adice.

This trench being drawne from Panegia to the Riuer Adice, the enemye beganne to bring his Gallies into the Riuer. But whilst his fleet lay at Molinetto, the Venetians did extraordinarily elect (without casting lots) Dario Maripietro to command their Nauall Armie. Mellato, who lay at Penetra, being sent for, halted thither with eight thousand Horse, and sixe thousand foote: howbeit some Authors mention not halfe so many. Maripietro was come to Legnaga with five and thirtie Gallies taken from that Nauall Armie, which (as we haue said) by the Senates command had been brought backe forth of the Riuer Po to Chioggia. Picimino had planted fortie peeces of Ordnance vpon the bankes of Adice, to terrifie Molino's nauall Armie, and to keep it from hindring the arriuall of the Vessells, which they were drawing from Panegia and the old Channell into the Riuer. This being considered by Mellato, after that he had embattailed his troupes vpon the other shore, he aduertized Maripietro and Molino forthwith to saile vp the Riuer, and that the enemye, if the nauall Armie did not withstand it, would passe on in despite of him. Molino beleued it, and with his owne vessells and five Gallies of Dario's which followed him, hee passed on beyond the enemies Armie, and the mouth of Panegia. Some say that one of his Gallies being pierced by the enemies Ordnance was taken: which being perceived by Dario, he was so amazed as he could by no means be perswaded to follow Molino; Picimino perceiving the Venetians amazement, did forthwith cause the Ordnance to be drawn from thence where it was planted at the enemies commaing. In regard whereof Dario and Molino not knowing what to resolve on, nor yet daring, being so diuided, to assaile the enemye, each of them fought by all meanes how to auoide the frequent shot of the Ordnance: by meanes whereof the enemye at his owne leisure put his Vessells into the Adice: whereat they that stood vpon the opposite shore being affrighted, beganne to flie disorderly not abiding the enemye.

Diuers hold that Mellato was Author of that base flight, but the greater part lay the fault on Donato. Two things there are which induce mee to beleue that it was rather the Venetians fault; first, the authoritie of Pasius of Arimini, who saith that Donato had sent word to Mellato to forsake the Riuer bankes, and to retire with his troupes into a place of more safetie: and the second is, because I finde that hee was within a while after cited at the request of the Aduocates Fiscall for that matter. Those which affirme that Mellato by Donato's commandement did quit the shore, stick not likewise to say that Christoforo Tollerentino was sent to Verona with a companie of men at armes; Tiberto Brandolino to Montagnane with his Cauallerie; Giovannini, brother to Christoforo to Vincenza; and that Mellato with the residue of his armie went and encamped at the Baths of Abana.

Picimino bessege Legnaga.

The enemye hauing entred the Adice, and comming to besiege Legnaga, he first of all seized vpon the bridges, where Carolo Gonzaga a couragious yong man did valiantly behaue himselfe. Legnaga is diuided (as it were) into two Townes, which are ioyned together by a bridge vpon the Riuer. That part towards the East is called the Hauen; which being assaulted by the enemye was easily wonne; and at the other he found better resistance. This place was kept by the Chioggians that lay there there in Garrison, whom the Venetians had found to be confident and loiall. Frederico Contareni, and Pietro Quirini, were there likewise with other Gentlemen. Some there are that in stead of Pietro Quirini set downe Andrea Mocengo, who were all sent thither for the guard of that place. But, as it often happeneth, when fortune once beginneth to decline, theee cannot be staied, neither by counsell nor any reason what soeuer: euen so it came to passe that by the sodaine yeelding of the Townes-men, these men, together with the Chioggians, fell into the enemies power.

Legnaga being taken, Picimino and Gonzaga began to scoure the Vincenzan and Paduan Territories. They found a while some resistance at Balde; but that once taken, with wonderfull good successe they became masters of Longina, Brendole, Montechia, Arciniane, Montorse, Valderfing, and Dagne. Diuers places besides on the Mountaines yeelded vnto them. But all these Townes in a manner were wholly of the Territories of Vincenza. Vpon that of Verona, Soaue with all her dependances was taken by the enemies. Picimino being proud of this successe brought his Campe neare to Verona, whither Gonzaga likewise came with all his forces.

At this stay stood the Venetians affaires along the Riuer Adice, when as they fought with better successe vpon the lake of La Garda. Italus of Friull laic at Sales with a great cauallerie, and diuers foot companies, being followed by many of the Gybelline faction of the Bressan Countrey. With these forces he fought by all meanes how to driue the Venetian from Maderna, Penetra and Torbolles. Pietro Anagadre with a great troupe of Guelphes was there readie to withstand their attempts. They fought cruelly at Maderna; for this Towne likewise did at the same time belong to the Venetians. Zeno, who commanded the Venetian Nauall Armie, did approach so neare to the place of battaile, as his Souldiers being landed had their share in it. The fight lasted from three a clocke in the morning till late in the evening. At which time Italus by little and little retiring his forces from the battaile, and conducting them through a very narrow way hanging ouer the lake, Zeno with his vessells pursued them with arrow-shot and did greatly infect them by reason of the commodiousnesse of the place. In the meane time Anagadre did straightly presse the Rereward, and with great slaughter staied it. The enemies being then gauled behind and in flanke with great multitudes of arrows, did in disorder betake themselves to flight. The victorious Venetian gaue them chase, slew many of them, and took diuers prisoners: great numbers of peasants were there slain. About foure hundred prisoners were taken; among whom were fiftie Gentlemen. Italus by fauour of the night escaped to Sales.

SFORZA through the Countries of Flaminia and Ferrara leadeb great troups first to Chioggia, and then to the Paduan Territorie. MELLATO ioyneb with SFORZA. The Venetian passing ouer the mountaines causeth the enemye to raise his Campe from before Verona. PICININO with all his forces retirab beyond the Riuer Adice. The Venetians Naual Armie is put to rout vpon the lake of La Garda. PICININO is defeated by might in the vale of Lodron. SFORZA neuer but aide vnguiseth the enemies at Thienna. PICININO and the Mantuan surpris Verona, but not the Castle. SFORZA recuereb Verona thirte dayes after it was lost. Brestia in the middle of winter is vittualled by the way of the mountaines. MELLATO faileth sick. PICININO sendeth forces into Tuscanie against the Florentines.

SFORZA was in the meane time come from La Marca with diuers braue men in his companie, among whom werē Alessandro, Giouanni, and Leon his brethren, Roberto Sanseuerino, Dominico Malateste, Lodouico Duke of Hadria, to whose daughter hee was betrothed, Francisco Ortonio, with many other notable Captaines. From Esia which was the Rendezvous they came to the temple of Fortune, and from thence to Arimini, where mustering his troups hee found Guido Faentino to bee wanting, who was gone to the contrarie side: which when he vnderstood, for a time he remained doubtfull with what place he should first begin. For he perceived it to be Philips practise by that new enemye to stop his passage into Lombardie. But being sodain in his resolutions, supposing that there was nothing which could more auale their intended iourne (seeing they were of necessitie by Armes to win themselves a passage to the Venetians camp) than to take Rauenna and Forlimpopoli from the enemye, from whence he might open himselfe a very short way into Lombardie, hee beleeued Forlimpopoli, & enforced them to yeeld the second day of the siege. From thence marching towards Rauenna, speedy newes was brought him that the enemies had crossed the Adice, and taken in a manner from the Venetians whatsoever they they possessed on both sides the Riuer, (Verona and Vincenza excepted) and that those of Verona were straightly beleiged; that the Paduans and Vincenzans, hauing expelled their Garrisons had mutined; and that vnlesse he made halt, it was to be feared that all would fall into the enemies hands.

But it is reported, that concerning the commotions in those two Cities, it was made by the Souldiers, who by ouermuch libertie did spoile and rob the wretched Towne-men, as though they had beene enemies taken in warre. As for the Paduans, if by reason of these outrages they tooke Armes, they were presently appeased at the Gouernours comming. But those of Vincenza being troubled vpon the like occasion, hauing driuen away the Garrison, said, That they were loyall to the Venetians; that they needed no forraigne forces to keepe them; that their constancie and loialtie was well known to the Senate; and that by those Rampiers their Citie would bee better guarded against the enemies attempts, than by any Mercinarie succour.

Mellato vpon the first report thereof went thither, greatly commending the Vincenzans, and exhorted them still to perseuer in their ancient loue and loialtie, and gaue them leaue, according to their owne desire, to guard their Citie them selues. These newes being greater in apparence than in effect, caused Sforza to change his minde, so that leauing the way of Rauenna, he returned speedily to the bridge of Roncanes. Then hauing enforced Guido, and Francisco, sonnes to Picinino, to retire to Forli with a great caualerie, he departed the fifth day after, & by the Bolognese Territorie, he came to Bondina. From thence hauing sent all his baggage by the Po to Chioggia, he marched by Ferrara, which was opened to him to Goria, and presently after to Hadria, (whereof the neighbour-sea taketh the name.) It was a Citie belonging to the Tuscanis, and for a long time very rich: But thus much I thought good to speake by the waie, because I would haue no man thinke, that the Adriatick Sea did take name of that Hadria which is in La Marca.

The cause of the commotion of Padua and Vincenza.

From whence the Adriatick Sea taketh the name.

Now this mightie Arme came sooner than it was looked for to the Venetians aide vpon the Paduans Territorie, notwithstanding that it was to passe foure great Riuers. First they made a bridge at Goria ouer one of the Armes of Po, on two and thirte long boates strongly ankored, and vpon them long planks were laid couered with sand, with strong Railes on both sides, for feare lest the horses being frighted with the shaking of the bridge, should fall into the water, and twelue vessells strongly armed, were appointed for the guard thereof, to the end, that if the enemye should come downe the Riuer to make any attempt, they might defend and guard the bridge.

It is reported that Sforzas troups held it for a prodigie, because that on a sodaine the Po did in such sort swell as it had almost ouer-flowed the bankes, and with the inundation had like to haue drowned the Campe which lay not far from the Riuer, and also forthat great numbers of Serpents had gotten into the Souldiers cabins. The other passage was at the Fornaces, on foure and fortie boates made verie fast together: And because that place was more commodious for the enemye to place an Ambush, twelue Gallies well armed with an hundred archers a peece were appointed for the defense of the bridge. The third was at the mouth of the Adice neere to the Fossioni, composed of fourescore small boates, & that being passed, the troups were conducted along the Sea-side to Brondolles, where the Arme did likewise passe. But because that passage was verie broad, the bridge was likewise made longer than the rest, containing 90. vessells. Sforza being from thence come to the Haue of Chioggia found three hundred small vessells, ready to transport the troups to the firme Land, with the horse and foot companies, who were with a faire wind carried through the Lakes, which are betwixt the Sea and the Land. Manie tooke great delight, and especially the Generall, who was well acquainted with Land Armes, but not with Sea Fleets, to see at one time three hundred saile floting vp and downe, with more than a thousand other small boates of all sortes, dispersed heere and and there abroad, which were come to meet him; some to offer him their seruice; others with a desire to see him; some were likewise sent in the Common-wealths name to congratulate his happie passage, and to present him with rich gifts. The Armie being landed vpon the Paduan Territorie, they numbred six thousand two hundred fortie four horse, and sixteen hundred footmen. Those which make the number lesse, set downe but four thousand horse, and two thousand foote.

So soone as Sforza saw his Armie on the firme Land, he desired nothing more than to ioine his forces with those of Mellato, and with the rest wherefoeuer they were that did belong to the Venetians, that he might presently march to fight with the enemy: Mellato likewise hauing intelligence of Sforza's arriual, did not delay to come and meete him, but the verie next day after his arriual he came to him with twelue thousand horse and foot. Some say that these two Captaines did ioine their forces together vpon the Colonois Territorie, where a generall muster being made, they found the Armie to consist of foureteeen thousand horse, and eight thousand foote.

But during all these warlike preparations, the Bressians were no lesse tormented with plague and famine, than with the continuall assaults of the enemies. For two thousand men whom Italus had left not farre off from the Citie, did in such sort disturb them by their ordinarie incursions, as they within the Citie had no more rest, than when they were besieged by Picinino and Gonzaga. The Inhabitants being oppressed with so many miseries would without all doubt haue yielded at last, had not Barbaro by a wonderfull providence foreseen all these difficulties. For it is recorded, That there was nothing whatsoever could be imagined, whereby to giue hope to the Citizens, and to containe them in their duties, which readily hee did not execute, so as it is scarce credible, in what manner and how great summes of money he raised from sundrie places to paie the Garrison. For from Venice none could come to them: all the waies and passages being intercepted. As also it was very admirable what meanes he vsed together with the aide of Pietro Anagadre, for the bringing in of so great a quantitie of nuts, roots, chestnuts, and other sorts of fruits as he drew from the inhabitants of the Mountaines therewith to slack the hunger of the Citizens: And it is almost impossible to be belieued how often he deceived the enemy, feigning one thing, and dissembling an other; and with what patience he could temporize with that froward multitude in a time of so great scarcitie. He refused not to conuerse and talke with al men, and namely with those whose houses he knew to be infected with the Pestilence: for that contagious sicknesse was so disperfed ouer that wretched Citie, as there was no daie, but it buried more than three score persons: his Gates were open at all houres, and he did euer eat in publike; & yet during that miserable time, there was neuer seene any bread of Wheat vpon his table, but either of Rie or Barley. Some say that he did at times bring forragers into the Citie in fied of victuallers, with sacks full of Straw and other substance, to put the inhabitants in hope of some new kinde of foode; hee did moreover priuily cause arrows with small skrowles about them to be stuck in the steeples and high Towers of the Citie, as if they had been shot thither by some friends of theirs, which did aduertize them not to expect any fauor of the enemy, for he had vowed, if euer he did enter Bressia, wholly to ruine it, and to put all the inhabitants with their wiues and children to the edge of the sword. By these artificiall dealings he did not only defend the Citie committed to his keeping, but had gouerned matters in such sort, as the Bressians termed him the Father of their Countrie.

At the last, at Pietro Anagadre's returne, & vpon assurance of aid from the mountaines, hauing on a sodaine assailed the Fortes, the one at Santa Croce, and the other at Mompiana, he caused them to be razed downe to the ground: The Bressians being encouraged by this successe, (for Italus was encamped at Castagnedola the better to free himselfe from the infected aire) determined to besiege Sales, supposing that it would come to passe, that they besieging it by Land, and the Venetians nauall Armie by water, the Salodians would be inforced to yelde, either by composition, or force. For this purpose Thadeo d'Este with three hundred horse of the remainder of those which had bin left with him for the guard of Bressia; Pietro Anagadre with three hundred Mountainiers, and Theofalmo with six hundred fouldiers met at Gaurada. Italus hauing intelligence of the enemies designe, marched to Feliciano, whither those of Bressia went fiercely to assaile him. But hee hauing speedily displayed his ensignes, came forth, and beganne the fight vnder the towne-walls, which continuing from day-broke til noone with equall valour on either side, both parties being tired, they beganne a soft retraite; but as the Venetians retired, the enemy came vpon them with such furie, as hee disordered them and put them to rout. Thadeo hauing lost many of his fouldiers, did without any stay gallop into Piedmont, from whence returning soone after to Gaurada, hee went with those forces which Barbaro had assembled forth of the Bergamese for feate of greater losse, to besiege and take the Fort which the enemies had built at Saint Euphemias.

On these termes stood the affaires of the Bressians, when as Sforza being ioined with Mellato (as hath bin said) marched against the enemies which besieged Verona, who with their ordnance furiously battered it. But they being assured of his coming, presently sent away their Artillerie and baggage into the Mantuan Countrey, raised their campe, and went to Soaue, which is a Towne lying on the Veronois territorie. In that place they fortified themselves, and drew a trench from the next marshes vnto the riuier Adice, which they strengthened with diuers towers and rampires, so as those Forts being wel defended, there was no likelihood that Sforza could passe forward to relieue Verona, Bressia, and Bergamo.

Sforza in the meane time besieged Longina, and took it the same day, the spoile whereof he gaue to his fouldiers (as Palsus saith). Blondus writeth that it endured diuers assaults, and that it was brauely defended, in which assault Pietro Brunora and Troillo, two of Sforza's speciall friends were slaine; the one with a dart, and the other with an harquebuzé-shot; whereupon being inflamed with choler, he caused all his forces to assaile it, intending not onely to lacke the Towne, but wholly to raze it: For preuenting whereof the townsmen did voluntarily yield themselves, and thereby auoided all further mischief. The enemies forces lay not farre thence, and yet during the assaults giuen vnder their noses, they durst not once stirre.

This towne being recovered, Sforza in a square batallion marched against the enemies, and in their view ordered his squadrons, offering them battell. But they hauing answered that they would not fight before the new Moone, hee perceived their feare, and marched away to recouer the townes vpon the Vincenzan territorie, diuers of which hee tooke in a short space, hauing promised them all fauour and impunitie. Some say, that then, and not before, the enemy camped at Soaue, resolving after the losse of all other places, to keep that, as most commodious, the better to withstand Sforza, on what side soeuer he would turne to march to Verona. And because that trench drawne from the Marshes could not be forced without great slaughter, Sforza and the rest resolved to goe to Verona by the way of the mountaines. He came to Ronques called s. Johns before Picinino had any notice of his resolution.

Tollentino and those that lay in garrison in Verona, fallying forth on a sodaine (which they were expressely commanded to doe) hauing fired certaine Forts which Philips forces had built neere to the Citie, did place garrisons of their owne fouldiers in two of them, which they had then forced. Sforza in the meane time being incamped at Ronques, skirmished with Picinino neare to the forts which he had before assured on the toppe of the mountaines: At the beginning Sforza's troups were shaken, but Troillo and Nicholas Pijani, being forthwith sent with a great squadron of horse against the enemies, the fight became equall, and Picinino in the night being retired with his troups to Soaue; Sforza without anie greater resistance ascended cended the mountaines towards Verona. The Venetians being come to the top, Picimino for a time followed the troupes, that he might with strong garrisons defend the Townes and Castles which he had taken in the neighbour-hilles, abstaining by all meanes from fight. For Sforza had left him no place fit for an ambuscado, and was farre superiour to him in number of souldiours.

The number of the enemies say, and that of the Venetians.

Blondus who onely makes mention of the mercenarie souldiers, saith that there were foureteene thousand men in the enemies campe, and sixetene thousand in that of the Venetians; howbeit in the one Armie as well as the other there were great numbers of Bilognos or fresh-water souldiours. Sforza being come to Verona, would not lodge in the Citie, but incamped certaine furlongs from it, neere to the high way of Hostilia. Some say that hee went and incamped in the field of Mars, which is neere the Citie-walles, and that vpon the report that hee did meane to passe ouer Adice, Picimino (who remained neere to Porcilia) did sodainly crosse the Riuer, and retired to Vigalio vpon the Mantuan confines with all his troupes. And then thereupon Sforza returning from whence he came, besieged Soaue; and hauing taken it, in a short space he recovered all the townes on the other side of the Riuer Adice, Legnaga excepted.

The union of the Greek church with the Latins.

Whilest these things happened neere to Verona, the vnion of the Greek church with that of Rome infused loone after. This busines after a long and serious disputation, being debated in the Assemblie at Ferrara, was by the assistance of the holy Ghost brought to a happie end. For it was found that those two Nations more learned than the rest, did agree in that wherein they seemed to dissent; but with sundrie circumlocutions.

The great ex- to emite of the citie of Brescia.

All the Townes which the enemy possessed on the hither side of the Riuer being recovered (as hath bin said) the Venetian armie drew neere to the lake of Benac and besieged Bardolin, in regard that all Sforza's designs with those of his associates tended onely by some meanes to open the lake, it being the onely way whereby Bressia could be releued, the which was reduced to all extremitie by famine and pestilence. For beside the great losse it had sustained during the siege, the contagious sickenes had taken away fise thousand men: Famine moreover did now afflict them more than before, hearbs and rootes, wherewith they had bin a long time fed, beginning to faile them. The rumor was, that this Citie oppressed with so many miseries, would shortly yeelde, if by the opening of the Lake it were not speedily relieved with men and victualles: And because the enemies nauall armie was in some sort stronger than that of the Venetians, Zeni durst not come neere Bardolin which his Country-men besieged. Whereupon Sforza perceiuing that hee did no great good there (in regard the inhabitants were relieved by the Lake) raised his campe.

Now because his coming hither had been to no great purpose, Caulacabon, Guerrieri, Martiano, and Gionanni el Conte, Roman Gentlemen, were sent with a thousand horse and three hundred foot to relieue Bressia with men and victualles. These men being come through the vale of Sabia into Piedmont, were desirous before they entered into the Citie to feede their horses in a meadow, which were wearied with their long journey. Barbaro in the meane time hauing determined to burne part of the enemies nauall Armie that lay at Sales, sent Thadeo d'Este, Andrea Valerio, and Andrea Leon thither: Zeni Admirall of the Venetians fleet was likewise commaunded to be there, and to assaile the enemy.

Picimino and Gonzaga hauing intelligence as well of this designe of the enemy, as of the arrivall of the victualles, did secretly depart from Vigalio with two hundred horse, and by Pescara came to Feliciana, where they ioynd with Lodouico Sanseuerino and Italus of Friull: who being commaunded to follow them, they fell vpon the Venetian caualerie which still remained in Piedmont, brake them, and despoiled them of all their baggage, and taking some prisoners, put the rest to flight who escaped to the Citie. From thence marching against the rest who were coming ming to the Lake, they diuided themselves into three bands. Sanseuerino embarking himselfe in the vessells, was commanded to fight vpon the water; Italus with the footmen to goe vp to the mountaines of Maderna; and Gonzaga together with Picimino to conduct the caualerie by the way which lieth betwixt the Lake and the mountaines. In this maner the enemies nauall Armie did assaile that of the Venetians. Thadeo vpon this rumour made haste with his troupes, that hee might come to the timely rescue of his Country-men; but the enemies with great cries fell vpon the Venetians in front and in flanke. Thadeo being incompassed on euerie side, vied all meanes to preserve his souldiers; yet neuerthelesse, the nauall Armie and those that fought on land, were in a moment defeated by the enemy: The Venetians nauall armie consisted of two gallies, foure brigantines, seuen ganzariones, and other vessells, two of which ganzariones at the beginning of the fight fled to Torbolles. All the rest with Zeni their Generall fell into the enemies hands. Thadeo likewise was taken prisoner, with Valerio and Leon the Prouidators.

This ouerthrow was accompanied with an other. For the next day after this unfortunate battell, the enemy tooke the Castle of Maderna. It is reported that Sforza had a long time before foreseene this defeat, and had often aduertised the Senate to send supplies to the Lake, and that if they did not, it was to be feared that their nauall Armie there would be defeated by the enemy. But hee did speedily assure Torbolles and Penetra by a strong garrison; for feare lest the enemy being proud of that victorie, should sodainly march to surprize them. This ouerthrow being reported at Venice did greatly trouble the Senate; and yet because they would shew no signes of discouragement, they presently resolved to send a new fleet into the Lake, but after an other fashion than the former, namely, to send to Torbolles in six hundred cartes all the substance and matter wherewith to make them, which they had in readines, and there, as in an haven neere to the water, to make eight gallies, as manie gallions, and foure brigantines. All the workmen of the Venetians ships were sent thither speedily to make an end of the worke.

The enemies take the Castle of Maderna.

A new venetian Army for the lake.

Stefano Contareni was chosen Generall of that Armie, and in euerie gallie a Secretary was appointed to command. They did besides send certaine moneths pay for the souldiers to the campe. All this was done in a manner during that Summer. Autumne was already come, which being subiect to diseases had in a short space infected the third part of the armie with agewes, whereupon Sforza with his troupes retired to Gibeta. The enemy was incamped at Vigalio, where his Armie was no lesse afflicted with sickness, for besides Agewes, the plague was crept into it. The Senate taking great care to free the Bressians from danger, wrote to Sforza, and earnestly intreated him if it were possible, before he sent his Armie to winter, to relieue that loyall Citie with men and victuals. And for the safetie and assurance of that which he should leaue behind him, the Senate resolved to turne backe the Riuer of Adice into the olde channell, so soone as it should be cleaned, some foure miles beneath Legnaga. For that being done, it was certaine, that waters running in that maner ouer the Countrey, would make the Paduan, Vincenzan and Verona territories which lie on the farther side of the Riuer, more assured against the enemies incursions, and would besides be verie commodious for those that should saile to Verona. Foure thousand pioners were employed in this worke.

The Senate care for the Bressians.

Contareni in the meane time (for they could not bring masts for the shippes so farre) being come to the Carpe, went to the mountaines of Trent, with skilfull workmen to view those Forrests, and to see if there were anie trees in it of that height fit to make masts. All men were of opinion, that hee might there furnish himselfe, not onely with masts, but all other matters necessarie for manie vessells: whereupon, hee caused sixe hundred Carpenters to come thither, besides the great numbers which he had already brought with him.

Picimino who had intelligence of those great preparations, that he might in some sort frustrate the enemies designs, did about the shutting in of the euening depart depart from the Citie of Riua (whither he was secretly come) marching along the lake, through a secret and almost vnknowne way, he attempted to set fire on a Galley which was newly made. Troillo by chance had the guard of that place, who not onely withstood the enemy, but comming valiantly to the fight, made good his partie. Picinino being in the midst of the throng beaten from his horse, and being remounted, did hardly escape, having lost three hundred men. Sforza hauing notice thereof, fearing lest the enemy with greater forces would returne to end what he had begun, commanded Mellato to go with his troups to guard those places, who being come thither, caused his souldiers to make a wall of stones without any mortar, extending from the lake to the hills of Riua, of two hundred paces long, and of twelve foot high, and as many in breadth, with a Fort on the top of the hill builded of the same matter, heaped vp together in forme of a wall, and with diuers small towers. These places being guarded with small forces, were able to assure the vessels which were then at Torbolles, and as many as should be there afterwards, against all the enemies attempts.

Now whilst they were preparing the nauall Armie, and that the turning aside of the riuer Adice was by a new aduise interrupted, Sforza resolved to send victualles to Bressia by the mountaines. Wherefore hauing at Torbolles and Penetra made great provision of corne, and hoping either by entreaties or money to winne the Lords of these mountaines, or if that failed to open himselfe a passage by force of Armes, he came forth of Penetra with three thousand horse, and a thousand foote of the choicest in the whole Armie, and went and encamped within halfe a mile of Thyenna. He did besides carrie with him certaine great peeces of Ordnance meaning with them to batter some townes if occasion should serue. But whilst he remained neere to Thyenna, Philips forces who had discouered the enemies designs being come to Riua, did on a sodaine seize on the vale of Lodron: and Picinino and Sanfuerino hauing left eight hundred foot, and three hundred horse in the forrest of Thyenna to guard those passages, they went backe againe with the residue of their troups.

to rout.*

In the meane time Martiano and Giuanni el Conte, being sent by Sforza had ambushed themselves with all the cavallerie at the end of the lake which is in that valley, and there lay in great silence expecting the enemies arrivall. Now so soone as Picinino and the rest drew neere them, the Venetians gave a charge, whereupon there began a cruell fight. Martiano's troups did not onely continue the fight all day long but a great part of the night: for when day-light failed, they fired the neighbour houses, and by that light fought so long till Picinino being wearie and tyred began by little and little to retire. But in the retreat the Venetians charged him with such furie, as they did forthwith put him to rout, hauing lost all his cavallerie, and the greatest part of his Infanterie, and himselfe getting vp to the top of the mountain Ponall, which looketh vpon the lake of La Garda, and by the helpe of an Almaine (whom he still kept neere him for such purposes) with much difficultie escaped those fearefull precipices. At length being come to the bankes of the lake, he embarked himselfe in a poore boat, and went to Riua. Sanfuerino in great feare escaped through the mountaines with twentie horse to Maderna: Four score of the chiefe prisoners were by Barbaro his commandement brought to Bressia.

Picinino nothing daunted with this overthrow, taking Sanfuerino along with him, presently marched to seize vpon the pace of Thyenna. Sforza was already vpon the mountaines, resolving to passe forward, although it were through the midst of the enemies. Thyenna is seated vpon an high hill, there being on either side of it dangerous precipices in one of which on the right side of the towne standeth a Castell strong by art and nature; the left side is verie barren and craggie. The enemy with a companie of footmen seized on that place. Carolo Gonzaga had embattailed his cavallerie forth of the Citie gates: The Venetians Generall stayed at the foot of the hill, where the enemies footmen were encamped, where he perceived that that the passages being on euery side kept by the enemy, he could not passe without fight. Thus standing amazed, not being reloued by what meanes to passe through the enemies, he did from farre descrie a fresh band of men at Armes comming from Riua to Thyenna. And supposing that the enemy had sent for the residue of his troups which lay at Vigasio, he did on a sodaine cause Troillo with all the cavallerie to march against Gonzaga, and then turning himselfe towards his Infanterie (of whom he had euer a braue band neere vnto him for his guard,) he shewed them the toppe of the mountaine which was couered with armed men, and did earnestly exhort and entreat them, That if they did desire to be accounted such as he had euer esteemed them, if they would euer acknowledge those many benefits which they had received from him, if (in a word) they were desirous, as became loyall and valiant souldiers, to execute some generous action in his presence, that they should by that daies valour purchase immortal glorie and renoune, and march courageously against the enemies, who being defeated and overthrowne, they should not onely preserve a Citie most loyall to the Venetians, but open themselves a way to obtaine a gallant victorie.

In this manner did he speake vnto them, and then marched vp towards the hill at the head of the Armie with a pike in his hand. And although the souldiers did with great difficultie march vp that craggie and steepe mountaine, yet neuertheless being animated by their Generals speech and presence, they mounted to the top thereof. Then Sforza shewing them his friend Troillo valiantly fighting neere to the Citie, he did entreat them to make hast, and to take from the cavallerie the honor of that victorie. Afterwards running to an high place from whence he might be seene and heard of his souldiers, he began with a cheerefull voice to call out aloud, sometimes to Troillo, then to Nicolas Pisani and the rest, willing them to breake the enemies Armie with a close battallion, telling them that himselfe with a troupe of footmen had beaten the enemies from the top of the mountaine.

Then turning towards his Infanterie, and running to encourage them, he perceived his souldiers a farre off to throw the enemies into those fearefull precipices, and with a cheerefull voyce shaking his pike, he said vnto them, On, on, my valiant fellows, charge and pursue this fearefull enemy on euery side, that he may no more returne to the battaile: and hauing done thus to the foot forces, he returned to encourage the Cavallerie.

The Victorie in that place was somewhat difficult by reason of the arrivall of certaine companies of men at armes, but when they understood that the Garrison had bene throwne headlong downe the mountaine, the enemies beganne to giue backe. In this bickering Cesar Martinenga fighting valiantly in the midst of the battaile was taken prisoner: Whereupon the enemies forsaking the place, did openly betake themselves to flight. Sforza's victorious souldiers pursued them vp and downe, slew great numbers of them, and tooke make prisoners. Besides Cesar, Carolo Gonzaga was taken with two hundred horse, and three hundred foot. Sforza at the beginning thought that Picinino had bene taken, but not finding him after search made among the prisoners, he promised fiftie thousand crownes to any man that would undertake to fetch him backe. All this notwithstanding hee escaped to the Citie, where he hid himselfe for one whole day, fearing if the enemy should know that he were in Thyenna, he would presently haue besieged the Citie, and taken all meanes of escape from him. Therefore about midnight disguising himselfe in ragged habite like to a poore lame souldier, he was carried vpon mens shoulders forth of the Citie, and through by-waies at length came to Riua, whither a great part of the cavallerie had escaped.

The next day after the battaile, Sforza besieged the Citie, and during the siege, certaine light skirmishes were made, where Malateste Prince of Cesenna a courageous young man, comming forth to fight with the enemy was taken prisoner. Pisani of Arimini saith, That the Venetian Generall after the victorie at Thyenna, marched in order of battaile to Riua, and that Malatesta was taken in a falliey there. Alardo of Verona in his Oration made in praise of Sforza saith, That Pisino the next day after that he escaped from the battaile, came with his Army & presented battaile to the Venetians. Wherein his valour appeareth more notable, by how much his forces seemed wholly to be ouerthrowne. For thereby all men knew, that Sforza and the rest had to doe with an enemy, who whether he were victor or vanquished, could not be at quiet. Yet neuertheless howsoever it happened, it is most certaine that Sforza sent victuals to Bressia, and would daily haue sent more, had not the losse of Verona which happened at the same time, called the Venetian forces elsewhere. Philips Captaines had laid a plot to surprize the Castle of Verona which standeth on the West side. For they had intelligence from an Almaine souldier, who was (as Blondus saith) one of the dead paies there: That small Guard was kept there in the night. Pafius saith, That a Mantuan gaue them this intelligence, who being taken prisoner the Summer before, had for a time dwelt with Giacomo Bolognese, the Gouverneur of the Castle, whilst his ransom was providing, and that during his imprisonment, he went freely about the walles, and had at his leisure viewed the munitions and all parts of the Castle.

Sforza exhorteth his souldiers.

The part of a true Generall of an Armie.

They had (as hath beene said) a long time before determined to vndertake this enterprize: but they had deferred it till the enemy should send his troupes to winter, that they might the more safely fortifie themselves in Verona, and before the Venetian souldiers could be drawn from their garisons. But perceiving matters to be brought to that passe, that they could not hinder Sforza from going to Bressia, they resolved to put this enterprize in speedie execution there, the better to draw him from that journey. To this end having secretly assembled their forces, leaving Riua, they came to Pescara, before those whom they had sent for thither arrived, and commanding them to follow after, they speedily marched to Vigasio, and tooke along with them all the souldiers that lay there in garison.

Departing from thence on the eighteenth day of November at the beginning of the night, they came in great secrecie neere to Verona. Afterward about midnight rearing their ladders against the walles, the Author of the enterprize mounted first, who was forthwith followed in great secrecie, by all the rest, who killing the guardes, and breaking open the next gate, the Captaines with all the troupes had entrance. The cries and groanes of wounded men, with the clattering of Armour, did assure those who had the guard on the walles neere to the old Castle, that the enemy was entered, whereupon the Allarme was giuen. At these fearefull cries and nocturnall rumours the whole Citie ranne to Armes, and comming forth on euerie side, they put themselves in order in the market-place. The enemies were alreadie heard to come forward, and Pisino & Gonzaga about the fourth watch of the night had sent their troupes into the Citie. But perceiving the resistance which was made by night they changed their mindes, and abstained from fight, because that all their troupes were not yet arrived. Somewhat that the bridge Raffiolane being broken downe by the force of the assailants, the fight in that place ceased.

But whether it did cease or no, they began to affright the inhabitants, by breaking downe the houses behind the Castle: In the meane time many that did affect the Venetians being come to the Market-place counselled the fearefull Magistrats which knew not what to doe, that in regard they had no Garrison to defend them, euerie man should that night retire to some place of safetie, and take order for the Guard of the strong places: For they being well defended, there was no doubt but that the enemy would be forthwith enforced whether hee would or no to abandon the Citie: That they should besides, suffer the wretched inhabitants to giue place to the miserable condition of the times. Bartholomeo Peregrino, a man of great authoritie amongst them and a friend to the Venetians, did accompanie those that went their way as farre as the same Bridge, for feare lest some sinister mishap might hinder their escape. But so soone as it was day, the enemy without any resistance entred the Citie at the Gate Raffiolane. Pafius saith that he entred it before break of day.

A terrible feare had seized vpon the inhabitants being ignorant what would become of their Citie. For it was doubtfull whether the victorious enemy would persecute it, or giue it as a prey to his Souldiers. Lodouico Verma was one of the foremost amongst the enemies, who after that Carmagnolla his father-in-law had beene condemned did still follow the contrary party, and had voluntarily banished himselfe. He comming to his owne house, where hee vnderstood Mellato's richest goods and houldould stuffe was, being inflamed with choller did presently giue them to the spoile of his Souldiers. By his example others that were hard by, being desirous of booty fell to breaking open of Citizens houses. Some say that Francisco Pisino, sonne to the Generall, was the first that beganne to spoile, who had the guard of the gate Raffiolane. But whether it were he or the other, it is certaine that the Citie would that day haue sustained a notable mischief, had not Maguis, one of the excellentest Lawyers of his time, and a man of great authoritie among his Countrymen, gone to the Prince of Mantua, and entreated him not to suffer that Citie which had euere deferred well of him, and was fallen into that danger to be ruined without the fault or desert of the inhabitants; That hee ought to bee satisfied with being Conquerour of so noble a Citie, and not to deile it with bloud and rapine.

These words no lesse profitable, than true, did greatly moue the Prince; who presently commanded the souldiers to desist from spoiling, and that all the Ensignes should be drawne vp in order of battaile to the Pallace, where within a while after he was proclaimed Prince of Verona. For in the league betwixt him and Philip, against the Venetians, it was expressly mentioned, that if Verona and Vincenza should chance to bee taken in that warrey that then they should bee giuen to the Prince of Mantua. After this proclamation, he determining to recover the strong places in the Citie, did speedily make himselfe master of the Cairns, Bridges, Walls, and all the rest except the two Castles on the top of the mountaine, and that which is in the plaine, called the old Pallace. Then hee resolved to batter the old Pallace, whither he vnderstood that his Donne Carolo was lately brought as a Prisoner, and he determined either to breake downe the bridge which is neere to it vpon the River, or else to make a great trench before it with a Foire, to take all hope of succours from those within it. He did likewise send Giuanni Gonzaga his brother to the Castles vpon the Mountaine to deprive them likewise of all reliefe. Hee did moreover attempt to seize on the freights of Clusina to keepe Sforza from comming to the reliefe of the Citie. He sent word to Giacomo Marincio Gouverneur of the wale of Policella, that he had the night before seized on Verona, that with the Citie he had his wife and children in his power, and that whilse he did speedily take order to save the freights of Clusina that vp and safely guarded, hee would giue his house in spoile to the Souldiers, and put his wife and children to death. But he was so farre off from being daunted with his menaces, as on the contrary, having roughly repulsed his messenger, he speedily marched with a troupe of Peasants to meet with Sforza. For the night of the very same day that the Citie was taken, newes was brought thereof to Sforza's Campe.

The Generall who first heard of it was much amazed at the newesse of the matter, being scarce able to beleue it, had not certaine Letters written to him from particular friends confirmed the truth thereof, and entreated him speedily to come to the rescue of that which was almost lost. Whereupon, he raised his Campe, and sending for Mellato from Torbolles, hee marched thitherwards with his Armie, staying in no place, but a little vpon the banks of the Adice, which having passed he went about Sun-set with a small troupe to the freights of the Mountaines. The description of the Mount Aduce.

Riuer Adice in that place, where a Cattle is to be faine vpon a craggie Mountain, doth wax verie narrow towards the end of the valley Lagarina, and glideth through the freights of the broken Mountaine, hauing on every side fearefull rocks in forme of a wall aduancing full forward as high as a man can shoot an arrow more than two thousand paces in length, and betwixt the Riuer and the rocks there lieth a narrow way wherein two Armed Souldiers can hardly passe in front: but neare to the Cattle, both sides of the Mountaines doe shut themselves vp together, so as the Riuer betwixt the two rocks makes a great Gulph: on that side likewise where the Cattle standeth, there is a path cut through the rock a crosbow-shot in length, where one man at once whether he be on foot or horse-backe can but passe. I dare affirme that these two hills which are at this day to be seene there, haue in former times bene but one, the which by viewing them may be easily discerned. For both their tops, and the cutting of the rocks, doe so much resemble one another, as nothing can bee more like.

Sforza his speech to his Captaine.

Now Sforza being come thither (as hath bene said) in the evening had intelligence from those that lay in Garrison in the Cattle, that Francisco son to Pierpino had attempted to take that place, but perceiving his labour to proue vaine he had resited his troupes. But the Venetian Generall fearing some Ambuscado, did by day, brake send Nicholas Pisani before with armed horse to discover those suspicious wayes, and chiefly the freights. He presently returned galloping, telling him that great numbers of enemies were at the going forth of the straights. Sforza being greatly moued with his report, spake to Mellito, Marcello, and the rest, telling them, That they were that day either to die in those freights, or to passe forward to the enemies cost. That he was certaine that the enemy before them had enclosed the going forth into the valley, and that hee was moreover in doubt that they had done the like behind them. It becometh therefore to goe forward, and in the companie of Sforza, and his good fortune to runne fiercely upon the enemy. That they should be assured, that there was nothing so difficult, nor any power so great, which the valour of brave men accompanied by fortune, could not vanquish and overcome. And thereupon he marched forward in battaile, refusing to fight with the enemies, at what time certaine word was brought him that there was no danger at all, and that Giacomo Morano was beneath in the valley with a thousand Souldiers to keepe the enemies from seizing on the passages; and that he might boldly march on without any feare of Ambush.

The brave message of the Go-uerneur of the olde Palace, to the Prince of Mantua.

This newes made Sforza ioyfull, who caused the ensignes & Souldiers speedily to march. Being come into the plane the ensignes made a stand at Volana, till such time as the whole Armie was embattailed, that they might from thence march in a square battaillon to the Citie. In some Authors there is no mention of this, nor of Sforza's speech to his Capitaine. At night the Venetian Armie encamped at Saint Ambrose Burrough, some eight miles from Verona. There they understood of what fouer had been done in the Citie for three daies past: what attempts the enemy had made vpon the Castles, and how that the Mantuan Prince being come to batter the olde Palace with his ordinance, the Governour of the place, sent him word, that unless he did giue over that manner of besieging, hee would blinde and lay his son Carlo on that part of the wall which he first battered, that he might be beaten in pieces with the Canon, whereupon the Prince being daunted with his threatnings, did presently withdraw the batterie.

Sforza puts supplies into the Fort of Felician.

Now the fourth day after they were come from the Mountaines, they came to the Fort of Felician. Some say, that the enemies for a time fought at the Rampiers and trenches which they had made, to keepe backe the Venetians, and that being driuen thence by the valour of Sforza's troups, they did easily giue place. And that then Sforza did with a select company of foot-men into the Fort; sending his brother Alexandro, Mellito, and the other brave Capitaine, with all the cavalierie to the Bishops Gate, where certaine Veronois standing by chance, were entreated to goe and open the Gate for their friends, and if they could not doe it by faire means to breake it open by force. So soone as the enemies knew that it was taken, and that Sforza's Souldiers were in the Citie, they forthwith fled ouer the Riuer; and the amarement of the horse-men neere to the new bridge was so great, as the wooden bridge which stands betwixt that of stone, and the Tower, being broken with the great weight of Runawaies, sixe Knights, or nine according to some Authors, fell into the water; and by the weight of their armour together with their horses, were all drowned; only one man by the goodnesse of his horse escaped to the shoare.

The enemies flee from Verona.

The Venetians
passe the Rade-marca.

Sforza vnderstanding that his Souldiers were in the Citie, and that the enemy fled, caused his foot-men to march forth of the Cattle. They did for a time fight vpon the bridges: But fire-workes being throwne vpon that of wood, and by the helpe of the inhabitants, Sforza's troupes themselves way into the middelt of the Citie. Thus writes Blondus: But Pajus saith, That the troupes came from the Castles in two bands and marched against the enemies, so as beyond Saint Zenes Church which stands at the Hills foot, the Caualerie went on the left hand, and the bodie of the Infanterie, was sent from beyond the Fort of Felician, and that of Saint Peter, which is somewhat lower directly to the Citie, and that about sunne-set there was a cruell fight with the enemy on both sides the new bridge: after which, the enemy fled; and that in feare running by heapes ouer the bridge, it brake vnder them. The same Author affirms that Giouanni Gonzaga was fore wounded in that fight, whereof within a while after he died; and yet for all that Blondus saith, That he was slaine before the Fort of Felician with an harquebuzer-shot before Sforza's arriual. But both of them agree, that the wooden bridge was burnt by night, and that the same being broken, Pierpino and Gonzaga, who had stood all night in battaile before the Palace, hauing notice of the violent incurfions of Sforza's forces into the Citie, did speedily retire into the Citadell. Some others say, That it was in the evening. But, whether they quitted the place then or about midnight, all of them agree together, that before day they speedily left Verona, and went to Vigazio. The enemies flight being diuulged, Traillo and Carpelato being commanded to follow them, gaue in vpon the taile of the Runawaies, and slew many of them. A great multitude of Mantuan peasants were taken in the Citie; some of whom, in hatred to Gonzaga, were murdered by those whom they had rob'd. All the town's men that had kept themselves shut vp in their houses for feare of either partie, expecting the doubtfull issue of the bickering, perceiving the chance of the dice to be sodainly turned, the enemy in feare & amaze, did from their windowes raile vpon them, & furnished the Venetians that night with virtalls, light and counsell; and so soone as it was day they came into the Market-place to congratulat Sforza & Marcello for their victorie, and with reares in their eies called them Fathers of their Countrie, recommending to them all their publike and particular means, and entreated them to be lieue, that the enemy had not taken the Citie through the Citizens fault, who were altogether innocent thereof, saying that at the first newes that the Citie was taken, they ranne with their Armes to haue repulsed the enemy; but that they were enforced to giue place for feare of greater losse, seeing the magistrates did the like: And that now so soone as they saw the Venetians ensignes, they had not only giuen them entrance, but many of them had presently taken Armes and ioined with them to expell the enemies, and had still aided the Venetians neere to the bridges.

The apparent loyaltie of the Veronois was much esteemed, and after many embraces and salt teares shed they were willed to take courage, and that none should sustaine either generall or particular losse, but such as were guilty: For if they could finde any one (which they did not thinke to doe) that had bene Author of that treacherie, he should be punished according to his deserts. Then Sforza, Marcello, and the rest did comfort the sorrowfull inhabitants, and did put them in hope of better fortune. It is reported that Carpelato had almost spoiled Magnis by force dragging him, like a Traitor, before Sforza: And that he did so constantly iustifie his owne cause with that of the Citizens, as he did not only cleere himselfe from all obiections, but gaue them to vnderstand, that the Citie had beene taken neither by his fault nor by any of the Citizens: whereupon by the consent of all men he was declared guiltlesse, and as one that had well merited of the Venetian State, was greatly commended.

Sforza from the vale Clusiana had aduertized the Senate of the disaster of Verona, and how that he was going thither with an intent to reduce it quickly vnder their obedience, or else to hazard the liues of himselfe, his brethren, and the residue of the Armie. He wilhed them therefore to be patient for a while, and in the meane time to pray vnto God for the happy successe of that iourney, for they should shortly heare either the one or other. The Senate after these newes were continually in the Pallace, and the Nobilitie, sad and disconsolate, walked vp and downe the Market-place, floating betwixt hope and feare, when on a sodaine by letters vpon letters both of publike and particular persons, they had notice of the recouerie thereof, and the enemies shamefull flight the fourth day after it was lost. The Cities ioy was then so great, as the Senate being ouerjoyed could not refrain from teares, and great multitudes of people from all parts of the Towne ranne to the Pallace: the Senatours and common people reioicing together: Generall processions were made for three dayes together: with prayers and thanksgiuings vnto God in all Churches. The posts were recompensed according to their speede, some more 20 than others.

The great ioy in Venice vpon the recouerie of Verona.

The commissioners of Verona, who came thither within a while after, had audience. These men with teares in their eyes did relate the wretched estate of their Citie, protesting their own innocence, and that the cause of their coming was to assure them of their loyalty in generall. The Senate did courteously entertaine them, and congratulate the present victorie; assuring them that their fidelitie had beene a long time knowne to the Prince and Senate, in regard whereof they had euer bene desirous of the conseruation of that loyal Citie, and that they did therefore greatly reioyce, that the matter was ended without any further losse or danger to them. Sforza's valour was highly commended, with Mellato's prowesse, 30 and Marcello's speed, for that they had opportunely recouered that which was almost lost, and vanquished the enemy so soone as they saw him: Wherefore they thought it not onely well becoming, but did allow of it, that the Magistrates of their Citie should present Sforza with ten thousand crownes for hauing so brauely borne himselfe in that action; and Mellato with two thousand.

The Senates answer to the Commissioners.

The Commissioners, being dismissed and rewarded, returned to Verona. Sforza in the meane time (because winter was well forward) resolved to tarric at Verona. But his care for Brescia did greatly afflict him and the rest: which caused him to leave his wintering-place before the first of Ianuarie, and returne to the siege of Aranes and Thicenna. The Campe abode certaine daies in the plaine of Arques; where many were reported to perish with extreme cold. Mellato by the sharpnes of the weather lost all feeling, and was so benumbed, as he lay like a dead man, who was presently by the Riuer Adice carried to Verona. Sforza being then enforced by the vehement cold, and by the enemies resistance, to returne to his wintering place, did send by Carpelion and Troylla, accompanied with three hundred men, certaine victuals to Brescia by the way of the mountains.

It was reported, that the Brescians were reduced to such extremitie and want, as they sustained themselues with filthie and vnhole some diet. And moreover, That at such time as the enemies took Verona, accounting all for lost and desperate, they were at the point to haue yielded: which they had done, had not Barbaro opportunely come to the assembly, & with great importunity broke that which they had determined. Besides, it is most certaine that Picinino and Gonzaga, had by Philips commandement sent new forces, who with great heed were to keep the Brescians more closely mewed vp, & carefully to prouide that no victuals might from any place be brought vnto them.

The great extremitie of the Brescians.

Now

Now Sforza's troupes being come to Franzacorte, or (as others say) to Gnzac, they fell to blowes with Philips forces, who being daunted with Sforza's actually before day fled, and lost three hundred Horse. But the better to disburden the Citie (freed now from the siege, and in some sort from famine) of so great a multitude, those which had brought the victuals, returned by the same Mountaines and went to Winter with Sforza. The Nauall Armie in the meane time went forward at Torbolles, where they had slowly wrought, because that after the taking of Verona, the Carpenters and other workmen being scattered here and there for leare, the worke had for a time beene discontinued. Likewise Mellato, who had the charge 10 of the Hauen, and the workmen, by extremitie of cold which he had taken, died the same winter: but it happened not in the Armie, as I finde in some Authors. The remainder of the Winter was more free from troubles, by reason of the extreme cold weather.

It was reported that Giohanni Cornetano, of the Familie of Vitelli, who commanded the Popes troupes, and who for the secret praetizes he then made was much suspected of the Pope, had about the beginning of the spring-time made a secret league with Philip and Picinino: who had concluded together, That at one time Cornetano with his troupes should inuade La Marca, and Picinino should crosse the Po, and come into Tufcanie; the one wholly to ruine the Florentines state, and the other 20 to ouerthrow Sforza's Principalltie. The report hereof was hardly beleued; when Picinino vpon the eighth day of Februarie, was then alreadie come forth of Garrison, and with his troupes had crossed the Po. Sforza being troubled with these newes, went himselfe to Venice to conferre with the Prince and Senate about the state of that Warre. He was affraide least Cornetano would speedily inuade La Marca, which was wholly vnfurnished of aide and Garrisons. The Venetians at his entreatie sent to the Pope, who dealt so with him; That whatsoeuer he granted vnto Sforza as Prince of La Marca, should in peaceable and safe manner remaine vntouched. They did likewise entreate the Florentines speedily to arme, and not onely to driue the common enemy from their confines, but to stop him if it were possi- 30 ble from making incursions vpon Sforza's state. Picinino in the meane time made diuers and sundrie attempts on Flaminia which were valiantly withstood by Sigismund Prince of Arimini, and Alatelle his brother (who being taken at Thyenna, was exchanged for Carolo Gonzaga) who receiving a thousand Venetian footmen, and as many from the Florentines, together with Sforza's Cauallerie made hast to the aide of La Marca.

A league betwixt Philip and Picinino to take the Venetian Topes Genoa.

Picinino maketh warre in Flaminia.

The enemy hauing left Guido Faentino to continue the siege of Magellana, came to passe the Appenine hills. In the meane time the two brethren Malatestes went to the enemies side. Picinino tooke certain Townes in the Appenine Mounts, which he forthwith pillaged. Philip supposed by means of that voiage, that Sforza would 40 altogether quit Lombardie and runne to the rescue of his owne State, and to that of his Neighbours. Now whilst he soothed himselfe with this hope, sodaine newes was brought him, That by the Popes commandement Giohanni Cornetano was imprisoned by Antonio Ride of Padua, Captaine of the Castle of S. Angelo. These newes made him thinke that Picinino in despair would returne into Lombardie. But this could not refrain him: For sending for the Malatestes, Guido, and Alatello Faentini, hee came more furiously than before from the top of the Appenines into Tufcanie, hauing (not without great labour) caused the Snow to be taken forth of the waies through which hee passed. The Florentines during these troubles were not idle: For they leued forces from all parts. Pope Eugenius, who was an Associate 50 in that warre, commanded Bishop Lo douico, That as Legate Apostolicall, he should conduct all those troupes which had bene Cornetano's, into Tufcanie.

The Malatesti take the enemies parties.

Gianini Cornetano is committed to prison in S. Angulus Castle.

The Florentines gaue entertainment to Paulo Vrsino, and Michaeli Attendulo with a great Cauallerie, and many foote companies: they did likewise procure to haue Troylla (whom Sforza, with a companie of men at armes, had sent to La Marca) to be

be sent to ioyne with them, that with all these forces together, they might be able not only to withstand the enemy, but brauely to assaile him.

During the Florentines preparations, Picininno although he had beene brauely repulsed and with great losse from Primolcoria by Nicholao Pisani, who then was at Florence, and had beene sent with a band of young Souldiers to guard the freights of the mountaines, yet he hauing soon after overcome the difficultie of the mounts went and encamped at Politiana. The newes that he had passed the Appenines did greatly terrifie the Florentines, and most of all in regard of his great speede, so as at first they knew not what to resolute on. Watch by night was placed ouer the Citie, with strong guard at the Gates; But the arriual of Borsia and Troyllo, reuiued the appalled Spirits of the fearefull Citizens.

The enemy lying incamped before Politiana, greatly afflicted these two renowned Common-weales, and draue Sforza for a time into many doubts; which was the cause that at the Spring-time he came not into the field so soone as men did expect him. The Florentines likewise on the one side were very importunate with him, to haue him come to them. And the Venetians on the other side did detain him and earnestly intreated him to tarry still; fearing if he should change his former course of warre, that he would afterwards be enforced to begin againe (as it were) and to recover a new victorie forth of the enemies hands, which he had already in a manner with so great trauaile taken from them; with all allcaging, That the Florentines state might be easily defended and kept by the Popes forces, and those of the other Confederates; but that the Venetians affaires (being exposed as it were in an open Theater in the midst of Lombardie) could not by any meanes succeed well without him.

With these sundrie cogitations was Sforza greatly perplexed; whilst all men beganne to condemne his long staying. But in the meane time Picininno, after the taking of Politiana, marched against the Casertines, ruining all places that hee met with in his passage. This mischiefe also was accompanied with an other, almost as great as it. For Borsia d'Este (on whose arriual in regard of the great Cauallerie he brought with him, as on the sole refuge of the warre, the Florentines had grounded their hope) did on a sodaine take Philips partie. All which accidents notwithstanding Picininno's affaires in Tuscany became euer after lesse fortunate and successfull.

For being come to the Pace of Arezzo, as if he had meant to make incursions on the Sienois, or on the Territories of the Church, he dwelt so long vpon his resolutions, as he did wholly foresew the course of his happy fortune.

For in the meane time the Popes forces entred the Towne, and shortly after Vrsino, Troyllo, and the rest came thither likewise with the whole bodie of the Armie: whereupon hauing intelligence of the leue of so great Forces, with all speede hee retired to the foote of the Mountaines.

SFORZA determineth on the passage of the River Minicia. CONTARENT General of the Venetians Naual Armie, defeateth the enemy upon the Lake of Benac, and retimeth the Townes neare to the Lake. The Venetian Armie hauing effected the Minicia, recouereth all the Townes on the Bresan Territorie. SFORZA vanquisheth the enemy in battaile, detimeth Soncina and the new Oreges, and bringing his forces to the banks of the River Adda, putteth by of the Countie of Cyradade in great fear. LEON SFORZA's brother, is slaine with an Harquebuzier shot before Carauazza. PICININO in a set battaile is vanquished at Anglare in Pulcarie. Winter approaching SFORZA cometh to Venice. Great Triumphs are made at Venice in fauour of GIACOMO FIORENTI the Princes Sonne, which continue three daies. PICININO returning from Lombardie in the midst of Winter takes daies Townes on the Bresan Territorie. The Venetians Armie and that of PHILIP cometh at one time to Matricenga. Peace is made with PHILIP according to SFORZA's will and pleasure. Hee marrieth BIANCA, PHILIP's Daughter, in Cremona, and after the publishing of the Peace he cometh with his Wife to Venice, where he mooueth magnificently entertainment.

THE Spring-time was farre spent, and Sommer was at hand, when Sforza hauing intelligence of the successe of the affaires of Tuscany (for he was out of feare of any danger towards his owne state, or that of his Associates) with a mightie Armie marched against the enemy. It is reported, that the Souldiers hee led before had so large pay as at that time, when they were all exceedingly well furnished with Armour, Harbuts, and all other furniture for the warres. And for the speedier relief of Brescia which was actually besieged, hee refused to passe through the midst of the enemies; for he was greatly encouraged by that which CONTARENT had lately done vpon the Lake of La Garda. This man (as hath beene said) being declared General of the Naual Armie, which the Senate had with wonderfull speed made ready at Torbolles, had already launched lanced certaine Gallies into the lake, together with other vessels: but the number of Gallies is not agreed vpon by our Authors. Pasius of Arimini mentioneth but foure; Lagisiano of Verona, sixe; and Montanus halfe as manie, nor can we certainly finde in what part of the Lake they fought. Some say, That the enemies departed from Riua, and that they fought neare to Torbolles. Others, That it was betwixt the mouth of the Riuer Ponalis and Riua: And others againe, That Philips Armie departing from Pescara, and being tossed with the waues and a contrary winde, met with the Venetian Armie in the middle of the Lake: But they agree generally, That the enemie at the same time, had many more vessels than the Venetians, which were commaunded by Blasio Affera a Genouefe, a man verie skilfull in marine matters, who was accompanied with many other Genoueffes that were inured to sea-fights. Italus of Friull had manned their vessels with souldiers. Pietro Brunorio was with Contareni, with whom were certaine bands of choice footmen.

Now whilest Italus remained at Riua, hee brought his army many times arranged in battell before Torbolles, to fight with the Venetians, if he had found them so disposed. But Contareni did by all meanes shunne the fight, distrusting the small number of his vessels: Howbeit growing afterwards more bold (as Pasius saith) in regard of foure new-come Gallies and diuers other small vessels of sundrie sortes which were well armed, and perceiuing moreover that the enemies had the winde against them, he sent a Gallie to charge two vessels laden with victualls and armor which were going to Riua. Now the enemies perceiuing from their hauens, that the same Gallie made way against theirs, they forthwith, to rescue them, made towards the Venetians: Likewise Contareni being loth to leaue his Gallies as a prey to the enemie, speedily came forth of his Hauens, and with full gales vied towards him: All which his haste notwithstanding Italus had well nere taken his Gallie. Somewhere are that say, that the enemie did take it, before it could be rescued: but withall, that at the arrival of the Venetian with the residue of his gallies and twelve other vessels, there beganne forthwith a cruell fight betwixt them, which for a long time was very doubtfull; and likewise that they fought hand to hand, in regard of the yron hookes and chaines that grappled them together.

This was a bloody battell to the beholders: great numbers of slain bodies on euery side dropping into the water. But that which made it more hideous and frightfull were the ceaselesse and terrible reports of the cannon, together with the lamentable cries that were heard: all which (as it were at once), reuerberating the concuities of the neighbour-mountaines, gaue a double Echo of those cries of thunder. The aire, earth, and waters being troubled by the winde, and forcible motion of the vessels, did all together make a terrible noise. Many and different were the dangers of death; of all which one only is most remarkable: There was a rope tied atwart two Gallies, ypon which fifty men had taken hold that were fallen into the water by sundry accidents, thereby to sustaine themselves from drowning, esteeming that (vnder God) the onely means of their rescue; but to tell you that one of the ends being cut asunder, they did all in one instant miserably perish. After a long fight, the Venetians had gotten the vpper hand of the enemies, by the valor and prowesse of Contareni and the rest, when Blasio perceiuing fortune to frowne, enired into a little boate, and betooke himselfe to flight: Affera and his fellows being amazed at their Generalls absence, fought in vaine likewise of escape. Then the Venetian on euery side did straitly presse and enuiron them, and followed the victorie, till such time as hee had made himselfe master of all the enemies vessels, two only excepted which escaped Contareni with great ioy drew them to Torbolles, where with great difficultie his helmes was taken from his head, in regard it was extremely battered with violent strokes in that fight reduced.

The newes of the victorie being brought to Bressia did greatly comfort the afflicted Citie, and gaue euery one hope of better fortune. For it was likely, that the

Lake

Lake lying free and open to the Venetians, nothing could hinder them from receiving aide and victualls in abundance. Therefore they resolved to send Ambassadors to Venice, to congratulate the Senate for that victorie. Pietro Auogadre was the chiefe Commisioner who carried thither a golden enligne, wherein was written, Brixiamagnipotens, Cateris orbibus fidei praeiuit exemplum. Bressia the magnificent hath giuen an example of loyalty to other Cities, the which in the Common-wealths name, as a preface of the future victorie was hung vp in Saint Marks church, where it is still at this day to be seene.

Contareni and Brunorio in the meane time stood not breathing in so faire a way, but departing on a fodaine from Torbolles, they went and besieged Riua both by land and water, which though it was valiantly for a while defended, yet at last they forced it, and being taken, it was sacked as an enemie. They dealt roughly with the Inhabitants, because that they, more than the enemies, had abhorred the Venetian name; young children were violently dragged forth of their parents armes, virgins were defouled; and wiues with their husbands were grievously tormented. The Venetian presently after this recovered La Garda; which as some say was ruined; and as others, that it had no hurt. Next, for the recouerie of La Garda they tooke Bardolin, Lanfiza, and diuers other townes vpon the Lake; whereof those which they tooke by force, were giuen in spoile to their souldiers; those that voluntarily yielded, they did freely pardon.

During this fortunate successe of Contareni vpon the Lake, Sforza had brought his Campe neare to Manerba, where hauing intelligence (as Pasius saith) that Boriss d'Este was gone to the enemies side; that many thousands were on the Boriss territorie; and that Gonzaga their capitall enemie was with great forces come to Marmirolo to assaile them in front and in flanke, he remained for a time doubtfull whether he should passe the Riuer Mincia, or not. For, hauing passed it, he was to open his way to Bressia by dint of sword; but his greatest care was, from whence to haue victualls to supplie his Armie; for there were twentie thousand men in his Campe: wherein, because he would doe nothing without counsell, he was desirous to conferre with the Prouidator and the other Capitaines. Being in consultation about this expedition, it is reported, That he did oftentimes aduise them heedfully to consider the greatnes of their enterprise, and how the Riuer being once crossed, they were to march to Bressia through the middle of many thousand enemies, and that then if anie thing should fall out vnluckily, it would be too late to talke of had-I-wist.

Pascals Maripietro was at the same time Prouidator in the Armie, who answered, It becometh not me, o Sforza, nor anie here, who vnder thy command doe follow the Venetian enligne, to prescribe a Law vnto thee concerning martiall affaires: but it belongs vnto thee who art our Generall, and by long experience art most expert in martiall discipline, to aduise that which is necessarie to be done, and afterwards to command it. For it is our duties which fight vnder thy conduct to follow thy counsell and commandement. At this speech hee made no shew of any fodaine resolution; but Pietro Auogadre being come to the Armie did incite him by a vehement Oration. The summe whereof was, That acquainting him with the state of the affaires of Bressia, he told him, that unless he were speedily relieved with victualls, men, and armour, it would come to passe (which hee should be verie sorie for) that that most loyal Citie, through want of timely succour would be forced in despair to yelde to the enemie: and therefore he earnestly intreated him hauing obtained so faire a way, not to abandon so well-deseruing a Citie, surpassing all others in constant affection and loyalty to the Venetian Republike; saying, That hee needed not feare the want of victualls, seeing that come was already ripe on the ground, which being reaped, he for his owne part promised to furnish out of his owne lands, a sufficient quantity to feede the Armie for ten daies.

Sforza being moued by these speeces caused the bridge to bee instantly made; whereupon the Armie crossed the Mincia neere to Monzabane, which towne being

ing being assailed, was forthwith taken and sackt by the souldiers. From thence he went to Riuoltella, where the inhabitants perceiuing themselves to be streightly besieged by land and water, did presently yeeld. Contareni drew neere to Sales, and Sforza being come to the riuier Celsia, encamped within tenne miles of Brescia. Thither did Barbaro and the chiefe of the Citie come to salute him. From thence Brunorio, and Scariot Faenentino, being sent with two bands of men at Armes to assault the towne of Sales, by helpe of Contareni's nauall Armie, they tooke it by force; where the Venetian dealt cruelly with the townsmen. Those of Calusia, Gaurada, Calcina and Bagnols, did by their deputies yeeld themselves to Sforza whilest he remained at the riuier Celsia.

In this fortunate progression the Generall changed his determination, and in stead of going to Brescia, he resolved to march against the enimie. Barbaro (whom Sforza highly esteemed) exhorted him thercunto, telling him that it was much better to pursue the victorie almost wonne, than to goe to Brescia, which was by newes of his arriuall already sufficiently assured. Being come to Bagnols, to make incursions on the enemies (who were said to be encamped at Manerbia) those of Otholenga and diuers other townes sent their Commissions to him, suing for peace, and giuing him to vnderstand that the enemies being terrified at the report of his approach were retired from thence. The next day a thousand of the gallantest young men of Brescia came to the Campe to salute the Generall, vnto whom, for their ancient hairst to Philip they offered freely to follow him, and to beare Armes at their owne cost. Sforza did courteously entertaine them, and willed them to follow the ensignes.

Vpon the report that was bruted that Lodouico Sanseuerino, Itallus of Friull, and Vermio, Philips Captaines, had fortified themselves betwixt Soncina and the new Orgies, the Generall departing by night, went speedily against them, and having fiercely assailed them being fortified with trenches, and two bridges vpon the riuier Oglio, sent part of his caualerie in front, & his infantry in Flanke, to prouoke them with Arrow-shot and warlike engines. Then hauing vnder colour of fight, drawne them on the other side of the riuier, he returned courageously to charge the. He rode vp and downe among his troupes, commending those who did valiantly, and sharply rebuking those that were backward. The enemies likewise did their best for a long time to make good the place. But Ciarpelion comming with a band of old souldiers ouer the woden bridge which lieth on the Oglio, & hauing filled the trenches and broken downe the Rampiers, the victorie eftsoones inclined to the Venetians, the which being perceiued by the enemies, who were able to make no longer resistance, in great disorder they betooke themselves to flight. Paffas saith that a thousand of them were either slaine or wounded, and twouland horse, and as many foot taken. Others lessen halfe the number. The chiefe of the Armie with those which escaped from the fight, fled to Crema. Some Authors affirme, That the victorious Venetian being mingled with the runnawaies, entred pell-mell with them into Soncina, and that the Citie was in that sort taken, with great numbers of the enemies. Others againe maintaine that the inhabitants did voluntarily yeeld after the battaile. Borgia d'Aselay at the burrough of Ienepalt with sixtene hundred horse, which is two miles from the place where the battaile was fought, determining in the shutting in of the euening to ioyne with Philips Armie. Sforza's souldiers pursuing the enimie, gaue in on a sodaine, and vnlookt-for vpon him, who supposing that the whole Armie was there, fled, hauing lost his baggage and the third part of his caualerie. It is reported by some others, that he came to the latter end of the battaile, and that he fought there together with his caualerie, but that the victorie inclining to the Venetians, and not being able to remedie it, he fled with the rest.

Philips affaires by these defeats being reduced to extremitie, those of the new Orgies returned vnder the Venetians obediens: And not that they alone, but all the

the Townes, Castles, Forts, and Villages of the Bressian and Bergamese territories; together with the inhabitants of the Cambrionike valley. The price of victuals did afterwards greatly fall at Brescia. Corne and all other fruites were sold for a lower rate by the tenth part than before they were. Bergamo likewise had a share in this good fortune. The Ambassadors of these two Cities came to Sforza's campe, first to congratulate him for his victorie, then to giue him thanks, for that by his valour, and that victorie, they had beene freed from so long and tedious a siege, which had continued almost three years, at such times as they were able to haue made no more resistance. Therefore they acknowledged and did promise euer after to confesse, That there was none next to the Venetians, vnto whom they were so much bound as to himselfe; that they did through him alone enioy their safetie and wealth, and generally all what soeuer they possessed, and life it selfe, which to men is more precious than all things else. These speeches were followed with some presents, besitting the time and their poverities, who with teares in their eyes entreated him to respect the Bressians loue, more than their presents, saying that they certainly knew how that a generous Captaine craueth nothing of his followers aboue their means but only loue and obseruance.

Now Sforza after his victorie hauing crossed the Oglio (for corne was ripe, and therefore there was no feare of any want of victuals in the Armie) hee recovered Casal-Maior, and diuers other townes in that country: Carauazza except which he besieged. But because there was a strong Garrison in it, and that he likewise knew that, in regard of the riuier Adda which runneth vnder the walled, they might both by day and night bring all manner of victuals thither, hee raised his campe, and went first to recover Bregnan, then Triuitt and Reinos, two townes in the Gyriadale. In regard of these approaches those of the Duchie of Milane were greatly affrighted: The poore countrey men bringing their cartell and goods into the good townes.

Philip hauing from all parts assembled forces, builded certaine Forts vpon the riuier Adda, placing strong Garrisons in them. After the battaile of Oglio, hee did continually send messengers to Piccinino to call him from Tuscanie where hee remained.

The Venetians not being ignorant how many places of importance, which were still possessed by the enimie he left behinde him, and receiuing certaine intelligence that Philip had called home Piccinino into Lombardie, feearing an alteration of fortune, that if by chance he should be enforced to retire, he should not easily do it vpon an vtigent necessitie: Notwithstanding that oftentimes he made shew as if he were desirous to crosse the riuier Adda, neuerthelesse he obtained. Afterwards returning to besiege Carauazza, Leon his brother being shot into the bodie with an Harquebaze died within a while after, whereat being enflamed with chollier, with greater courage than before he oppugned the besieged, vsing all meanes and other fearefull meanes to make them yeeld; which soone after had happened. Some say, That Leon, Sforza's brother, died of his hurts after Carauazza was taken.

Piccinino in the meane time hauing notice of the ouerthrow of Oglio, and being pressed by Philips importunate letters to returne with speed into Lombardie, supposing that after his departure from Tuscanie, his associates together with the townes which had yeilded to him, would be afterwards defeated, and taken by the enimie, resolved to giue a battaile, to the end that, if he wanne it, the forces of the Florentines and the Pope being broken, his associates with the rest might more easily be wonne to persist in their affection.

Now all hope of taking Perugia being lost, the which he had promised to himselfe to get by means of some within it, and hauing besieged Tiphernu in vaine, he passed on to the burrough of S. Sepalcher, and from thence marched in battaile to Anglare where Bishop Lodouico Paulo Vrsino, and others were encamped. This towne standeth at the foote of the Appenine hilles in a verie high place, and beneath it is a bot-to me. In this place, because the ascent is not steepie, the Florentines troupes with those of the Pope were encamped, although some of them lay in the bottome as farre as the riuer, ouer which is a little bridge.

At Piccinino's arriual the first encounter was neere to the bridge. It is reported that some had assured him that he should that day defeat the enemies, as being vnprouided and not expecting his comming, especially vpon that day which was the nine and twentieth of Iune, a day religiously obserued, in regard of the Feast of the holy Apostles. Thus being confident and full of hope, he left the burrough, hauing brought with him some thousand of the townsmen to make them spectators of his assured victorie. But finding the enemy at his comming readier ranged in battaile, he was inforced to change his manner of fight, and to order his Armie after an other fashion. Neere to the bridge (as hath beene said) and the riuer side was the first encounter, where Piccinino's lonne giuing a furious charge, the Tuscan was beaten backe, and the bridge wonne, but at the foote of the rising hee made a stand. Nicholas Pisani a braue Capitaine was surprized neere to the riuer, and Asendulo fighting valiantly was almost taken by the enemies. Now in that little space of the bottome which lieth betwixt the riuer and the mountaine, they fought without any aduantage; Piccinino did all he could to beat the enemies from their place, but all his attemptes were vaine. Whereupon, perceiving that the enemies Armie stood fast, hee commaunded Assuro Faentino, and the other valiant Capitaines, to march with the Caualerie in a close Battallion against the enemy. The Popes troupes comming fiercely from aboue vpon these men, did almost faile them with such valour, as in great disorder they draue them as farre as the riuer. Assuro and many more of note being taken in that place, the enemies on a sodaine in verie great feare did repasse the bridge, and dislodged.

Piccinino afterwards supposed, That by reinforcing the troupes, he might easily march thence in battaile, but it fell out otherwise. For being readie to depart, the Florentines horse with those of the Pope did not cease to pursue him, even as he mounted on horsebacke, and with their whole forces did to charge him, as they gaue him no time to reinforce his Armie, but disordering his troupes: they enforced him to flie, and slew greate numbers of his souldiers. The slaughter was great, but the number of the prisoners exceeded. For, besides Assuro, who was (as hath beene said) taken in the middle of the fight, eight and twentie Capitaines, and eightene hundred horse, with all the Inhabitants of the burrough, were carried away prisoners.

Piccinino thus vanquished, escaped to the burrough, where vnderstanding, whome hee had lost, he cried out aloud; That Philips state was ouerthrowne, vntill the enemy sent backe the flower of all Italie which hee had then taken. Lagisano writes; That with verie grieue he would twice haue slaine himselfe, and had vndoubtedly done it, if his lonne Franzoso had not stayed with him day and night to comfort and perswade him.

Whilest these things were done in Tuscanie, Sforza, after hee had taken Carruazza, and left Augadre of Brescia at the siege of the Castle, departed thence, and at that time (as some say) recovered Calal Major and diuers townes vpon the Cremonese. The Castle of Cauazza being yielded, hee tooke Azola and Caneda from Gonzaga. They lay a while before the Castle of Macharia, those within it refusing to yeelde till such time as they perceiued part of their walles to be beaten downe with the Cannon. Those of Lona hauing seene Sforzas ensignes, did forthwith put themselves vnder his protection, the like did those of Montecarlo, Cauriana, and Riuoltelles. At the last, the campe drew neere to Pescara.

This Citie (as hath beene elsewhere said) is seated at the mouth of the Riuer Minicia. It hath a goodly Castle neare to the Riuer with a bridge, and diuers Turrets. Sforza being encamped before it, Nicholas D'Este came thither vnkloot for.

He,

He, resolving to motion a peace, came to the Camp to talke with Sforza and Nicholas D'Este the Prouidatour. And after a long discourse of the inconstancie of fortune (which he said, the Venetians and Sforza were to remember) made a motion of procuring a peace with Philip, and promised, if Sforza thought it fit, to bee the Author and Agent thereof. He added besides, (which hee knew would bee verie pleasing to Sforza) that he would doe his best to cause Philip to giue him his daughter Bianca to wife, which till then hee had refused, and that hee should send her to the Campe (if he pleased) with a rich and sumptuous traine. Sforza made answer, that he craved nothing but peace and quiet, and that hee likewise knew, that the Venetians did desire it; provided that Philip were so content; As for Bianca, hee would conferre with her father and kinsfolkes. Este departing with this answer went to Milan to Philip. Pescara in the meane time, the fourth day of the siege, was taken by force, by the valour of Contarini and his Marinners (for the Nauall Armie came thither at Sforza's arriual) and was sackt. Then they planted a great peece of batterie (where with the walls of Macharia of a meruailous greatnesse had beene beaten downe) to ouerthrow the Citadell, which ouerlooked the Citie. Some write that the report of this peece was so great and forcible as diuers houses of the inhabitants fell downe at the only noyse thereof, and that the ships which lay at anchor vpon the lake, aboute fise hundred paces off, did strike one against another as often as the peece was shot off.

Now this Tower being battered with that Engine, was at the tenth shot beater downe to the ground, wher at those of the Citadell being daunted did forthwith yeeld. Sforza crossed the Mincia, and in a short space made himselfe master of Villa-Franca and Vigasio, then of Vallefin and the bridge ouer the Riuer, with diuers other small townes gotten from the Mantuan.

During those exploits along the Mincia, Este hauing remained a while with Philip, brought Bianca downe to the Po to Mantua. This caused the Venetians to suspect Sforza, for that he was so soone reconciled to his father-in-law; and they were afraid lest the Common-wealth would receiue some detriment by that reconciliation. But Sforza being intreated to goe to Marmariolo a village of the Mantuans where Bianca lay there to conferre of peace and Marriage, hee answered that hee would not goe without the Senates leaue to an enemies Countie; the which hee thought they would not suffer him to doe. This answer caused the Venetians no more to doubt of his loyalty. Hereupon the Ladie was by the Riuer Po brought from Mantua to Ferrara; and Este three daies after followed her thither.

Piccinino after the ouerthrow receiued at Anglare, departed from the Burrough whither he had retired after the battaile, and went into Flaminia; and being life in the companie of his associates, hee did by great iourneys arriue at Milan. Lo Jonico, General of the Popes Armie, did within a while after goe into that Prouince, where (the Brethren Sigismund and Matateste being called backe to the Popes seruice, although Matateste did afterwards returne to Philips partie) hee recovered in a short space certaine Townes by a voluntarie reddition. The Forlani would haue done the like, had not the garrison with Piccinino left in their citie kept them in awe. Then ioyning with the troupes of Giacomo, Antonio Marcello, who was sent from Lombardie into Flaminia with fise companies of men at Armes, hee thought it verie necessary to besiege Rauenna.

Ostasio in regard of his ancient friendship with the Venetians, did vpon Marcellos word, receiue the Venetians into the Citie, committing the gouernment thereof to him, whereupon hee with his wife and children re-withdrew himselfe to Venice: Some say that the people yeelded in despiight of Ostasio, which seemeth vnto mee to be most true, because that I find within a while after that hee was banished into Candie. But whether he or the inhabitants were Authors of that yielding, it is certaine that Lodouico tooke it in ill part; and in indignation thereof did within a while after giue Bagna and Cuallo, which he had taken by force to Nicholas D'Este.

And because the Autumne of that yeare had beene very vnseasonable by reason of the continuall raine, they were enforced by the bad disposition of the aire to send the troupes to Garrison sooner than they vſed to do. Thereupon the Popes forces left Flaminia, went into Tuscany, and from thence to Rome.

Sforza likewise, Winter drawing on, hauing recovered all ſauing Legnaga, which for a time he beleeged in vaine in regard of the strong Garrison within it (although it is most certaine that it was more defended by the continuall raine and tempests than by Armes) sent his Armie to winter, all ſauing one band of men at Armes which hee led with him to Verona for his Guard. Hee distributed the residue of the Armie along the riuer Adda as far as the Treuissans Territorie in townes and villages. This being done he came to Venice with a small traine to salute the Prince and Senate.

Francisco Barbaro highly esteemed in Venice.

The Bressians are recompensed for their loyalty.

Neuer was any Generall of an Armie entertained with greater ioy both of the people and Senate, than Sforza was. For they did not only commend him but had him in great admiration, they gazed attentively vpon him in regard of his great valour, and thought that they saw somewhat in him that was venerable and more than humane. All the States of the Citie went to meet him and brought him to the Pallace where he was magnificently entertained. Francisco Barbaro, who by the Senates appointment after Sforza's arrivall was come to Venice with Pietro Anagnolo and an hundred Bressian Gentlemen, was likewise highly prayed and esteemed. All men did no lesse admire him than the other, for that hee had preferred Bressia, and was of all men greatly honoured. The Bressians likewise were entertained and embraced by the Prince and Senate with teares in their eyes, being over-joyed: and their loyalty was infinitely commended; all men were of opinion that it ought to be commended to posteritie by some acknowledgement; whereupon they were declared worthe of all franchise and exemption. And to the end that the common people might likewise taste of his grace and bounty, the yearly tribute of the Mills amounting to twentie thousand Ducats was for ever quitted to the people.

Great triumphs at Venice at the wedding of the Princes sonne.

Pietro Lodron sonne to Paris, for that he and his Father had deserved well of the Common-wealth, had great gifts giuen him, with three houses; the one in Padua, the other in Vincenza, and the third in Verona. Besides, diuers gallant and vnusuall shewes were to be scene in the Citie, all of them in honor of Giacomo Foscarini the Princes sonne, who at that time was married in great magnificence. But of all the shewes, one especially, being very rare and delightfull, hath deserved above the rest to be commended to posteritie: which was, That from Saint Samuels Church vnto Saint Barnabys shoare, a bridge was made for that time ouer the water, for the pompous traine of Knights to passe ouer to goe to the Palace of Leon Contarini Father to the Bride: who comming forth of her Fathers house entered into the Bucentaur which was richly tapessed, wherein she was accompanied with all the Ladies and Gentlewomen of the Citie sumptuously apparrailed. Afterwards fights at barriers, and other kindes of sports continued sundrie daies and were acted by sundrie persons in honour of the Prince.

Piccinino his vnlooke for arrivall into the Countrey of Bressia.

In these shewes was the Citie busied, whilst Piccinino (who as hath been said though neither victorious nor vanquished, could not liue at quiet) hauing renued his Armie in Lombardie, came in the midst of winter, when no man thought he would haue come into the field, and made a fierce march vpon the Bressian Territorie, filling the whole Countrey with feare, so as before Sforza's departure from Venice, he enforced all the champaigne Countrey of Bressia, and whatsoeuer the Venetians held vpon the riuer Adda, and on the Bergamese confines (the new Orges excepted) to yeeld; and likewise defeated twelue hundred Venetian horse at Montecarlo. Sforza's troups being speedily drawn from their Garrisons retired into the strongest Towns. This losse was accompanied with the revolt of Campetion, who with three hundred horse went to Piccinino's side: The Duke of Hadria within a while after did the like.

For

For he forsooke Sforza, and carried a great Caualerie awaie with him.

During these stirres there happened a meruailous revolt of Townes; but within a while after these followed a greater, vpon the false rumours that Piccinino spread abroad concerning Sforza, How that being at Venice he had beene committed to prison, and afterwards secretly murdered by the Senates commandement. The enemy by these forged matters made all things more easie for himselfe, vntill that Sforza to wipe out these false imputations, came speedily to Bressia. And because the extreame colde weather would not permit him to execute anie enterprize, after that hee had by his presence confirmed those that had continued loyall, and put them in good hope, hee returned to Verona, where hauing intelligence of that which had beene done at the bridge of Valeza which the prince of Mantua had taken, he sent for all the troupes that wintered thereabouts, and went in haste to besiege it; and being taken in a short space, he manned it with a strong garrison. Some write, that at his departure from Bressia, Montecarlo, Soncina, Martinenga, and Casal-major revolted; and that he was not greatly troubled for that losse, hauing rather to loose them in that manner than by force, knowing for certaine that those Townes would proue his, who the next summer should be strongest in the field. Philips troups spent the remainder of the winter in those places.

Sforza recovers the bridge of Valeza.

The Spring-time being come, they beganne on both sides to make great preparations for warre, and to provide armour, victuals, and generally, whatsoeuer might serue for the obtaining of a victorie. Lombardy did not only attend the successe of that warre, but all Italie. For all men perceived that the warre would neuer end but by the death of one of those two great Captains, or by his entire overthrow. Michael Attendulo being sent for by the Venetians, was in the meane time come forth of Tuscany into Lombardy with two thousand men to command the troups in Mellato's place, who drew towards his end.

Sforza (whose great authoritie and command did not onely extend ouer the Venetian forces, but ouer all those of the associates) in regard it was time to leaue the Garrisons, had assembled all his Armie, when as the enemy, who was wont by his Spies to haue intelligence of the least of his proceedings, was in the field a little before him with sixteene thousand men, and incamped vpon the Bergamese on the banks of the Riuer Serioles. His Campe neere to Algelia was in this fort fortified: Before him lay the Riuer, and on both sides of him were the high mountaines; at his back the Riuer Oglio with a bridge guarded by a strong Garrison. I find in some Authors Mella for Serioles; and Legnaga for Algelia. But whether hee incamped there or not, (for vndoubtedly it was in a place naturally strong) he thought himselfe able by long delays to frustrate all Sforza's designs.

After what manner Piccinino incamped.

But it fell out otherwise than he expected. For so loone as the Venetians General with a gallant Armie came in view of the enemies, and that he had considered the situation of the places he forthwith resolved to ioyne battell, and to enforce the enemy to quit the place. Therefore hee beganne to exhort his souldiers to the fight, telling them: That it was greater in shew than substance, and withall assuring them, that with ease they might defeat Philips souldiers; and their fearefull Generall in those narrow straights, wherein they had enclosed themselves; and that they being vanquished, they should purchase fame and a great booty: He told them that hee would vſe a longer speech; if those with whom they were to deale were not already sufficiently knowne vnto them: being even the same men whom so often they had overthrowne, beaten, taken, and basely disgraced. He willed them then to march forward, and at the first signal of the battell to beate downe the enemy, who by his owne confession was more than halfe vanquished; For hee did not send them to the fight, but to the victorie, as being much stronger than they in number, valour, courage, and good fortune.

Sforza his speech to his souldiers.

This being said, hee called for the crossebow-men, and hauing giuen the signal to the fight, the battell beganne to be very cruell on the shore, where Caudaceno a valiant man, and diuers other men of note were slaine; many likewise were hurt, among whom was Treillo. And certainly there would haue bin great slaughter on both sides, had not night giuen end to the battell which beganne very late. Some say that it lasted from morning to noone. Piccino writes, That Philip willed Piccino not to fight, and that by reason thereof, the night after the battell hee crossed the Oglio about midnight; and leauing a strong Garrison at the bridge, hee went and incamped on the Cremonese. But that which Montanus sets downe seemeth most credible, to wit, That they fought more than once with sundrie encounters, and that the enimie did not passe ouer the Riuier, before that Bartolomeo Coyone, a valiant man, had taken Pontologia five miles from thence, or as others say Antono Martinenga: and vntill he had notice that the Venetian troups were come vpon the Cremonese. I can not certainly tell which of them passed first ouer the Riuier, in regard of the great diueritie of Historians. But all agree in this, that so soone as Sforza came into the enemies Countrey, he went and besieged Martinenga.

Giacomo Guisano was in the Towne with a gallant troupe of horse. There were likewise great numbers of footmen, so that the mercenarie souldiers were farre more in number than the Townesmen. There was in the Venetian Armie more than an hundred and thirtie troups of horse, and great numbers of foot-forces. The Venetians Generall vpon the assurance of his forces, did encompass the whole Towne: and hauing fortified his Campe with trenches and rampires, he resolved to keep the enimie besieged vntill he should constraime him by force or faire means to yeeld vp the place. The next day after that the Venetians were incamped, Piccino retired a mile off into a place full of wood and water, watching all occasions, that if the enimie should commit anie error, he might cut off the Victuallers, or those which kept the guard, determining not to fight with his whole forces.

At this day were Philips affaires, who although hee were reduced to that want, as after Piccino's returne he was inforced for the renewing of his Armie to borrow money of certain of his Courtiers, to take vp Armes on credit in shops, and horse and victualls forth of the townes vnder his subiection, yet neuertheless, because he perceiued that the whole burthen of the warre would light vpon him, and being of a great and inuincible courage, and alway busied in warre, he vsed all possible meanes to assure his subiects by new supplies. The Venetians in like manner did the same, being already in a manner victors. And to make a greater shew of their power, they leued souldiers from all parts with greater pay than had euer bin giuen, so as in a few daies they had before Martinenga about thirtie thousand fighting men; besides the Souldiers boyes, Laundresses, and mechanike people which vse to follow Campes.

The ordinance in the meane time still playing, had made a very great breach, which might haue bene easily approached, if Sforza had giuen an assault: But hee would not doe it, fearing (as some thought) that Piccino would haue assailed his Campe, while he should be busied at the assault. At the same time it was by some supposed that the businesse was expressly drawne forth at length without any battell by the two Generalls; and that there was some secret practice and agreement betwixt them to diuide together the towns of Italie, they supplying by the assurance of so great forces, to be able with ease to seize on the Prouinces. But this rumor had no certain author, though perhaps some held it for certain. But the Venetians who in no sort doubted of Sforza's loialtie, had no mistrust thereof. Sigismond of Arimini, vnto whom Aluatore gaue his daughter Polixena in marriage, came at the same time to Sforza's Campe.

Ostasio Polentiano, who lay at Treuilo, being taken as hee was going to the enimie with Ieronimo his sonne, were confined into Candie, where both of them not long after died by sicknesse. In the meane time nothing was done before Martinenga. The two Armies were not farre off from one another; the one intending the siege, and the other how to surprize. But the businesse on both sides went slowly forwards.

Philip

Philip being either incited by the reports that were disperfed of the trecherous accord made betwixt the two Generalls, or else being wearied with the great expences of the warre: or rather, as some affirme, being vrged with the insolent demands of Piccino and the rest that were in pay vnder him, turning sodainly from Armes to peace, resolved to commit his daughter Bianca and all his meanes to the trust & discretion of Sforza. He secretly therefore sent one called Vrbano Rofan of Paulia, or as others write, Ensebio Caman to Sforza's Campe: Howbeit those that haue most faithfully written this Historie, say, That Antonio Guidobon of Derthona was first sent to sound him how he stood inclined to peace, and presently after him, Ensebio Caman, who finished the businesse.

It is reported that Sforza alone treated with this man from the second watch of the night, till brode day-light concerning the conditions of peace: and that in the morning both of them comming forth of his cabinet, they publicly shewed themselves with smiling countenances. Manie were already come to the Generalls tent (asthe manner is) to bid him good morrow, among whom was Mariopietro the Prouidator: Sforza turning towards him and the rest smiling said, Gentlemen I proclaime peace to you, wee must take no more of warre nor Armes, wee must only thinke on peace and quiet.

This aduertisement being new and vnlookt-for, seemed verie strange to the Venetian and the rest, who asked of one another what was meant thereby, and why Sforza was so soone turned from Armes to peace, and of Philips capitall enimie became his friend. These newes were forthwith spread ouer the whole Campe: And the Generall presently commanded the Souldiers no more to execute any hostile actions. The like did Philips Commissioner cause to be done in Piccino's Armie. It is reported for a wonder, that the verie selfe-same day, there was such a mutuall congratulation among the Souldiers, and such frequent comming to and fro, from one Armie to the other, vpon the only speech of peace, as both Campes seemed to bee but one, and that the next day the Captaines did publicly embrace and entertaine one another.

Sforza in the meane time had sent Angelo Simonetto to Venice to acquaint the Prince and Senate, with what had bene done.

Piccino did not long conceale his griefe; but hauing drawne the Garrison forth of Martinenga, he marched to the Territorie of Lodes, where he greatly complained on Fortune and Philip; for that they had betrayed a poore, lame, and olde man.

O Fortune (quoth he) and thou Philip most ingratefull, could ye without my knowledge treat of a businesse of so great consequence? and is this the recompence of my seruices for the space of so many yeares in heate and cold, faire weather and foule, done to an vnthankfull Prince? O how vaine are all my toiles and forepassed dangers? To what purpose hath my laboer bene, to what end my industrie? why hath my labour and speed so often restored Philips affaires wholly ruined? I haue serued and defended him in his soueraigne authoritie, that now proueth mine enimie; for certainly hee holdeth mee for such an one; nor doe I thinke but that hee hates mee more than an enimie. Hee hath giuen his daughter to Sforza, he hath committed all his meanes vnto him; But of wretched Piccino, of whose loue, affection, and industrie, he hath had so great triall, hee hath no remembrance, esteeming him not only unworthie of greater honour, but reputeth meanely of him, not vouchsafing to acquaint him with the motion of the peace. O how more than true is that saying, That there is nothing more vaine and vncertaine than the fauour of a great Prince, and that there is no more assurance in depending vpon such an one, than in the wordes and actions of a mad-man.

Such were Piccino's complaints: when Sforza, after that he had recovered Martinenga, and other Townes on the Cremonese, and committed the troups to Mariopietro the Prouidator, went to Venice, where comming into the Senate he spake in this manner to the Senators:

Sforza

Philips rejoiceth.

Peace is concluded by Sforza and Philips contrary to misfortune.

Piccino his complaints vpon the report of peace.

Sforza his Oration in the Senate.

VEe haue O Prince and Senators by the fauour of Almighty God and your good fortune, till now, so daunted Philips great forces, and in such sort lessened his greatnesse by many overthrowes one after an other, as hee hath bene of late enforced to send to your Campe, and humbly to sue for peace, wherof he hath made me Iudge and Author. Your Armie is safe and in good estate, wee haue recovered the Townes which hee tooke from you, which are vnder the command of your Prouidator. Besides, I bring you peace if you thinke it worthe of you, and such, as being receiued may profit the Common-wealth. Receiue it if ye so please, with as good as it is offered. But if ye thinke it more expedient still to continue the warre (seeing it lieth in you to embrace which of the two ye shall best like of) command what you will haue to be done. As for my selfe, I will endeavour, if fortune answer my desire, to finish this war to your contentment, with as great loialtie and constancie as I haue undertaken it, and by Gods helpe to continue it to the end.

Sforza's arriual was very pleasing, much more his sweet and gracious speech; but peace most of all. For they could not haue wished for one more iust and advantageous: Therefore they highly thanked him, for that by the selfe-same valour and loialtie as hee had begunne that long and tedious warre, he had brought it to the desired end. And concerning peace they answered him, That the Venetians were pleased with it, and would hold that for firme which he had made with the enemy: Hee had leaue then when he pleased to depart, and to dispose, (they praying God that it might be to the profit and honour of the Republike and his owne) of the publike businesse, as hee should thinke fit. For they were assured that he could doe nothing, but that which would be profitable and honourable for the Common-wealth.

In this manner he went forth of the Senate, reioicing as much for that peace as for a victorie, and so returned to the Campe. From whence sending the Armie to Garrisons, he stayed at Capriana, to giue audience to Ambassadors who he knew would come thither to him from all parts of Italie. There came to him at the same time the Patriarke Lodouico Nuncio to Pope Eugenius; who taking his leaue of him to returne to Rome, Blondus of Furlie the Historian remained with Sforza. Nerius Capare and Angelo Acciaiole were sent from the Florentines; Francisco Barbizito and Paulo Troni from the Venetians, to the end that if neede were, some might be there to defend the Venetians cause. Nicholas Arcimbaldi, and Franchino Castellone were sent by Philip from Milan: diuers others came thither, as Ambassadors from other Princes and Common-wealths.

Philip according to his promise at the beginning, hauing called backe his daughter from Ferrara, did send her with a gallant Nuptiall traine to Cremona. Commissioners likewise were appointed from him & in his name to giue the Citie and Castle of Cremona to Sforza for her dowrie; The which to receiue together with the Ladie, he came thither, attended on by three thousand horse. And entring the Castle glistering in Armes with a number of his choice friends, comming neare to the Ladie he spake vnto her in this manner.

Sforza's speech to his future Bride.

IHaue along time laboured (my dearest Spouse) to attaine to this so much desired marriage. The good will which I haue euer borne to thee since I first made suite to haue thee to my Wife, hath neuer suffered me to take rest, but night and day thou hast bene imprinted in my minde: And it did greatly delight me to see thee that enioyed our good fortune, to haue so much credit with thy Father Philip, as that by thy meanes hee denied mee his Daughter: I resolved either either to die valiantly, or else to winne thee: if not by faire meanes, at leastwise by force of Armes. I will not deny but that I tooke armes, and did enterprize a dangerous warre, but it was to let thee see how that there is nothing how difficult soeuer but I would attempt for thy sake. I neuer hated Philip, because he was thy father, and by thee my father-in-law: nor did I ener so much desire to hurt him, as I was willing to keepe him from offending mee. The which may easily be discerned by the effects that ensued. Hee was desirous to haue mee by downe Armes, I presently disaioy: He made me Iudge and Vmpire of the peace, I haue procured him a perpetual peace with the Venetians. Whereunto hath all this tended, but to let thee know that I neuer had anie intention either to hurt thee or thine? And doe not thinke, because thou seest me armed, that thou art sent to an enemy, and not to a loving husband. For it becometh the daughter of a great Prince, to be in this manner first saluted by a souldior and great Captaine her husband. There remaineth nothing to doe, but that with mutual affection we loue one another, and that by thy measures thy father may hereafter thinke well of us: And for mine owne part, I will loue and honour him as our common father, with the like affection as thy selfe.

This he spake (according to Pafus of Arimini) and the better to oblige the Ladie to himselfe he presented her with many rich gifts. Others say that hee was betrothed vnto her in Saint Sigismonds Church without the Citie; and they make no mention of Sforza's speech to his wife. The Nuptials being solemnized hee spent certaine dayes in dispatching the Ambassadors. For on the one side the Popes Nuncio craued Bologna which Piccinino held, and Rauenna which was possessed by the Venetians. On the other side the Venetians were not well pleased, because that Legnaga, and those Towns which they had formerly possessed in the Gyralda-de, were taken from them. Philips cause was well debated there, as was that of Prince Gonzaga by those whom they had sent thither. The one craued Lonada Pescara and diuers other Townes; and the other Brescia and Bergamo, two most excellent Cities. In the end after sundrie contentions, Sforza pronounced his sentence in this manner, That Philip should pretend no claime to the Bressan nor Bergamesc Territories, but that those two Cities with their dependances should remaine to the Venetians: Cremona and all the Cremonese should be the dowrie of Bianca his wife. That the Venetians should surrender Martinengo to Philip, with all the Cities in the Gyralda-de: That they should haue Lonada and Pescara. And Gonzaga should haue againe what hee before belonged to the Mantuan Countie, in this condition renewed: That after he had drawne his Garrison from Legnaga, he should deliuer both it and the Hauens to the Venetians: That the Venetians should enioy Riua, Torbolles, and Portera, which they had wonne by force of Armes, together with Radenat: That Pope Eugenius within two years should haue Bologna restored from Piccinino: That Prince Augustino should restore to the Florentines those Townes which he had taken from them, and which hee possessed, should be freed from his imprisonment: That the Genoueses should enioy their libertie and should haue no more to doe with Philip. And besides, concerning peace (wherof hee had an especiall care) his will was, That euery one should religiously obserue it.

This sentence of Sforza being with consent of the rest approued, was by the Popes Nuncio reiected, who was about to cause others to dislike of it, because, as he thought, they had done a great matter for the good of the Roman Church. Whereupon, in a rage hee went to Florence, and from thence to Rome. Peace was in this sort concluded on the fourteenth day of September, the yeare one thousand and twentie from the Cities foundation, and in the fourth yeare of the last warre with Philip. In Venice, enerrall processions were made for three dayes space, & thankgiuing to Almighty God for that the Common-wealth was not only freed from a most dangerous war, but, for that by peace they had encreased their State. The Prisons were set open, and offenders quitted. Those that lay for debt vnder the summe of one hundred pounds, were discharged, and those that ought more paid but the one halfe.

wife commeth to Venice.*

Sforza the third year after his coming into Lombardie, went to Venice with his wife: the Prince and the whole Senate went forth to meet him. The Princes wife being attended on by all the Ladies of the Citie received the new married wife in the Bucentauro, and were lodged in the Pallace of the Bernardi, which for that purpose was sumptuously furnished. The publike streets, and all the shoppes from Rialto to Saint Marks were stuffed with all sorts of rich merchandize, which gaue great admiration to strangers. All the treasure which is kept in a part of the Church, was laid abroad to be seene and viewed of all men: Then great presents were giuen to both of them: And at last, when they tooke their leaue to goe to La Marca, the Prince and Nobilitie accompanied them as far as Malamoc.

Those of Milan with in a while after, hauing made a league with the Venetians, doe attempt to defend their libertie against SFORZA.

Lombardie after Sforza's departure was for a time peaceable, but in the meane space, the Venetians affaires were not very quiet: Their care for the Warre of La Marca, and the tumults of the Bologneses did a long time hold them in suspence, till such time as Philip renewed the Warre against them vpon the Cremonese, the which after his death was disperfed ouer all Lombardie: but wee will hereafter set downe what was the cause thereof, and likewise what end it had. And now seeing that the order of the affaires doe so require it, we will insitt a little vpon that which the Venetians did as well at home in the Citie, as abroad forth of Italie. The which we thought fitt to insert in the beginning, because we finde it first mentioned in the Venetian Histories.

Now

Andrea Dandolo is sent Ambassador to the Soldan of Babylon.

Now Lombardie being at quiet, Andrea Dandolo was sent Ambassador to the king of Babylon, vpon a rumour that was spread, how that the Venetians had carried away diuers of his subiects forth of the country, and transported them into the West, hauing slaine them, and sold the rest, to the end that the Soldan might know that it was not done by the consent of the Common wealth; seeing that the Author thereof for want of appearance at an appointed day had bene condemned as guiltie, although that a while after comming by the Senates leaue to iustifie himselfe, hauing proued that he had bene enforced so to doe, it is reported that by a generall consent he was acquitted.

Mellatoe death.

About the same time Mellato that excellent Captaine, who had so well deserved of the Republike, died. The Senate in memorie of his good seruices caused his statue on horse-backe to be erected neere to S. Antonys Church in Padua. The same yeare three new Procurators of S. Marke were created. Lodouico Lauretano was chosen at the first assemblee, Pauolo Troni at the second; Francisco Barbarico, sumamed the rich at the last, so that then, they who were wont to be but fixe, were encreased to nine. There were besides at the same time three ships of burthen armed, and one galley, which were sent to Sea to free it from Pirates. For it was reported that the Sotolani verie famous Routers, did scoure those Seas: And within a while after, foure Gallies departed from the Citie vnder the command of Antonio Diade for the guard of the Gulph. This man by meanes of some others of the contrarie part that fauoured the Venetians, tooke the Citie of Antuari in Albania by force: the which he reduced vnder the Venetians command.

The Citie of Antuari subiect to the Venetians

A great deluge at Venice.

The same yeare which was the thousand and two and twentieth from the foundation of the Citie, on the sixth day of Nouember, the Sea did in such sort overflow all the freets in the Citie, as an incredible quantitie of Marchandize was there with spoiled. It is thought that the marchants lost by that inundation more in value than a million of Gold. The Hungarians at the same time fought against the Turkes with prosperous successe; who within a while after receiued a greater overthrow in the lower Misia, at this day called Valachia.

Justice assailed by the Venetians.

The Pirates in the meane time were so strong at Sea as the Marchants vpon all the Sea-coasts had no safe place of retreat, so that the yerie hauens of Apulia, and Calabria where the marchants comming from the higher Sea were wont to touch, were not free from their piracies. The Venetians hauing oftentimes complained to Alfonso, and receiuing no other answer, but he was forie for it; that the marchants were not wronged by any of his subiects; and that he could hardly believe it: Diade being moued with indignation, went to besiege the town of Bistonia, the onely harbour at that time of those theues; I suppose that the same Sea-towne which stands vpon the confines of the Florentines, which at this day is called Bistice, was in time past so named; and at his arriuall summoned the Inhabitants to deliuer into his hands the Pirates that were there, and in so doing, he promised them to depart thence, and to hurt none of them. Vpon the towelmens refusall, who threatened to discharge their ordnance vpon him if he made any attempt, Diade ranne to Armes, and comming to assault the towne, he would greatly haue endangered the enemy, had not a terrible tempest sodainly arose, which scattering his vessels heere and there, threw the Venetians into the enemies hands, whereupon the Generall of the fleet with his whole companies were taken, who afterwarde by *Alphonso*s commandement were set at libertie, and had their ships and goods restored to them: and of his bountie, the king added his promise to make good to the Venetians whatsoeuer they had lost in that encounter, which could not bee recovered.

Andrea Quirini drew forth the vessels which had bene taken from the Hauens of Bistice, and to blot out that first disgrace, pursuing the Pirates, he recovered from them diuers Venetians ships, and tooke some of theirs, who fearing the punishment that would haue bene inflicted vpon them if they should be taken and carried to Venice, they would by no meanes fall into the Venetians hands, but forsaking their Liburnian vessels, they went on shore in the next Hauens they came to, where they continued till such time as they vnderstood that the nauall Armie was returned to Venice. For then they began more fiercely than before to spoyle and take whatsoeuer they met with. But their vnbridled libertie lasted not long. For Philippe Canalus was speedily sent against them with three ships of burthen, and one Galley. Some write that about the same time certaine Gallies were armed at Venice against the Turkes; but they that write this, doe not set downe the number of the Gallies, nor vnder whom they were sent forth.

Of those ships which returned from Syria laden with marchandize, that of Contareni by a sodain tempest was cast away, the mariners hardly escaping with their liues to the bordering shore: But afterwards being taken into Antonio Abramo his ship, they did againe suffer shipwracke, and were cast all away neere to Modon. This carried with it two losses, namely of men, which was the greatest, in regard they were many, and also in rich marchandize, which was thought to be worth fiftie thousand crownes.

Two Gallies were likewise furnished in the name of Lionello d'Este, the sailes of one of them were of purple silke, which brought from Ortona, a towne of the Pedigniani, to Venice, the king of Arragons daughter betrothed to this young Prince. Victor Capello, and Francisco Lauretano commanded those two Gallies. The Bride for the Princes sake her husband, who was a friend to the Venetians, was honourably entertained at Venice. The Arceball was shewed vnto her; and to the great Lords that attended her, among whom was the Prince of Salerno: From thence being brought backe to the Rialto thorough the Mercers street, it was so abundantly set out from costly warres, as all men did admire it. Such great multitudes of people came from all parts to see her, as with their weight both sides of the Bridge of Rialto fell downe into the water, and carried with it many people who were spoiled and drowned. At her departure from Venice she was honoured with fundrie rich presents. For which, within a while after Lionello came in person to Venice to salute the Prince and Senate, and to thanke them for the honourable reception of his Bride.

At the Spring-time eight Gallies were on a sodaine armed at Venice against the Turkes, at the expence of Pope Eugenius. The Pope referred the execution of that businesse, to Cardinall Iohn his Nephew, of the familie of the Candemares. Lodouico Lauretano, Pietro Zenti, Marini de Molino, Paulo Lauritano, Lorenzo Moro, Nicolas Contareni, and Antonio Candemare were Captaines of the Gallies. Besides these, the Duke of Burgondie caused foure others to be armed there at the same time, which were commaunded by foure Venetian Gentlemen, namely of the familie of the Venieri, Contareni, Lauretani, and Georgij. This French and Papall fleet being readie to set saile against the Turkes was commaunded by Lodouico Lauretano their Generall, who departing from Venice with the Cardinall Candemare, and with all mens prayers, that their iourney might bee prosperous, put out to Sea. The Christian fleet opportunely arriued at the streight. Amurath Ottoman Emperour of the Turkes hauing left his sonne at Salonica, departed at the same time, by the aide of the Genoueses (as it is said) forth of Europe into Asia, whither he was speedily recalled by fundrie messengers. The rumour was, that king Caraman marched against him with a mightie Armie: But hauing composed the affaires of Asia, returning into Europe, he found the freight to be shut vp and guarded by the Christian fleet. This had put all men in hope, that this cruell enemy being diuided from his forces, might by his absence receive some notable overthrow in Europe. For it was reported that Ladislavus King of Poland, hauing caused his Armie to crosse the Danubie in three severall places, did fiercely march against the Turkes in Europe.

somewhat digressed, the better and more plainly to dispatch that which remaineth behinde. Eugenius (as hath beene said) tooke it in euill part, That by Sforza's sentence, he might not enioy Bologna till two yeares were expired. But Philip was more displeased to see that all his sonne-in-lawes attempts were bent against Alfonso whom at the Spring he meant to assaile with his greatest forces. Although Sforza's hatred seemed to be hereditarie from his father (for Sforza's father seruing valiantly in the Realme of Naples in the quarrell of Queen Iane, had brauely withstood all Alphonso's attempts) it was neuertheless augmented by a new displeasure, which was, that Alphonso had seized vpon all the townes which by succession belonged vnto him in Samia and Apulia; vpon which occasion whilste he remained at Cremona, he had made a league with king Renatus by meanes of Nicolas Mice, who for that purpose came to him to intreate his aide.

Alphonso being troubled with the report of this league, entreated Philip if it were possible in some sort to mitigate the furie of his sonne-in-law. Philip, being moued by the intreaties of the King his inward friend, and displeased likewise with Sforza for that hee had rather recommended Cremona to the Venetians than to him, as also because that since the marriage with his daughter, hee was in a manner estranged from his partie, did importune Eugenius to take Armes against him: withall aduising him to take Picinino into his seruice, seeing he could not finde a better Captaine, nor one that was more readie to procure his ruine. To this end they made a league together, and King Alphonso was receiued into it as a third man.

Sforza was fully resolu'd to relieue king Renatus whom Alphonso by sea and land had besieged in Naples, and vndoubtedly would have performed it to the vttermost if before his comming to La Marca, Pope Eugenius had not entangled him in a ciuill warre. Whereupon, changing his determination, because he might not himselfe be so farre from home, he sent his brother Giuanni to the aide of Renatus. But his journey proued vnfürfortunate. For ioyning with the Capallistes, and comming by chance to fight with Alphonso, he lost at Carpenona both his campe and caualerie. Afterwards the king entering Naples, did not only fauour Picinino in hatred to Sforza, but adopted him into the familie of Aragon: who hauing receiued of the Pope and King money for his pay, went with great rumour through the territorie of Perugia into the Dutchie of Spoleta, where at his arriual he tooke Tuderta from Sforza. Then marching through the territorie of Sifa to La Marca, he did straightly besiege Bellafort. Eimers that were present at that journey say, that warre was begunne in La Marca before Sforza departed forth of Lombardie: and that from thence proceeded Sforza's great hatred to Charpelson who came to meete him, which was thought to bee the cause of his death: For being of a bold courage and free speech, he taunted Sforza, telling him, That whilest he spent the time in killing and embracing his wife Bianca, he basely suffered the enemy to take the country of La Marca from him.

Warre being thus kindled, Sforza came to La Marca, and within a while after comming in sight of the enemies, he enforced Picinino that was retired to Amandola a verie litle towne, to sue for peace, which was granted him on condition, That he should depart forth of the country of La Marca, and all other territories belonging to Sforza.

The Prouince being in this sort quieted, Sforza marched against Alphonso; And it fortuned in his way that through the stubbornnesse of the Transionates he commaunded their Citie, which stands on the frontiers of the Prouince to be sacked and spoiled.

Picinino hauing thereupon taken an occasion, and being prouoked thereunto by the Popes Agents, as though hee had outraged one of the Popes townes, did presently seize vpon Tollentino, Galde, Nucernio, Alifio, hauing driuen Alexander, Sforza's

Sforza's brother, from thence. Sforza being called backe vpon these sodaine newes was enforced to winter in La Marca.

Renatus in the meane time hauing lost all hope, returned home into France. Whereupon Alfonso, within a while after entering the royall Castle, which till then had bene in the enemies hands, was by Pope Eugenius declared King, on condition that hee should presently march into La Marca to ouerthrow the power of Sforza.

At this stay stood the affaires of La Marca, and there was likelihood that there would be great warre about the possession of that Prouince, when Franisco, sonne to Picinino, whom his father had left at Bologna at the beginning of the warre of La Marca, tooke Haniball Bentiuoglio, who had bin a long time suspected in regard of the great power and authority of those of his partie, and sent him prisoner to the Castle of Variana. But he escaping thence by meanes of Galeas Marascot and Virginio Maluesia, went to Bologna, where hauing incited the people to regaine their libertie, he defeated by surprize Franisco Piccino, and most of his Garrison. Franisco was afterwards exchanged for Gaspard and Achilles Bentiuoles. But the Bologneses, the better to assure and maintaine their recovered libertie, sent to the Venetians and Florentines to craue aide of them, and to be receiued into their alliance, vnto whom both their demands were presently granted.

Being confident vpon the alliance and forces of these two great States, they did not onely maintaine their libertie, but after they had driuen Lodouico Vermio from their confines, in a short time they recovered all their Townes and Castles. And the better to increase their Republike, they thought fit to repeale Baptista Canedola with all those of his faction, who had bene banished from the Citie since the time that Eugenius had recovered Bologna, whose neece Haniball Bentiuoglio should marrye thereby to extinguish all their ancient enmitie: But neither the new alliance, nor any other bond of affinitie could root out the hatred which time had planted. For Haniball being treacherously surprized by Bertuccio Canedola and other his complices was most inhumanely murdered. The Bologneses being moued with this monstrous impietie forth with ranne to Armes, and on a sodaine slew the chiefe of the Canedols with diuers others, amongst whom Baptista was the first that tasted of their furie: whose bodie after they had dragg'd it ignominiously about the Citie, was at last in the market place burnt to ashes. Their libertie notwithstanding by the suppartance of their associates, stood inuiolate. But these two Common-weales were not onely carefull for Bologna, but likewise for the danger they saw Sforza engaged in. And now the Venetians beganne to repent them that they had so soone dismissed Christoforo Tollentino, with diuers other excellent persons; and that Bartholomeo Ciconi was gone to Philip's party. In the meane time Philip had sent William of Monferrat, and Carolo Gonzaga to make warre on those of Bologna. The Venetians being troubled with sundrie cogitations, dispatched thither Tiberto Brancolino, Thadco d'Este and Guido Rangone. The Florentines had sent thither not long before, Asturo Fauentino and Simonetto. These men hauing easily broken the enemy, did in a short space expell them out of the Bologneses territories. Whereupon all places neere Bologna being in this sort pacified, the associates troupes departed by severall ways.

The Venetian Captaines were by sundry messages called backe into Lombardie by reason of the war renewed vpon the Cremonese. The Tufcans were commaunded to goe to La Marca to Sforza's aide: For vpon the arriual of King Alfonso and Lodouico the Popes Legate, both of them were come to La Marca with great forces, where Sforza was brought to great extremitie by meanes of sundrie ouerthrowes happening one vpon another. But nothing hurt him so much as the revolt of his friends: For Troillo with a thousand horse went to the Kings side, hauing first deliuered vnto him the Towne of Elia where hee lay in Garrison: and Pietro Brunora had already done the like with eight hundred footmen. This valiant captain taine being amazed with those losses and many others, although of himselfe hee was of courage inuincible, after the losse of Stella, and whatsoever almost hee possessed in La Marca was retired to Santa Maria de la Fortuna. It isthought, That at this time hee sued to Philip, and made a secret league with him; wherein it was agreed, That Philip should invade the frontiers of the Cremonese: Against whom there was some likelihood that the Venetians would oppose themselves, and presently take armes to defend that which belonged to Sforza: who comming afterwards to fight, should (as a man enforced) turne to his father-in-lawes side, and fighting for Philip in Lombardie, should strait presse the Venetians.

In this manner, as they had plotted it, not long after warre was renewed in Lombardie, but with farre better fortune to the Venetians than the enemies expected. But before we proceede to that which was done in Lombardie, we will briefly set downe, what was the end of the warre in La Marca. The Venetians vpon report of Sforza's losses had sent Thaddeo d'Asse, Guido Rangone and Tiberto Brandolino to his aide; and the Florentines had sent Simanetto: who being all ioynd together, had foure thousand men in their Campe at Marignane. But Picimino lay vpon the hill Laura to keepe them from ioyning with Sforza; which although for a time he endured, yet at last he assembled all his troupes and marched against the enemy, who being in battell vanquished, left his campe to be possessed by the Victor. This happened in the space almost of three yeares: But in the fourth yeare of the warre of 20 La Marca, Picimino and Alfonso hauing renewed the warre about Spring time, Picimino was vanquished by Ciarpelson vpon the mount Millo: and Alfonso not being satisfied with railing a land-Armie at Eugenius instance, did besides, arme eight galleies to molest Sforza by sea.

The Venetians (as some say) vpon report of Alphonso's nauall Armie, did likewise arme certaine vessells of theirs, which were appoynted for the guard of Raenna. In this sort was Sforza strenghtly prest by sea and land, when Philip sent Francisco Landriano to call home Picimino, vnder color to conferre with him concerning the affaires of the warre. Francisco his son, in the meane time being left with the troupes in La Marca, and vanquished in the mount Volmia by Sforza, hauing 30 lost his Campe and the greatest part of his forces, was taken prisoner in the companie of Cardinall Firmiano the Popes Legate in the Armie, with diuers other great Lords. Manie at that time thought that it was Philips pleasure to haue it so, to the end that Picimino's Armie being defeated, Sforza his sonne-in-law might be freed from that warre: whereby wee may perceiue that the common reports then current, were most true, That Sforza was before then reconciled to his father-in-law, and that hee had secretly made a league with him, to the vtter subuersion and ruine of the Venetian estate.

But Picimino vpon the news of this rout, was not able to conceale his griefe, but lamented and exclaimed, taxing Philip oftentimes, That he had left him nothing but 40 his life, and that he should doe well to deprive him of that; and in this manner falling sick with extreame sorrow, the greatest and best aduised Captaine of his time, did in a short space decease at Milan. Sforza at Philips intreatie set Francisco at libertie, and soone after peace infused with the Pope, although Sforza possessed diuers Townes of La Marca, and Pope Eugenius some others.

At the same time Alexander Sforza's brother did cause Ciarpelson to bee hanged, who was a man very famous for his skill in martiall discipline, onely because he had an intent to goe to Philips partie.

About five yeares after the Pope renewed the warre, and sent the Patriarke of Aquileia to La Marca, who in a short space reduced all the Prouince (Firmia excepted) 50 vnder the Popes obedience. And it was not long after but that Firmia likewise with the Castle was recovered by his Holinesss Armie.

Sforza being retired to Pisaura with his wife, did there spend the remainder of the Winter. At the spring time being solicited by some of his friends, hee came through through the Dutchy of Spoleta, an hauing crossed the Tiber, the better to disturb the quiet of the Citie of Rome, he encamped vpon the Viterbian Territorie: From whence in haile departing, and returning into Flaminia by the Lake of Trasimene, he staid at Metaura: In the meane time, his brother Alexander with the Tower of Pisaura revolted from him. Being on euery side enuironed with enemies he came within a mile of Vrbin, and after that, no great exploits were done on either side, vntill his arriual in Lombardie.

Philip on the other side in the Countrie of La Marca caused Italus of Friuli, and Giacomo Guinano to be headed, vpon suspicion that they had intelligence with the 10 Florentines. Soone after hauing notice of Ciarpelson's death, as if that had given him new occasion to hate Sforza, he commanded Francisco sonne to Picimino, whom hee had sent for into Lombardie, to scoure and wait the Cremonese Territorie. Whereupon Francisco making a furious roade into the Countrie, after sundrie spoiles and depredations, he besieged the Citie of Cremona: which gaue occasion to the Venetians to haue recourse vnto Armes. But because they would not seeme to doe any thing rashly, they sent Lodovico Foscari to Philip; who, according to the custome of their Anceitours, should denounce war vlesse he would desist from inuading that which did belong to Sforza. Answer was made him, that Philip had no time nor leisure to heare any Ambassade, and that Milan was no safe place for him: That he 20 should doe well presently to get him forth of the Citie, vlesse he meant to be outraged.

The Venetians being moued at this indignitie, commanded Michaeli Attendulo General of their Armie, to march speedily against the enemy, who by this time had seized on the greatest part of the Cremonese. He making haile, according as he was commanded, with six thousand horse, and as many foot, hauing crossed the Oglio, went and encamped vpon the Cremonese at Casall-major; but on a sodain dislodging thence, hee marched against the enemy, who with his Armie was in the Countrie of Gyradade very neere to Casal. There, joining battaile, after a cruell fight which continued from daie-breake til noone, the Venetians draue the enemies from their Campe, and in their disorder, tooke foure thousand horse from them. 30 This victorie was not obtained without losse: For diuers of their brauest men were slaine in fight, a great number of whom perished in the water. Diuers of the enemies were likewise taken. And it was thought that Picimino would haue made one of the number if, when he first saw the alteration of fortune, he had not gotten into a little boate, and escaped forth of the battaile. Others say that hee went ouer the Po, at a Bridge.

After this famous victorie, the Venetian Generall did in a short space recouer whatsoeuer the enemy had taken on the Cremonese; and being strengthened with the troupes of Lodovico Gonzaga hee went and encamped on the Gyradade. In this place likewise did the Venetians affaires so prosper, as Attendulo in a short space left 40 Philip nothing on the hither side of Adda but Crema and Lodes. From thence his Armie crossed the Riuer; where some say they fought againe vpon the banks, and that six hundred of the enemies horse were taken, & with them two thousand peasants, two Ganzares, and as manie Galliois, which Lodovico of Seuerine had sent to breake the bridge, by which the Venetians had ioin'd the Riuer to the Marshes. Pietro Auogadre, Giacomo Antonio Marcello, and Antonio Martinenga, because they had fought valiantly that day, and borne themselves more brauely against the enemies than any else, were honoured with the order of Knight-hood.

An other victory of the Veneti-
ans.

Whilest the Venetians were entangled in this warre of Lombardie, Sforza, as though he had beene reduced to the last extremitie, did at the perswasion of Pope 50 Eugenius and King Alphonso, who enuied the Venetians greatnesse in that Countrie hauing quitted La Marca, went openly to Philip. The Venetians had beene before aduertised of his meaning, and vpon the first intelligence of it, they thought it fit to commit Angelo Simonetto to prison, who was then in Venice, and to take away Sforza's pension, and the Pallace which the Prince and Senate had given him: To reuoke reuoike likewise all gifts giuen to *Sforza*s friends, which were so many and so rich, as that it is scarce creable which we find in the Venetian Histories; how that in the last war of Lombardie the Venetians spent five Millions of gold. And afterwards they drew from Simonetto the true ground of *Sforza*s revolt. The Senate vpon this new rebellion did forthwith leuie 400. Archers for the guard of Rauenna together with certaine vessels: Commandement was likewise sent to those forces which the Florentines had sent to Bologna; to suffer none wholesouer to come forth of Lombardie. Philip after al these ouerthrowes sent his Ambassadors to Venice to treat of peace, who were not only entertain'd as friends & louing guests, but were moreover suffered to tarry a month in the Citie: But the businesse being for a time debated on, had not such successe as was desired wherupon, they returned, the matter being imperfect.

Philip Ambassadors come to Venice to treat of peace.

Attendulo after the battaile of Adda hauing fortified the bridge which ioined the Riuer to the marshes, and placed a strong Garrison vpon it, did with great rumour make incurfions into the State of Milan, and in the middelt of winter did with his caualierie runne to the verie gates of Milan, from whence, hauing set fier on diuers houles of the suburbs, he carried away manie prisoners, and great store of Cattail.

Whilst these things were done in Lombardie, one of those gallies which in trade of marchandize had been at the Tana, & was commanded by Zeni Moro, ino, was cast away by a storm on the Pontick-sea; but the goods within it & al the Mariners being castr vpo the shore were taken by the Turks; the other gallies arriued safely at Venice.

Pope Eugenius death.

Such successe had the Venetians affaires, when newes was brought of Pope Eugenius death, in whose place, Thomaso Sasania was chosen, who was afterwards called Nicholas; in whom we haue set before our eies, the onely example of humane happinesse. For in one yeare he was made a Bishop, created Cardinall, and elected Pope. The Venetians presently decreed to send Ambassadors to him. Foure of the chiefe of the nobilitie were chosen, Lodouico Lauretano, (who after sundrie braue exploits against the Turkes had brought home the flecte to Venice) Lodouico Venieri, Pascalis Maripietro, and Christophoro Moro, who was Advocate to the Common-wealth; & the other two were Procurators of Saint Marke. But Moro not being able to traualle through extremitie of sicknesse, Zacharia Treniano was sent thither in his sted.

Ambassadors sent to the new Pope.

Giacomo Foscarini the princes son, being cited by the council of Ten, was in his absence condemned, for not appearing at the day prefixed; But afterwards his innocence (as I thinke) being knowne, he was by the Senates decree sent from Thyrystre where he remained to Treuifo, with expresse charge, not only not to go forth of the Citie, but not to walke vpon the Melstrine without the leaue of the Potestate: but afterwards, either for his Fathers sake, who was at that time matchlesse for his wisdom & pietie towards his Countrie, or as I suppose, rather for his innocencie, he was repcaled from Treuifo home to Venice. But as Fortune when she once beginneth to frown vpon a man, doth cuer after pursue him, euen so it hapned, that soon after his returne to the Citie, he was accused of a murder, & that by his procurement Hermolao Donato had been slain, as he returned in the night from the Palace towards his own house: wherupon diligent enquire being made, and no greater proofes found, he was confined into the Isle of Candie. After that, being again brought to Venice in a Gallie sent of purpose to fetch him, for that the Senate knew by his letters that he practised treacherie, and being vpon the torture demanded if he had written those letters which were directed to the enemies, he confessed that he had written them, and that he had vied means to haue them fall into the magistrates hands, that thereby he might be called home into his countrie, which though it might not be as he desired, would neuertheless be as it might. At the last when they found he was guiltlesse, he was againe confined into Candie: where he died. Andrea Donato likewise being at the same time accused to haue been corrupted by Sforza, was sent for from his gouernment of Candie, and being enforced by the Senates decree to answer before the Lordes of the Councell of Tenne, he was put to torture, and by them condemned in 1400. Ducats, and being deprived of all publik gouernment, to endure a yeares imprisonment.

Andrea Donato being accused to haue bene corrupted is condemned in a penitentiary fine.

In

In the mean time, Carolo Montone son to that great Captaine Brachio hauing intelligence that Philip & Sforza were reconciled, did in hatred to the contrarie faction come to the Venetians side. The Venetian Armie had alreadie taken from Sforza Casal-major & other strong towns neere therunto: Afterwards Attendulo going again vpon the territories of Milan, commanded Tiberto Brandolino with a braue troupe of horse to scoure as farre as the Citie Gates, where in the enemies viue erecting the Venetian enignes, he inuited the Milanais to recover their libertie; But perceiving the enemy not to stirre, he turned his forces elsewhere, & went on waiting the Countrie as far as Pavia; from whence hauing carried away a great booty, he again drew neere with his Armie to Milan, and inuited manie of the Townsmen to recover their libertie.

Carolo Montone seizes the Venetians parties. Attendulo his incurfions vpon the Milanais.

In this place, as they abode neere to the riuer Adda, foure valiant men were knighted, hard at the Citie gates; namely Tiberto Brandolino, Theote Salua of Bergamo, Lodouico Malucij, and Gilberto Corregiano. At length, the Venetian hearing no tumult in the Citie, after he had spoiled all that quarter where he had planted his enignes hee went to besiege Brebia in Brianza, which he presently tooke. From thence hee scoured and wasted all the Prouince of the Brianzines. It is reported that they did there, vlc great crueltie vpon the inhabitants not onely killing men, but young children of two yeares olde, murthering maides, and abusing married wiues. The Souldiers did not commit this crueltie, but the Voluntaries of the contrarie partie, who to glut their hatred towards the poore vanquished, did like brute beastes fall to murther and spoile. The bootie which they brought from thence was thought to be more worth than two hundred thousand Crownes.

The Venetians take Brebia.

Besides, Mount Barri being forced by Attendulo was sacked and spoiled. Leco afterwards which is seated on the mouth of the Lake of Coma being for a time besieged could not be taken. Moreover, diuers small townes neere to the Lake, whose inhabitants were supposed would not long continue loiall were giuen ouer to be spoiled. In this manner all places from the riuer Adda as far as Coma on both sides the Lake being reduced vnder the Venetians obedience, the Souldiers being loden with bootie were brought back on the hither side of the riuer.

Mount Barri taken.

Whilst these things were done abroade, the Citie of Venice was greatly afflicted with the plague, the which daily increasing, generall processions were made, & prayers said at the Saints Altars which were in the streets (so greatly was the citie at that time giuen to deuotion). Great fiers were made in the night time in sundrie places of the Citie, with sweet & odoriferous perfumes, to amend and purge the aire. Besides, al those that were infected with the sicknesse were carried two miles off from the Citie to a place commonly called the Lazaretto. Six boates were by the Signorie appointed for that purpose to the end there might be one in euery of the six quarters of the Citie, into which the towne is diuided. And because this place was found to be verie commodious, not only to lessen the sicknesse, but likewise for the reliefe of the poore (for the sicke were there better and more commodiously look't to) it hath been since then by little & little stored with buildings & all other necessities. Another hath been added neere vnto it for the same purpose, of a costly structure, which a far off seemeth to be a litle to wne.

The plague in Venice.

*Philip*s affaires were (as hath bene said) much disioined, when Sforza departing from Flaminia with 4000. horse & 2000. foot whither he was come from La Marca to assemble forces, went through the Territorie of Ferrara to that of Parma. At his departure the Pope recovered al places of La Marca, Ancona excepted. For the Anconitans being besieged by Land and Sea (*Alphonso*s nauall Armie did vex them by Sea, & that of the Pope by Land) fearing if they should too rashly giue credit to the Souldiers, who solicited them to yeeld, their towne would be sacked, did erect the Venetian Enignes, wherupon, shippes of warre came presently from Venice, who entering the Hauen, defended the Citie; The Anconitans being receiued into the alliance of the Venetians and Florentines as were those of Bologna not long before. Lorenzo Mini was sent thither with seven Gallies for the guard of the Citie:

The Anconitans yeeld to the Venetians.

Some

Some Historians write thus; But many make no mention at all of the tumult of the Anconitans. Two ships of war at the same time departed from Venice against the Pirates, who troubled all the Sea-coasts: the one was set forth by Giacomo Morofo, and the other by Andrea Leone.

At Sforza's arrival in Lombardie, the cavallerie which the Senate had appointed to withstand him, marching through the Paduan territorie coming by another way, was sent on the hither side of the Po to Attendulo's Campe. The preparations for war were great on both sides; at what time Philip the greatest warrior that ever was in the family of Viscontes, being first troubled with a fever, and then with a flux, dyed. By his death all those of his partie and his subjects being amazed were possitied with sundrie thoughts: Those of Lodes loving the name of libertie, did voluntarily yeeld to the Venetians. Four daies after those of Plaisancia opened their Citie gates to the Venetians. Giacomo Marcello, placed strong Garrisons in both these Towns: Then causing his troupes to crosse the River Oglio, he did in a short space recover Colombana and in a manner all the Countie of Lodes.

The Milanefes in the meane time did with great courage undertake to pursue in their owne name the warre begunne by Philip, and chose Sforza for Captaine Generall of their troupes against the Venetians, on these conditions; that if hee could take Brescia from the Venetians, it should be his owne, and if he should become master of Verona likewise, that then Verona should be his; and Brescia should returne to the Milanefes. Some say that presently after Philip's death, Sforza wrote to all the Captaines of the Armie, entreating them to perseuer in their loyalty, that hee would shortly be with them, if those of Milan would send for him; and that then, their forces being ioined together he did hope with ease to overthrow those of the Venetians. He then being made Generall by those of Milan, came to Cremona. From thence, having crossed the River Adda at Picigatone, he ioined with Francisco & Giacomo Piccinino, and with the other Captaines of deceased Philip; and presently departing thence, he did in a short space recover Colombana.

The Venetian Armie, because it was lesse than that of the enemies, retired towards Lodes. Those of Paui being provoked by their owne particular passion, did proclaime Sforza's sonne by his wife Bianca, Earle and Lord of their Citie, in memorie of his Grand-father. The Milanefes in a short space sent three Ambassadors to the Venetians one after another, to demand of them that which had belonged to Philip. The Ambassadors were still answered after one manner; that notwithstanding all those Townes till then taken from Papilip, were well purchased by right of armes, yet neuertheless, that the world might see that the Venetians did love peace better than war, they were ready to surrender that which they demanded, so that the Milanefes would truly pay them the great quantitie of gold which they had disturbed in that warre: But they offering nothing, were dismissed with nothing.

The Senate perceiuing the great warre they were to sustaine against Sforza and the Milanefes, decreed to set forth a nauall Armie, which should saile vp the Po, to the farthest places of Lombardie, and to that ende foure Gallies were armed, and two and thirtie Galliot vnder the command of Andrea Quirini and Georgio Lauretano.

During these preparations at Venice, Sforza hauing assembled all the forces of Lombardie went on a fodaine and besieged Plaisancia, and hauing beaten downe a great part of the Walls betwixt the gates of Saint Lazarus and Saint Raymond, and the Po being so risen at the latter end of Haruest, as the vessells might easily come to the Walls, he did by an assault by Land and Water take the Citie, which was gient to the Souldiers to spoile. Gerardo Dandulo and Thadeo D'Este that lay in Garrison there with a thousand footmen and great troupes of horse were taken prisoners. The one yeelded, with the Castell of the Garrison, and the other was taken as hee fled, when he perceived all to be lost.

But whilest Plaisancia was besieged, Attendulo hauing crossed the Adda at Colom-

lombana, went to waste the territorie of Paui, from whence he carried away a great bootie. From thence, the better to diuert Sforza from his enterprize, he still marched vp and downe the territorie of Milan waiting and spoyling it, where, as wee finde in some Authors, he seized on Melfa: He had determined if Plaisancia had not bene taken, to haue besieged Cremona. Marcello being at the same time called from the Armie returned to Venice: After his departure, Lodouico Lauretano and Matheo Visforini, came as Prouidators into the Prouince. And because winter drew neere, and the Armie not being able to lie in campe by reason of the cold weather, they went to winter in the villages and farme-houses neere adioyning, where the Common-wealth had like to haue bene endangered by a mutinie amongst the souldiers.

Peace was again motioned; by the commissioners of the Venetians and Milanefes, who for that purpose met at Bergamo: Those of Milan demanded Lodes, the Venetians on the contrary refused to surrender it, vnlesse they might be satisfied for the expences of the warre: And although the Florentines and the Popes Ambassadors did exhort both sides to imbrace peace, yet neuertheless they would not bee drawne to anie agreement. At the Spring, although the Senate had wholly bent their designs vpon the war of Lombardie, yet neuertheless, because there was a report that two shippes of burthen returning from trafficke forth of the Ponticke Sea had bene taken by Pirates, there was a decree made to arme three ships of warre and five Gallies to chase those Pirates from the Seas. Lorenzo Lauretano was appointed to commaund the Gallies, and Lodouico Bembo the other shippes.

Sforza in the meane time was not idle, but coming from his wintering places he tooke certaine townes from the Venetians.

The nauall Armie which was set forth against the Pirates (as hath bene said) defeated Vitalis Sardo whom it encountered at sea, who not long before had surprized three ships of burthen who were going to the Vintage of Candie: hee being taken, was hanged. Within a while after, it surprized two other ships of Pirates neere to Naples, where all those that were in them were likewise hanged.

Alphonso being moued with the matter, commaunded all the Venetian Marchants that were in his realme to be imprisoned, and their goods to be seized on. The Senate sent messengers to the King, to know whether he would haue peace or war, and why, without proclaiming war against them, he had contrary to the law of Nations outraged their Marchants & Factors. Alphonso after he had complained of the Venetians, for that in the view of the chiefe Citie of his kingdome, they had suncke shippes which had offended no man, and shamefully put their Captaines and Mariners to death, who peraduenture had not deserued it, tolde them, that notwithstanding that iniurie was very great, hee would not at that time re-sent it, nor by anie meanes preferre warre before peace, but that hee desired to haue the Venetians deale with him in such sort, as hee might haue occasion to be at peace with them: Therefore they might when they pleased depart, and with a prosperous winde returne home into their Countrey with their Marchants and all their goods, and thereupon hee commaunded all the Venetian prisoners to be enlarged, and all their goods to be reftored to them.

Barthelemeo Coyone whom Philip for a time had kept prisoner (who after his death had found meanes to escape, and went to the territorie of Paui, where he vnderstood that Philip's cavallerie wintered vnder the command of Nicholao Guerriero of whom he was kindly entertained, and within a while after honoured by the Milanefes with the command of 15. hundred horse) marched and fortunately fought with (whilest Sforza besieged Plaisancia) Renaldo of Dreux, who after Philip's death had bene sent by king Charles into Italie with a mighty French Armie.

By an accord made betwixt them against the Venetians, the French had receiued the town of Ast of Visconte, but after his death, they not only seized vpon Ast, but vpon a great part of the Countie of Alexandria. Coyone being accompanied with diuers towns.

The Spring time was almost spent, when as Sforza coming from garrison, besieged Mozzaniga, and speedily inforced the inhabitants to yeeld: from thence going into the Countrey of Gyradade, hee did in a short space become master of the whole Countrey, Carauazza excepted. He did besides take Caslan from the Venetians. Attendulo likewise was incamped with his Armie at Calce beyond the Oglio. And both the Armies remained for a time in those two places without anie exploit worthy of memorie. At the last Sforza going from thence, went by land and water against the Venetians nauall armie which waited all the Cremonese. All Quirino's designs aimed at the breaking of the bridge, which Sforza during the siege of Plaizancia had caused to bee made vpon the Po neere to Cremona. There was a sharpe fight, and the Venetian did not cease to assaile it, till hee vnderstood that the enemies approached.

The Venetians
in bridges.

Sforza had fixe and twenty Galeots, which were not well furnished with men nor armor. At his arriual the Venetians were repuled as farre as Casal-maior. The Venetian vessels being there inuironed by the enemies both by land & water were by reason of the vnfitness of the place in such sort beaten with the artillery which that skilfull Generall had planted vpon the Riuer bankes, as being all bruized and battered Quirino like a desperate man, hauing about midnight caused all their tackling and furniture to be carried to the next towne, burned the vessels, for feare lest they should fall into the enemies hands. Quirino being come to Venice, was by the Senate deliuered ouer to the Procurators fiscall, by reason that they suspected that hee had not done his dutie in guiding the nauall Armie. The Procurators condemned him to perpetuall imprisonment. Some thought that Quirino might at the first haue retired with the fleet into a place of safetie, and that he would haue done so, had not Attendulo promised him; that so soone as he should beginne the fight, hee with all his forces would come to his reskew (which not being done) the Venetian being betrayed, did through an other mans fault receiue a verie great overthrow.

Sforza besieges Carauazza.

The enemy being gone from them (for he needed no longer to stand in feare for Cremona) went and incamped before Carauazza, which was manned with a Venetian garrison. Attendulo who had followed Sforza when he went against the Venetian nauall armie, almost to the verie place where the execution was made, so soone as after the rout he vnderstood, that Sforza being come into the Gyradade had besieged Carauazza, he likewise approached with his troups neare vnto that place, to make it famous by the Venetians ouerthrow. Neuer before in any other warre of Lombardie had there beene sene so great Cavallerie, nor so many notable men assembled in one place. For the Venetian armie besides Attendulo, who was their Generall, had in it Lodouico Gonzaga, Bartolomeo Coyone, who not long before was come to the Venetians party, Genil Leone, Carolo Montone, Tiberto Brandolin, Giovanla Conte a Roman Gentleman, Guido Rangone, Alberto Bodienze, Cesar Martinengo, Nicolas Guerrieri, and with them twelue thousand horse, and great numbers of footmen. In Sforza's Camp were Alissandro Borisa and Conrade his brother, Roberto Sansuerine, Francisco and Giacomo Picimini, Guilermo of Montferrat, Carolo Gonzaga, Lodouico Vermio, Giovan Tolentino, Cristoforo Tourello, and Bartolomeo Quartiero, and with them sixtene thousand horse. They often fought in that place by skirmishes, which sometime continued from morning till night, not coming to battell with all the forces.

Carico at the same time being bitten with a dogg died. Hermolao and Gerardo Danzulo, who before was Prouidator in the Armie continuing the same request, Attendulo and diuers other Capitaines, although they were assured that vniclie the inhabitants were relucied they could not long hold out, were not for all that of opinion in Councell to giue battaile: but others insisting on the contrarie, they did at last conclude, that it was better to hazard the last fortune of warre, than by a lingering encamping to suffer the inhabitants being tired with the siege to yeeld: This determination held good for certaine daies. For they could not resolute, principally by what way the Venetians might passe through the enemies. Tiberto Brandolin offered to giue the first charge, by the new way, because that the same side by reason of the marshes was not well guarded by Sforza. For he, being disguised like a meane souldier had beene ouer all the enemies campe, and had at leisure well viewed it.

opinions in the venetians campe.

Tiberto, Guido Rangone, and Alberto Bodienze were commanded to go vpon a holiday when no man would thinke on their coming, to giue in behind vpon the enemies campe. Sforza was gone to heare diuine Service in our Ladies Church of Carauazza which is not farre from the towne, whither certaine horsemen one another coming to him told him that the enemies were in the trenches, who coming with great furie to assaile the campe, had already forced the Rampiers, where vndoubtedly all would be lost without speedie remedie: Some say, that returning from Service as he was sitting downe to meat, this word was brought him, and others say, that riding about noone towards the new way, he was in halt aduertized how that the enemy assailed the campe. But whensoever, or wheresoever it was that he vnderstood of the enemies coming, it is certaine that without any trouble or amazement he gaue order for all matters.

The Venetian troups in the meane time made good the way which lay betwixt the two Armies: Carolo Gonzaga, Alexandre, and Sforza's other Capitaines being at the Venetians first approach beaten backe into the Rampiers, could hardly sustaine the enemies charge: Some say that Carolo Gonzaga being wounded, did not onely leave the fight but the campe, and that being affrighted, he went to Milan, where he assured them that the Venetians had defeated Sforza: Such at the beginning was the enemies feare. But being afterwards encouraged by Sforza's presence, who with the body of the Armie ran to that place where the fight beganne, the fight was not only made equal, but they did beate the enemies forth of the Rampiers: Then giuing a fiercer charge, the Venetians who had fought in the forefront being tired by the enemies who were stronger than they both in force and courage, Alberto, and Guido Rangone, who were much troubled to renew the battaile, and to keepe the souldiers in their ranks, being enuironed with a troupe of enemies were beaten downe dead: and then the Capitaines being slaine, the souldiers began openly to flie: wherein besides the difficulties of the places, the enemies pursuits did much hinder them. For those of Mozainga so soone as they saw the Venetians had the worst, stopt the runnawies, so as they were enforced to yeeld or to fall headlong into the neighbour marshes.

with the venetians.

On the other side, the two brethren Picimini which were at Triuia on the one side of the Armie, did giue in with two thousand horse in another place vpon the Venetians campe. Coyone who was left to guard it, did for a time make it good, but perceiving his friends to flie, and the lower end of the campe to be taken from the enemies, did on foote escape into the neighbour Forrest: Attendulo and the rest, so soone as they knew the formost ranke broken (whether they did it vpon malice, or else because they knew that all was past remedie) betooke themselves to flight. Eight thousand men both horse and foote were taken together with the Prouidators. Danzulo the Prouidator being aduised by Attendulo to save himselfe by flight, answered, That he had rather die neere the publike ensignes, than escaping by a shamefull flight purchase a perpetuall disgrace. The Victorious enemies were masters of the Venetians campe which was stored with meruailous abundance of all things, wherein were two thousand waggons. Attendolo retired to Brescia, whither the enimie pursuing his victorie within a while after brought his campe.

An Armie
of the Venetians
Sforza besieged Brescia.

The Venetians notwithstanding this great losse were not discouraged, but having speedily appointed two new Prouidators, Lodouico Laurotano, and Pascales Ma- ripietro, they did leue the greatest forces they could. The Prouidators being sent to ressia with thirtie thousand crownes could not enter into the Citie, which was enuirowed by the enimie. For Sforza being come thither with his Armie, had by the commandement of the Milanefes diuided it to Lodouico Verino, Carolo Gonzaga, and other noble persons. The Prouidators were day and night at Verona busied in making new leuiues. They did in a verie short space by meanes of great pay assemble many troups of horse and foote: Diuers great Lords likewise did by their expresse letters and messengers promise to enter into their pay, and to bequikly with them if the Senate thought it fit, with great numbers of horse.

Many towne
yeild to Sforza
after the battell.

Victorious Sforza in the meane time recouered Casal-Maior, Riuoltelles, and di-uers other towne from the Venetians. Carauazza the next day after the ouerthrow yeilded. But whilest he lay before Brescia, Picinino went with the residue of the Malan troups, and encamped before Lodes.

The Milanefes besieged Sforza.

On these termes stood the affaires of Lombardie, when those of Milan had, notwithout cause, some suspicion of Sforza, as fearing that he did secretly aspire to the same principallitie like Philip. They then being desirous to preferre their libertie, did by little and little, retire their forces, and did daily diminish his credit, and reputation.
But Sforza perceiving that ere long he should bee esteemed no more a friend to those of Milan than to the Venetians, he resolved to renew his ancient league and alliance with them, for he knew well enough that the onely power of that Commonwealth might serue him for a ladder to mount vp to the principallitie.

Sforza's resolute

Now among all the prisoners of note that were taken at the battaile of Carauazza, and carried to the castle of Cremona, was Clemente Thealdino one of the Secretaries of the Signorie, with Hermolao Donato. Angelo Simonetta had bene acquainted with him a long time, whereupon he brought him secretly to Sforza, who sent him to the Prince and Senate, to let them know from him; that if peace were pleasing to them, they should secretly send to him Giacomo Antonio Marcello, or Pascales Ma- ripietro.

Sforza's secret practices with
the venetians.

The Senate although it had after the ouerthrow at Carauazza, by vertue of their ancient alliance obtained great supplies of the Florentines, & had at that time mightily encreased their Armie, yet for all that, supposing the successe of warre to be vn-certaine, they did willingly hearken to peace. And because Marcello was at that time Gouernour of Verona, they sent Maripietro to the Fornaces, a place neere to Pelcara. The Venetian and Simonetta had many secret conferences in that place, where they agreed vpon these conditions of peace: That Sforza and the Venetians should declare themselves enemies to the Milanefes; That the Senate should furnish him with foure thousand horse, and two thousand foote vntill he had conquered Milan, and should besides for his entertainment send him monthly thirtie thousand crownes. Moreouer, it was expressly mentioned, that the Venetians should pos-seffe whatsoever Philip had held on the higher side theriuer Adda, and should purchase Milan and the residue of the Dutchie for him.

Accord betwixt
and Sforza.

The accord being in this sort made, and all the prisoners set at libertie, Sforza crof-sed the riuer Adda, & marched against those of Milan. The Venetians hauing dismissed Attendolo from his place, sent him to the Treuisan territorie. Those of Lodes, because they would not fall into Sforza's hands, hauing sent away the Venetian Garrison, yeilded to them of Milan. Sforza in a short space recovered whatsoever the Milanefes held betwixt the Adda and the Thesin (Lodes and Coma excepted.) Then from thence he went and encamped within fife miles of Milan.

The same yeare about the end of Haruest, there was a bloodie fight betwixt the Turks

Turkes and the Hungarians vpon the confines of Adrinople wherein fourescore thousand Turkes were slaine, and of Christians halfe as manie. The Venetian Gal-lies surprized a Foist of the Pirats, all the Rowers were hanged, and they that were lesse faultie were made Gallie-slauers: within a while after they met with a Marchant shippe belonging to the Gotholans which was loden with oile, the which they tooke in hatred of their Countrie-men who were all Pirats.

Tortona in the meane time, Nouara, Alexandria, and at the last, Partia, yeilded to Sforza: These newes being brought to Venice, did greatly reioice the whole Ci-tie; and this ioy was by so much greater, as they supposed these conquests to ha-bene made in part by the valour and conduct of Marcello: The Senate according to the treatie had sent him with two thousand horse, and two Prouidators, Lorenzo Laurotano, and Pascales Maripietro; and Sforza had afterwards sent him with Alessan- dro his brother to recover diuers Townes beyond the Po; most of which being recovered and assisted by strong Garrisons; this valiant Capitaine called for the Venetian forces, and went to besiege Milan. In the meane time newes was brought that Lewis Duke of Sanoy, who had leagued himselfe with the Milanefes against Sforza, had sent great troups into Italie, vnder the command of John Compensio to waite and spoile the confines of Nouara; who at their first arrivall attempted to surprize Nouara: But their enterprise failing, they went from thence and encamped vpon the Territorie neere adripping.

Coyani whom the Venetians had sent with Marcello to Sforza, was commanded to march against them, who were reported to bee fixe thousand men. Hee ioining fight with Compensio vpon the bankes of Thesin, did put them to rout, and took Com- pensio prisoner with foure hundred of his horse. This victorie did highly renowne Coyani and did greatly further him afterwards in mounting to those honours which he obtained.

At the same time Errenzo Pisauere was sent with a Gallie to the King of Babilon:
The cause of his Ambassade was, for that the Venetian Marchants had bene badly dealt with by the Barbarians in the Faïres of Syria. Angelo Pisauere did likewise put 30 to Sea with two Gallies against the Pirats.

The Milanefes in the meane time affecting libertie which they had a little tasted, did on a sodaine murder diuers of the chiefe in the Citie who were said to take Sfor- za's partie, then going forth of the Gates in heapes, they ranne towards the enimie:
Sforza did at that time batter the Fort of Mellignana, who vnderstanding of the enemies coming forth who were reported to be three score thousand men, hee did in such sort order his battallions, as those of Milan hearing of the excellent order of his Armie, durst not approach Marcello who was with him, perceiving the great skill and dexteritie of that braue Capitaine in a matter so sodain, did write to Venice, that not onely the Venetians, but all Italie would haue had cause to haue feared that invincible Capitaine if he had taken Milan. The enemies being retired he continued the siege. But all his designs tended to famish the Citie; Therefore hee did so freightly besseige it, as at times running to the very Rampiers hee did with sodaine incurfions set fier on the Suburbs. At this stay stood the Citie of Milan, at such time as the Citie of Venice, had like to haue sustained a losse as great as vnlookfor.

A certaine Greeke named Stamatius, borne in Candie, being by chance at Venice at that time when they did shew (according to their manner to great Lordes that were strangers) vnto Borsia D'Este the publike treasure which is kept in a part of S.
Markes Church, it happened after this manner; That this Greeke being unknowne, and thrusting himselfe among his household seruants, did enter into the Veltre.
Then he was so far off from being amazed at the view of such great and admirable wealth, as on the contrary, hee did forthwith determine in his minde to commit a notable theft. The Walls of S. Markes Church, which in the beginning wee within and without, is down to the pavement seled as it were, with great tables of marble. In that part of the Church where the Innocents Altar standeth, this cunning theefe remoued a marble table. Then falling to worke in the night time (because the wall could not be sodainly opened) he did before day light put the stone in the viall place, and stopt all the chuncks and crannies with lime, so that nothing might be discerned, and long before daie carried all the rubbish which he had made to a place farre from thence; And hauing wrought in this manner sundrie nights at last he got into the treasure, from whence by little and little he began to carrie all those rich and exquisite jewels, which are admired of all those which behold them. For besides great numbers of inestimable stones richly incased, there were twelve Crownes of gold; and as manie corselets curiously enriched with sundrie pretious stones, whose sparkling lustre doth no lesse dazle the vnderstanding, than the sight. There are moreover diuers Cups of verie precious stone, whose brims and feet are entercased with an other kinde of stone of an inestimable valew: I speak not of Altar cloathes, candlesticks and other things for the Churches seruice, whose substance being of pure gold is nothing in comparison of the fashion and worke-manship where-with they are adorned, & pretious stones of sundrie colours wherewith they glister: nor of Vicornes horne of an vnualueable worth; nor of the Princes attire for his head, nor of diuers other matchlesse peeces of worke, which this famous theefe had at leisure taken from thence. But (according to the prouerbe) Adulterie and theft will not be long concealed, and because it would haue bene an hard matter to haue discovered this of a long time it fell out that himselfe bewraied it. Hee had a Golship whose name was Zacharie Gria a Candiot like himselfe, but of a noble family, and a man, as this one example can witness, of an exceeding good conscience: Stemmatu after that he had sworne him vpon the Altar, told him what hee had done, from thence carrying him to his poore cottage, he shewed him his great and famous theft; But this honest vertuous man, being stricken dumbe with beholding it, could not of a long time make him any answer; The sacrilegious villaine was once minded to haue murdered him, and would haue heaped sinne vpon sinne, if he had not prevented him, by telling he was fallen into an extasie with sodaine ioy to beholde so great wealth: this his speech made the theefe forbear to hurt him: Gria in the meane time hauing receiued a most rich stone of him in guift, which for the worth thereof was well knowne, (for it was the same which the Prince at this day wearth on the fore part of his ducal Crowne) tooke his leaue of him, saying that he would go and dispatch some businesse, who presently went to the Palace, and being admitted to the Princes presence, he did discouer the whole matter to him, saying, That it behoued him to make hast, for feare lest he whom he had with much to do deceiued with faire words, should change his minde, and hide himselfe with his bootie in some secret place: and to manifest the truth of what he spake, hee drew the pretious stone forth of his bosome, which being knowne, men were presently sent to apprehend him; he being committed to prison, they recovered whatsoever he had taken away (without losse of any one thing) which was esteemed to be more worth than two Millions of gold. The theefe was hanged betwixt the two Columnes: His accuser, besides a present recompence, had by the Senates decree a perpetual pension allotted him forth of the publike treasure.

The Picnimes in the meane time forsooke the Milanefes, and came to Sforza's side with three thousand horse, and two thousand foote: but because it was certainly reported, that the Picnimes being drawne by Sforza's faire promises had left the Milanefes, the Venetians tooke it not well, by reason that it was expressly mentioned in the accord made betwixt them, that it should not be lawfull either for the Venetians or Sforza to receive any into their pay that had borne Armes for the Milanefes. This did in some sort lessen the Venetians affection towards Sforza; for his potencie did beginne, more than was needfull, to be suspected of the Venetians: but the Picnimes being soone after suspected to practise against Sforza's life, whereof Marcello had often wished him to beware, they on a sodaine returned with their troupes to Milan: Some neuertheless doe say, that the Picnimes came from Milan to Sforza, with an intent to spend the winter abroad, and then to returne to Milan at the beginning of Summer, as they did.

Sforza in the meane time did greatly vex and molest the Milanefes, when as Alphonso, to free them in some sort from this warre, did by an Edict expell all Venetians forth of his dominions: This warlike threatening, did presently cause the Venetians to make readie a great nauall Armie: They armed hue Gallies and ten shippes of burthen against the King, wherof Lodouico Laureano was made General: This warlike preparation of theirs by Sea made Alphonso to attempt, both by Lionello d'Este, and by Ambassadors to obtaine peace, who being come to Ferrara, the Senate sent them word that they should not come to Venice, where mens courages being once moued, it was but in vaine to seeke to appease them.

Vicore Capello in the meane time who lay at Sea for the garde of the Gulph, did giue chace to a Gallie of the Gocholans as farre as Ortona, which long before had taken a Venetian Gallie, so soone as he saw the enemies landed, and that by aide of the townesmen, they prepared to offend him, he turned the prowes of his Gallies and commanded his soldiers to leape on land, which they performing, there was a fierce fight vpon the shore: The enemies being there put to rout and enforced to enter the Citie, their Gallie was drawne from thence and burnt; together with some other shippes: At the same time the houses in the suburbs which were full of Marchandize, being spoiled, the victorious Venetian retired to his full place of abode, where he resolved to tarry for the nauall Armie which was prepared against Alphonso.

The Venetians being tied to the warre by sea, did by their Ambassadors sent to Sforza trie if they could ridder themselves of that by land. Vro Julmiano and Pasquale Marpietro went to him in the name of the Common wealth with offer of mission and commandement to treat of peace, which the Milanefes propounded very advantageous for them: The motion thereof had bene already made when as Crenia hauing bene many moneths beleeged by Malateste (for the Florentines according to their league, had sent him after the battell of Carauazza to aide the Venetians with two thousand horse, and one thousand foote) did yeeld vnto the Venetians by means of Andrea Dandolo, and by Sforza's aide likewise, who would not haue accepted of their yeelding: Gentile Leonefio was commanded to go and receiue them with a strong Garrison.

Peace at the same time being almost concluded with the Milanefes, was referred to Sforza vpon these conditions, That seuen cities which had obeyed Philip, should be his; but that he should leaue Lodes and Parua to the Milanefes. If he did accept of these conditions, hee should bee a friend and allic of both the Common wealths: And Lombardie being by this means at peace, the Venetians should entertaine fixe thousand horse, the Milanefes two thousand, and Sforza one thousand, and no more: And if he would not haue peace with the Milanefes; hee should be declared an enemy to them both, and that the Venetians should make warre vpon him with eight thousand horse, and the Milanefes with six thousand.

Marpietro hauing propounded these Articles of peace to Sforza; hee did neither allow nor reiect them; but it is reported, that gnawing his teeth, he did lament and complaine of the Venetians loyalty, and that hee made answer, that hee was not onely content to quit Lodes which the Venetians had decreed should be surrendered to the Milanefes; but all those townes which by an accord made betwixt them were to be his owne, if hee did but thinke that they would haue it so, in regard his only desire was to obey them: That he would send his brother to Venice, there in the Senates presence to ratifie that which had bene concluded. After this, Alessandro, Angelo Simonetta, and Andrea Birago were by him sent thither, who hauing a while debated the matter, did soone returne without any resolution, first to

and Milanefes

So soone as the truce was expired which had beene granted for certaine dayes, that they might in that meane space treat on the conditions of peace, the Venetians and Milanefes made an accord: For which agreement, if the Venetians had not somereason, they might seeme to haue degenerated from their ancient custome, by contracting a new league, and abandoning Sforza. But without all doubt they did it vpon great occasion, because Sforza not long before had forsaken them, and he merits no pardon that sinneth by an other mans example: Besides, the loue to libertie (which the Venetians haue euer as much maintained in forren Cities as in their owne) caused them to forget all accords, and to follow their new associates. Nor can any man therein accuse them of disloyaltie or auarice; I meane if he wil exactly and iustly consider the matter. For by the accord made with the Milanefes the Venetians purchased no greater part of anie thing that had belonged to Philip, than by that which they had formerly made with Sforza: Notwithstanding, they did not cease to doe all good offices for this Prince their friend: For whatsoever (in a manner) had belonged to Philip (Milan excepted which they desired to set at libertie, together with Lodges which before then was tributarie to it) did by their means become his owne.

wealths,

Supposing therefore that he would be satisfied with these conditions, they were desirous to treat with him of peace. Nothing therein was done vnder-hand or fraudulently, but openly and plainly, and in the selfe same manner as they had dealt with him from the beginning. Now as the Venetians had taken Armes against Philip in the Florentines behalfe: euen so by a solemne defiance, (as becometh a free and potent Republique) warre was denounced as well to this man, as to them. But this inuincible Captaine by a fortunate aduice made choice rather to follow the victorie which he had in his owne possession, than the Senate, and accepted warre against both those Commonwealths, which by his owne valour and conduct hee fortunate-ly ended.

The Citie of Venice and all places neere adioyning are greatly astonished by a terrible tempest. And lastly are mentioned sundrie exploits of the Turkes, in Greece and Alia.

DVring these new Treaties, Laureano with a mightie nauall Armie, hauing coasted all the higher Sea, came vpon that of Sicily, where with sodaine incursions he assailed the hauen of Messina, and set fire on a new Argosy of the kings of a wonderfull bignesse, which had neuer beene lanchd, and on diuers ships which rode neere to the hauen. He did sink moreover neere to the neighbour shoars such Gallies & other smaller vessels as came to the aide of those of Messina. From thence entering farther into Sicily, he assailed two ships of burthen of fiftene hundred tunne a peece which lay at Anker in the Hauen of Siracusa. The Genoueses, who owned one of these ships, with diuers others, and for feare of the Venetians, had in hast gotten from Sea into that place, had sunke two ships of burthen at the mouth of the Hauen, and drawne a great chaine athwart it, with a Rampier, so as they thereby seemed to be out of the enemies danger: They had besides made bridges from the top of the Citie walls to the ships, that they might with more ease if need should be, defend them from assaults. Lauretano at his first arrival attempted after he had beaten downe their fortifications, to enter by force into the Haven, and neere to those ships there began a cruel fight. But the Venetian having lost many of his men, perceiving that he laboured in vaine, went backe to Sea. Then he invented another meanes to offend the enemy, he filled a ship of burthen with drie vine branches and brimston, and manned it with thirtie valiant men, whom by faire promises he had drawne to that businesse, who with the wind and tide sailed towards the Haven. This ship by the force of the wind striking vpon the Chaine & Rampier, did despite of all the enemies attempts, and to their amazement passe forward to the ships that lay in the Haven: those within the ship after that they had on a sodaine set fire to the sulphuric matter, leapt into a boate which they had expressely brought with them, and by force of oares escaped to the fleet.

In the meane time the vehement flame which came forth of the Venetian ship, tooke hold vpon the rest, which could by no meanes be quenched, so as diuers others which at that time lay in the Haven besides those two great Argozies were burnt in the Cities view.

The Venetian departing thence, sailed to Corfu, from whence he dispatched Zacharia Dosato with one Galley to Venice, to acquaint the Prince and Senate with what he had done in that voyage, & how that by a wonderfull successe he had burnt 20 seuen and fortie of the enemies ships: As also to know from them, whether they would haue the fleet to tarrie abroad, or else after that he should haue cleared the Seas from the Pirates and enemies, to bring it home to the Citie against the beginning of Winter. The whole Senate and Citie were verie ioyfull for these newes, and all men commended Lauretano in his absence, there was no talke but of him: The Senate was of opinion to call home part of the fleet to Venice, and that the rest should continue at Sea to assure the nauigation.

In the meane time the Ambassadors of the Pope, Florentines, Milanefes, Sforza, and Duke of Sauoy, remained for certaine daies at Venice, where first of all the contention betwixt Sforza and the Milanefes was amply debated. But when they 30 perceiued that the matter would not be ended without Armes, the Venetians made choice of Sigismond Malaltefe for Generall of their Armie, and commanded the Florentines to trade no longer with their Citie, because they would not make warre on Sforza.

parations.

Sforza likewise had opportunely provided for warre with the Venetians. For during the treatie of peace he had fortified his townes. He had manned Lodes and Picigithone with strong Garrisons, and made a league with Lewis Duke of Sauoy. And to take all hope from the enemies of any reliefe by the Venetians, he made an attempt to surprize Brebies, wherein failing he encamped not farre from thence, where he builded Forts, and leauing a strong Garrison in them, (because Winter drew 40 neere) he resolved to inuade the Milanefes in the next townes and villages. Sigismond within a while after came and assailed the Forts neere to Brebies, two whereof he tooke, and presently burnt them, and would haue taken the rest had not Sforza in time arriued, at whose coming Malaltefe retired beyond the riuier Adda. Coyoni likewise coming through the valley of Salsina to the lake of Coma, did for the easier getting of victuals attempt to ioyne himselfe with the troupes of Giacomo Piccinino, Francisco being newly dead. But the Caualery which was sent him from Milan, by the treacherie of certaine persons fell into the enemies hands. Sigismond afterwards arriued, who ioyning with Coyoni in Bianza, in a short space became master of mount Barri, and then by stealth victuals were sent to Milan: but in regard of the 50 great multitude of people within it, the death was little amended, or rather on the contrarie it so mightily encreased, as a bushell of wheate was sold there for twentie crownes. The Venetians in the meane time did by all meanes seeke to draw Sforza to a battaile, who was encamped or rather lodged at Vimercata, Meize, and Caratta.

A great death
in Milan.

Caratta. But he still auoided it, knowing like a wife and discreet Captaine, that by the continuance of the siege, the Milanefes would by famine be sodainly reduced to such extremitie, as they would be enforced whether they would or no, to yield. The Venetians Armie after the taking of the mount of Brianza went to Trezzia: Winter was already much spent, and yet neither the one or other were idle, but still as occasion was offered by one of the sides sometimes towards the Rampiers of Brebies, and then neere to the bridges which were made ouer the riuier Adda, there did daily in a short space happen sundrie light encounters, and yet all their forces neuer ioynd.

10 Sforza's constancie was admirable in the continuation of that siege, who although he vnderstood, that besides the Venetians and Milanefes, king Alphonso did openly arme against him, neuertheless constantly continued his siege, till such time as the Milanefes being by famine reduced to all extremitie, hauing on a sodaine taken Armes, and murdered Lenardo Venieri in the Pallace, who from the beginning had bene sent thither by the Venetians as their Ambassador, yielded themselves and saluted Sforza for their Prince, whom they sent for into the Citie.

Sforza hauing obtained what he desired, commanded the Venetians to be set at libertie, who had bene imprisoned after Veniero's death: This valiant Captaine was desirous to oblige the Venetians to him by all good offices: for they being reconciled, he knew well enough that he needed not feare any warlike menaces from any place else. He had an inkling that there was a motion of peace made with king Alphonso, which if it tooke effect, he was in some feare of great warre not onely against the Venetians, but in a manner against all Italie. The businesse being begunne at Ferrara whither Pascalis Mariopietro had bene sent to that purpose, had at last such successe as they desired: for peace ensued about the fifth of Iune: the treatie hauing continued certaine monethes.

the venetians
and king Alphonso.

This yeare was the yeare of Iubilie, and from all parts of Europe multitudes of people came to Rome. It happened that a Germane Ladie in the companie of certain knights going in pilgrimage through the Mantuan & Verona territories, was 30 seized on to be rauished, and her friends slaine: But the abhorring such wickednesse would neither by intreaties nor force be drawne to consent to the vnbridled appetite of the rauisher. Whereupon she chose rather to suffer her chaste bodie; after it had bene miserably tormented, to be put to the edge of the sword, than to defile it by a voluntarie sinne. Sigismond of Arimini, whom the Venetians had newly called, was at the same time encamped thereabout, who because he was young and valiant, was suspected to haue seized on this strange Ladie, being enflamed with her rare beautie. But he, in regard the Senate was highly moued at the matter, to cleare himselfe from that imputation, sent some of his Captains as guiltie of the crime, bound hand and foote to Venice, who being found to be guiltlesse, were sent backe 40 againe without any hurt.

Peace being concluded at Ferrara, was to the great content of euerie one published ouer all the Citie by sound of trumpet. Lauretano who had bene commanded to send seuen Gallies for supplies, at such time as they were vncertaine of peace, hauing left some of his Gallies for the guard of the Gulph, brought home the rest of the fleet to Venice. This yeare was not onely famous for deuotion, but for the arrival of the Emperour Fredericke and Leonora his wife into Italie, who were crowned with the imperiall Diademe by Pope Nicholas in S. Peters Church.

The same yeare the Venetian Prince was by the same Pope honoured with the golden sword, with the girdle, and ornament for his head. Nicola Canalis, who 50 at that time was Ambassador for the Signorie with his Holinesse, brought these presents to Venice, which the Prince in great solemnitie did weare vpon that day that the peace was published. Peace at the same time was treated of with Sforza by Ambassadors. Pascalis Mariopietro was to that end sent to Crema, whither Ambassadors were come from Milan to treatie of that businesse. The Senate likewise sent Ambassa-

Ambassadors to congratulate Borſia d' Aſte for his promotion to his new principallitie, who after the death of Leonello had bene with a generall conſent proclaimed Prince. At the ſame time likewiſe Hermolao Danato, a Venetian Gentleman, was murdered. The Senate by a decree, made ſharpe ſearch for the murderers, and promiſed a perpetuall penſion (beſides a preſent recompence) to him that ſhould bewray them. The Duke of Aultria, the Emperours brother, in his journey from Rome towards Germanie came to Venice: The Prince and Senate went to meete him, and being received into the Bucentauro, he was conducted to the Pallace of Aſte which was ſumptuouſly prepared for his lodging: and hauing at leiſure viewed the Cittie, he went home into Germanie. In the accord which they made with king Alphonſo; the Sienois, the Duke of Sauoy, the Maqueſſe of Montferrat, and the Lords of Corregia were included: their Commiſſioners ſent for that purpoſe, did at one time meete at Venice.

Ambassadors came from the king of that part of Illiria, which at this day is called Boſſina, who from their maſter did preſent the Prince with ſoure gallant horſes, hawkes, and ſtagons of ſiluer; they ſaid that they came, to bring the preſents, and in their maſters name to congratulate in the preſence of the Prince and Senate, the marriage of his daughters; one of whom had married Stephen the Vayuod, and the other, Calotianes Viceroy of Hungarie. And that therefore the King their Lord did with perpetuall happineſſe to the Prince, Senate, and people of Venice his friends, for 20 that he had made new alliance with two ſuch great perſonages. That he did beſides take a ſolemne oath to continue a perpetuall friend to the Venetians, which ſo long as he ſhould liue, he would religiously keepe. The Prince and Senate did highly thanke the king, and gaue kinde entertainment to the Ambaſſadors.

Whileſt theſe things were done at Venice, Gentilis Leoneſio, and Tiberto Brandolino, (ſome Authors mention Piccinino in ſteede of Brandolino) did by the Senates commendement take ſeate and hundred horſe from Coyon which he had with him on the territorie of Verona, againſt whom, (hauing practiſed ſome noueltie) they came on a ſodaine as they had bene commanded: But himſelfe eſcaping, went to Mantua to Prince Lodouico. At the ſame time king Alphonſo, the Venetians and their 30 aſſociates, did chace the Florentines from their confines, in hatred to Sforza whom they had aſſiſted with money. Carolo Gonzaga vpon the firſt report of this warre came to the Venetians to implore their aid and ſuccour againſt his brother Lodouico, who he ſaid had wrongfully bereft him of thoſe lands which he had till then poſſeſſed by his fathers teſtament. The Venetians did louingly receiue him, and did put him in hope, whether that they had peace or warre ſoone to reſpoſſeſſe him in his eſtate: and the Commonwealth gaue him in the meane time a thouſand crownes a moneth for the entertainment of himſelfe and familie.

Lodouico Biſhop of Aquileia came to Venice, and within a while after Pietro Barbe Cardinall (who when hee came to be Pope, would needs be called Paulo;) great 40 troups of Gentlemen went forth to meete either of them, and both of them were honorably entertained. But the Emperour Fredericke had more princely reception, who with Leonora his wife came to Venice about the Spring time of the yeare following. For ſuch great numbers of boates neuer went forth to meet any Prince whatſoeuer. It is reported that beſides the Bucentauro richly hung with cloath of gold wherein the Prince and chiefe Senators were, foure great veſſels were ſet forth, whoſe poores were all gilded, in which were the whole nobilitie of Venice: Theſe followed the Bucentauro as their Admirall: The Gallies went after them. The Ganzares and patifcherms which are leſer veſels, to the number of ſix ſcore, were as gallantly decked as thoſe of the Clariffimi, in which were the com- 50 mon Citizens, who did ſtrive to exceed one another in brauerie. The whole Cittie was hung that day with cloath of gold, purple, ſcarlet, and violet colour: In euerie place muſicall instruments, ſongs, and ſweet voyces were heard, which did in a manner rauſh the hearers. Fredericke being come to S. Clements Church, where the Prince Prince met him, came forth of the Duke of Ferraracs Barge, and went into the Bucentauro where the good old Prince Foſcare welcomed, and ſeated him in a throne of Golde; and then ſate downe next to him: He was with great ioy and generall applauſe conducted through the middelt of the Cittie to the Pallace of Aſte; which the Common-wealth had richly furniſhed for his lodging.

The Empreſſe Leonora within a while after came to Venice; and to the end that her entrie into the Cittie might be more magnificent, ſhee tarried three dayes at S. Nidholas on the ſhoare; then vpon an holiday ſhe was receiued into the Bucentauro, by the Princes wife, and two hundred of the faireſt Ladies glitſtering with gold, 10 purple, and pretious ſtones: The ſame order of boates as had ſerued for the Emperours reception did wait vpon her through the Cittie, as farre as Saint Euſtace his Church vnto the pallace of the Vituri where ſhee landed: The chiefe Senators went to viſite her, and to doe her ſeruce in the Morning and Euening: The day was ſpent in feaſting thoſe great Gueſts: The Councell Chamber was richly hung which was filled with the faireſt and nobleſt Ladies of the Cittie: The Senate preſented the Empreſſe ſo ſoone as ſhe entred her Chamber with a Crowne of Golde ſet with three pretious ſtones which were eſteemed to be worth two thouſand fixe hundred crownes, and with a coate for a little childe as a preſage of her future progenie, with a Cradle-cloth of purple, powdered with pearles. Both of them dan- 20 ced together; The day was ſpent in all delights and pleaſures; And the whole Cittie did keepe many Holie-daies in honour of her great Gueſts, although they had not neglected their care for the warre of Lombardie. Heereby wee may perceiue how curious the Venetians haue euer bene, more than any other people of Italie to giue entertainment to foraine Princes. Fredericke being gone, the Senate the better to provide for the expences of the warre, made a Decree, that all Officers, alſwell in the Cittie, as abroad, Iudges, Registers, and others of meener qualities vnder great Officers, who in anie kinde had penſion of the Common-wealth, ſhould pay a certaine tribute to the Signiorie: And that the Gentlemen, after that they had executed their yearely charge (for euerie one at the yeares end receiued 30 his pay) ſhould ſerue the Republique gratis for fixe moneths longer: At this day they ſerue but foure moneths, whereby wee may perceiue that as the tribute hath bene altered (the which is very true) ſo hath the time prefixed likewiſe bene.

At the Spring time warre was renewed with Sforza when Leoneſio the Venetians Generall, hauing for a time ſcoured the Countrey round about Lodes, Ortholenga, Manerbia, and Pontoglio, and taken certaine ſmall Townes by a voluntary yeelding, croſſed the Riuier Adda, at the bridge of Ripata, and went as farre as Milan, vpon the aſſurance of ſome Bandetti, who ſaid, That if the Venetian troups would approach the Cittie, that the people within it would preſently riſe in their behalf: But notwithstanding the Venetians arriuall, and that certaine of their 40 light horſe rode into the ſuburbs, there was neuertheleſſe no commotion in the cittie. The Venetian within a while after beſieged Soncina, and battered it with his ordinance.

The enemye thinking to raiſe the ſiege did croſſe the Oglio at Canedulla, and with twentie thouſand men marched into the Countrey of Breſſia, where hauing taken Gambare by aſſault he beſieged Ponteuico. The Venetians hauing made a reaſonable breach at Soncina, inforced the Inhabitants to yeeld; and from thence, hauing made themſelues Maſters of Romanegna, they marched towards the enemye, who in the meane time had taken Ponteuico vpon the Riuier Oglio, and were gone to Gella, thereby to be the better able to preſſe thoſe of Breſſia: Leoneſio being incamped in a verie commodious place neare to the enemye, did ſeize vpon the 50 ſtreights of the Marſhes: They fought many times in thoſe places with different euenes: There were great numbers of ſouldiers in both armies. The Venetians had ſixteene thouſand horſe, and fixe thouſand foote; and Sforza had three thouſand foote, and eighteene thouſand horſe. Some Hiſtorians ſay, that they fought fierce-ly ly at that time for three houres space and more, neare to the Towne of Portfane, and that the losse was equall on both sides, but, that by reason of the vnfitnessse of the place they lost more horse than men, and that both sides would haue fought till they had gotten the victorie, had not darke night separated them, Fortune inclining to neither partie.

This was done neare to the Riuer Adda, when as William of Montferrat with foure thousand horse made fierce incursions vpon the territorie of Alexandria, and from thence riding towards Tortona and Pavia, he waited and spoiled the whole Countrey: Sacromur Visconte, and Antonio Burgesse whome Sforza had sent against him to withstand his attempts, comming sodainly to strokes with him vpon the confines of Alexandria, did defeat and inforce him to retire to Castelnou. But whilest these things were done in Lombardie, twelue Venetian Gallies vnder the command of Marco Zeno, hauing scoured the high and lower Seas, came to Liorno. And King Alphonso's royall armie vnder the conduct of Ferdinand, hauing attempted to cause Cortona to rebell, went to the Territorie of Rezza, where al-failing Foilano, they tooke it the fortieth day of the siege after sundrie toyles and interchangeable losses.

It is reported that Asturo Faurentino whilest Ferdinand lay before Foilano, was twice put to rout by the Kings armie; so that at both times hee lost a thousand horse, and certaine foote troupes. From thence the Arragonian Ensignes being come to the territorie of Siena, hauing in vaine besieged Castella, went to winter vpon the sea-coast. Sigismund of Arimini Generall of the Tuscan troupes did greatly vex them.

The Florentines fearing the Arragonians and Venetians forces by sea and land, did by Sforza's aduise send Angelo Accioli knight of the Order, to the French king, who hauing represented to his Maistie the Florentines ancient affection towards himselfe and his predecessors, the King granted that hee would commaund the Duke of Sauoy to cease from making warre on Sforza, and would perswade King Renus (promising him to that intent men and money) to vse meanes to recover his kingdom of Sicill. This did the Florentines craue, that they might diuert the Venetians and Alphonso's attempts from Italie.

Sforza likewise had sent to the same King to intreate him to procure Renus to come speedily into Italie. But Lombardie was still in tumult. Bariolomeo Coyone, who (as hath bene said) was by the Senates command disposed of his forces, being followed with a thousand horse, tooke manie prisoners and great store of cattell from forth the Breslan territorie.

Coyone makes incursions on the Breslan territorie

Within a while after Giacomo Picinino and Tiberto Brandolino with foure cornets of horse, defeated six Ensignes of Sforza's troupes. The enimie being aduertized by chauce, that the Venetians departing from the new Orgies were gone to make incursions vpon his territories, did speedily from his Campe at Quinziana send Bariolomeo Quartiero and Giacomo Salernitano with sixe Companies of horse to surprize them. But the Venetians hauing intelligence of the enemies comming, and being charged with greater hope than discretion neere to lauenotta a towne on the Cremonese, they did courageously abide them, and without anie difficultie did absolutely defeat them.

It is reported that more than an hundred and sixtie of Sforza's men at Armes were taken that day, and that within a while after they tooke a great bootie forth of the enemies Countrey. For Leonesio hauing made a bridge ouer the Riuer Adda at Carretta, and fortified both the ends thereof with strong Rampires, sent part of his caualerie to scoure the Milanese territories neere to Pavia: whereupon Sforza to insnare these Venetian boot-halers, commanded Alessandro his brother to march thither with part of the troupes: Leonesio hauing intelligence of the enemies designe, caused Carolo Montone to march with like number of horse, to be there before him. Now Alessandro staying in a place not farr from the Venetians Fort, and not hauing any thought that his enemies were so neere him, Carolo on a sodain gaue a fierce charge vpon him: with which vnexpected accident he was so affrighted, as without any other fight he forthwith brake him and became Master of the Campe and the whole baggage. But some few of them by good fortune escaped to Lodes with their Captaine, who otherwise had all bene taken prisoners by the Venetians.

Sforza being troubled with this losse departed from his Camp at Gades, and marched to Quinziana. Mattheo Campana being fauored by the Venetians good fortune, made a furious rode with his caualerie into the state of Milan. At his returne, being loden with spoile, hee met with Thadeo D'Este who then serued the enemies, with diuers others: both sides comming presently to the encounter, after a confused fight, the victorie remained to the Venetians: who hauing taken foure hundred horse from the enimie, retired with his whole bootie to a place of safetie. They had no certaine intelligence what Sforza's purpose was, after that he had crossed the Riuer Mella; and therefore, the Venetians Generall went speedily and encamped at Bagnolls. Sforza within a while after tooke Caluissiana, hauing made his iourne thither to none other end, but to make it a wintering place for his troupes in the enemies Countrey: Leonesio went to Gades. This is that which was done in Lombardie during the summer season. The Venetian Captaines hauing intelligence by their espials about the middle of haruest, that great store of victuals was going to the enemies Campe, with a thousand horse to conuoy it; Giacomo Picinino, Carolo Gonzaga and Tiberto Brandolino, did with part of the Armie encounter the enemies betwixt Ortelenga & Ilsea, two towns on the Breslan Territorie; who issuing forth as from an ambuscado, did at the first charge breake and defeat Sforza's his caualerie, and tooke diuers waggons loden with victuals, armour and other warlike necessaries. But as they were carrying away this rich bootie to their Campe, Sforza being vexed with this losse, with expedition made after them, and assailed them on their waie: whereupon the Venetian sodainly turning from his bootie to fight, did courageously sustaine the furie of the enemies. Now fight being fiercely begunne, Heitor Brandolino brother to Tiberto, a valiant Gentleman, fighting in the foremost rankes was slaine, by his death amazing those that were neere him; And although the Venetian for a time brauely withstood the enemies assaults, he would not withstanding in the end haue been enforced to giue place, had not Leonesio come to their rescue with the rest of the Armie. By his arrivall the battaile was not only reenforced, but made equall, where the fight on either side was a while verie doubtfull. In the end Sforza being enforced by the enemies great multitudes, quitted the bootie and retired with his whole forces to the marshes neere to Ortelenga. And thus the Venetians being Masters of the bootie, went home to their Campe.

Winter alreadie was at hand, when as the enimie hauing sent his baggage before him, soone after repaired to his wintering places. But it is reported that Sforza before his departure, at such time as he remained at Caluissiana, presented battaile to the Venetians. They were at that time at Gades and had twentie thousand men in their Armie, wherefore they resolu'd to fight and came downe into the plaine. But the enimie being retired, the Venetian Armie followed him somewhat closely, where Sforza being againe inuited to fight could not be drawne to it. Wee finde in some Authors that Sforza had ordered his Armie readie to fight, but that whilst he expected the Venetian, there fell a great shower of raine which enforced him to retire before the Venetians arrivall. This seemeth to be truer than that which some Annallists write: How that he durst not fight, but did flatly refuse the battaile. If this were true, I doe greatly wonder that so valiant a Captaine who had so often fought with displayed Ensignes, and obtained so manie victories, (and who, if any of our time may be compared to Cesar the Dictator either in magnanimitie, prosperitie, or good fortune, is the only worthier reputed Captain in most mens iudgement) hauing purchased so goodly a Principallitie with such gallant forces and braue Souldiers, without any great losse, & being prouoked to fight, should refuse the battaile.

Sforza comes red to Cesar.

It

It may be that fearing the alteration of fortune, he was become more deliberate: as he to whom we have compared him was likewise in his later yeares: who after so manie gallant victories is reported not to haue fought so vehemently as hee was wont. Perhaps his new purchased State was the cause thereof, the which, being on euery side encompassed with enemies, he might haue endangered, if he should haue put it to the hazzard of a battaile. But whatsoeuer it were that kept him from it, it is reported that without fight he went to his winter-garrisons. After his departure, certain townes of those which he had taken the summer before, in the following haruelt returned to the Venetians obedience. Coyoni, or (according to some Authors) Alessandro, Sforza's brother, hauing giuen an assault to the Fort which the Venetians had built at Sarretta, tooke it by treacherie. He was afterwards commanded to march against the Marquis of Montferrat, where being despoiled of part of his troups, and baggage, he returned like a Run-awie to the Camp. The Venetians on the other side were not idle, but being come from their winter-garrisons, they entred furiously vpon the Mantuan Territory, where hauing taken Streueres, they brought awie great bootie. Carolo Gonzaga in like manner draue all those of the Gybelline Faction forth of the valley of Sassina in the Bergame, and left it free to the Venetians. During these exploits in Lombardie, King Alphonso did still pursue the Florentines, intending wholly to ruine them, and to those endes made great warlike preparations against the spring time: For it was reported that his intent was to take Liuorne, hoping thereby within a while after to become Master of Pisa; And to that end he speedily caused two Argosies to be made of a wonderfull greatnesse. The Venetians likewise by the accord betwixt them, did furnish him with certaine armed Gallies. The French king on the contrarie partie had caused the Duke of Sauoie to lay downe armes, and had perswaded Renatus to passe into Italie against Alphonso, assuring him that by the helpe of the Florentines, and Sforza, who promised him men and money, he should shortly recouer his kingdome.

The Turkes intend to invade Constantinople.

About this time newes came from Greece how the Turkes grew strong neere to Constantinople, and that Mahomet Ottoman their king, a Potent, rich, and ambitious Prince, and then in the prime of his yeares, had builded a Fort at the Out-let of the Pontick-Sea, neere to Saint Georges Arme, and that thereby it was euident to all men that his designes tended to the entire subuersion of the Greeke Empire. Pope Nicholas being troubled these warlike menaces, as well abroade as in Italie, whilst hee first made meanes to settle a peace in Italie, was by a domesticke conspiracie like to haue bene vndone himselfe. Stephano Porcieri or Portius, was the Principall conspirator, Diuers of that family so terme themselves and deriue their originall from Marcus Portius Cato that noble Roman; but the armes of their house doe argue the contrarie.

This man being richer in nobilitie of birth than wealth & substance, & withal verie eloquent, was alreadie somewhat suspected by the Pope in regard of his insolent carriage; & therefore to restrain him from practicing any sedition in Rome he sent him first into Germanie vnder colour of some negotiation, from whence returning home, he was inioined to dwell at Bologna, on condition neuertheless, daily to shew himselfe to the Bishop of Nice who commanded there as Viz-legate: But he being desirous of inuouation did practise vnder-hand by trustie messengers, or rather by letters written in characters, (so it is not certainly knowne how it was) certaine debauched Romans, to execute a damned act; which was, That vpon a prefixed day all the conspiratours should meet at Rome, where hauing at once assailed the Pope and Cardinalls in the Church during the time of Diuine seruice, they should kill them all, and then inuite the Roman people to embrace their libertie. Heere vpon feigning to be sick he kept his house, till he had assured notice that the conspirators were all readie in Rome. For then leaping on horse-backe, hee came by great iournies to the citie. But his departure was not long concealed from the Bishop, who doubting some treacherie, did by sundrie messengers aduertized the Pope, how that

Stie-

Stephano Porcio without his knowledge had left Bologna, and that he could not learne whither he was gone, but that hee chiefly feared that he was gone to Rome, to disturbe the peace of that Citie. Porcieri being wearied with his long trauaile and watching, betooke himselfe to rest, which gaue the messengers leisure opportunely to deliuer their letters, which the Pope receiued the night before the day of execution, who being amazed at the matter, did sodainly resolve to put him to death: The charge thereof was committed to Giacomo Lananiolo of Verona, who at that time was a Senator of Rome, and to diuers others. These with a troupe of armed men being come where Stephano was, he heard a noyse, and being amazed, escaped to his sisters house, hauing left Baptista Sarra in his, with the armed men whome he had assembled for the execution of that mischieuous plot. Now Baptista being a valiant man, so soone as he perceiued himselfe enuironed with fire and armes, made way by force through the Popes souldiers. But the Author of the conspiracie being taken at his sisters house, was put to death. This matter in some sort diuerted the Popes affection from peace.

Stephano Porcio is put to death.

About the Spring-time of this yeare, the Florentines aswell with their owne troups as with those of Sforza, recouered Foggian which they had lost the yeare before, when Alphonso as yet had not raised any tumults in Tuscane. Sforza in the Winter-time came to Cremona to aide Lodouico Gonzaga whom his brother Carolo did neerely presse: But he thought it necessarie rather to relieue the Manerbians whom the Venetians had a long time besieged. The Venetian hauing repulsed him after some skirmishes betwene them which neuer came to any set battaile with a resolute constancie continued his siege. But whilst Leonessio in that place performed the part of a vigilant Captaine, he was shot into the bodie with an arrow, whereof shortly after he died. Some say that he was slaine before that time, and that the Generals place was giuen to Picimino, before Sforza came forth of his Winter Garrisons.

The Florentines recouer Foggian

Leonessio his death.

This disaster was within a while after accompanied with another. For Carolo Gonzaga hauing made a rash attempt vpon his brothers troups betwixt Gades and Villafraanca was broken and put to rout, with the losse of seuen hundred horse. Picimino was not idle, for after that he had taken Manerbia, Quinzano, and within a while after, Ponteucico, which was manned with a strong Garrison, he went and besieged Seniga, from whence by reason of Sforza's arriual, he discamped and retired to Ponteucico. The enimie gaue an assault to Gades, and tooke it. Then there was a cruell fight neere to that place by meanes of Picimino's arriual, where Lodouico Gonzaga whom Sforza had sent for thither, had like to haue bene defeated by the enimie (for the Venetian charged first vpon him) had not Sforza opportunely come to his rescue. The Venetians departing thence went and encamped at Porciana betwixt two marshes. Sforza in the meane time commanded Roberto Sanseuerino, and Tiberto, to go and wast the Breffian countrey. Picimino went and assailed them being loden with spoile, and tooke the greatest part of their bootie from them. Sforza thereupon speedily marched against him, but the bickering being quickly ended, the Venetian with his Armie retired safely to his campe.

Sundrie combats and encounters betwixt the Venetians and Sforzas.

Both Armies did often skirmish with one another as occasion was offered; and Summer was halfe spent, when king Renatus hauing driuen the enimies from the confines of Alexandria, came to Sforza with foure thousand horse. At his arriual he sent an Herald at Armes to denounce warre to the Venetians. The enimies forces being thus encreased (for they had in their Armie, together with the French succours, fixe score companies of men at Armes) they departed from Gades, and hauing crossed the riuier Mella, they went and encamped at Bassan betwixt Manerbia and Ponteucico. The Venetians likewise (for Antonio Marcello, and Pascalis Maripietro were come as Prouidators to the camp) marched to Manerbia, and from thence went and encamped at Porciana. The enimie so soone as the Venetian had dislodged, did by a voluntarie yelding enter into Manerbia. Then Sforza and Renatus gaue gaue an assault to Ponteuico, which they tooke by force, hauing besieged it a while, and ouerthrew the walles down to the ground. It is reported that the French in that place did deale verie cruelly with the wretched inhabitants, which did in such sort amaze all the townes round about, as whatsoeuer the Venetians held in the plaines of Cremona and Bressia, (Soncina and Romanenga excepted) did in a short space yeeld themselves to the enemy. Picinno by this resolt being enforced to giue place, did sodainly march towards Bressia, and encamped in a verie strong place, betwix the Citie, the mounrains, and a lake, which commeth forth of the riuer Clesia, from whence he might easily defend the inhabitants of the mountaines, and all the Bressian country which lieth towards the lake of La Garda.

Such successe had the Venetians affaires in Lombardie. But the Senate was not so much troubled for the danger of this warre, as with the newes from Greece. How that Mahomet the Turkish Emperour had besieged Constantinople. Whereupon, for feare of loosing to commodious a place for Christians (for, that being left there was no more hope of trafficke vpon the Ponticke Sea) the Senate made a decreete send forth tenne Gallies to the aide of the Citie vnder the command of Giacomo Lauretano: They did beside command two great Argozies of two thousand tunnes a peece to be made readie. Lauretano within a while after departed from Venice with fise Gallies, for by the Senates command he was to take other fise out of Dalmatia and Candie. Alphonso promised to send tenne Gallies, and the Pope as many, which 20 fleet of thirtie Gallies was in their names to be sent to the aide of Constantinople. But Othoman in the meane time had besieged the Citie by Sea and Land with three hundred thousand fighting men, and three hundred seuentie fise ships of warre, among which were seuentene Gallies of three Oares on a banke, and others of two, with many other smaller vessels. This they report which were present at the siege. The Venetian Annals set downe lesse by the third part, as well of souldiers, as of vessels.

besieged.

Constantine Paleologue did at that time command the Greeke Empire, who to withstand the enemies, had caused an yron chaine of a wonderfull greatnesse to be drawne athwart the Haven from Constantinople to Pera. The Venetian Gallies 30 turning from trafficke forth of the Ponticke Seas, remained in the Haven for the aide of that Christian Citie. Certaine ships of Candie were likewise there, and an Argozie of Genoa of a wonderfull bignesse, whereof Georgio Doria was Captaine. Then three other Genoa ships of like bignesse which came from Chios arrived there being laden with men and victuals. As they entred the Haven in the Cities view, the Turkes vessels went and assailed them, whereupon there began a bloudie fight on both sides, which lasted long without any aduantage to either partie. In the end, the Gallies and other vessels that lay at Anker not farre from thence comming to their reskue, the Turkes quitted the place, and retired to the pillars of Pera. The last that arrived there, was Giuanni Iustimano of Genoa furnished the Long, 40 with two Argozies wherein were three hundred souldiers.

Aide entred
nople by Sea.

The Emperour hauing embraced him, and entertained him with faire promises, he committed vnto him the guard of the Roman gate. Nicolas Molino, and Giuanni Lauretano kept the gate Cherfina: Baptista Gritti with diuers other Venetians, who by chance were at those troubles of Constantinople, guarded the Palace of Paleologus: And by reason that the enemies nauall Armie had bene beaten forth of the Gulph, all was safe on the Sea side: The Turkes greatest furie was towards the land. They had brought diuers great peeces of Ordnance in fundrie places neere to the walles, and especially at the gate Sutrina.

There and elsewhere the continuall shot of Ordnance had beaten downe a great 50 part of the walles: But the Turke, that he might diuide the forces of the besieged in fundrie places, and thereby make them weaker, resolved, (for other wise he could not doe it) to cause part of his vessels to be carried by land ouer into the Gulph. He did without resistance draw seuentie fise Gallies from the pillars of Pera into the waters of the cattie neere to the walles, & commanded an assault to be giuen to the Citie on that side with threecore and ten thousand men. He himselfe came to guard those vessels whilst they were drawne forth of the water for feare lest the Armie should on a sodaine come and set fire on them. He had beside planted certaine peeces of Ordnance ouer-against the mouth of the Gulph, opposite to the cittie; not so much to batter the walls, as to keep the Christian Gallies from approaching. Some say that those of Pera might haue hindered the Turkes in their enterprize of carrying those Gallies into the Gulph, but that they were unwilling to doe it for feare of drawing that warlike tempest vpon themselves.

The Gallies being thus drawne into the Gulph, there was nothing more certain, than that such ill neighbors would soone procure the ruine of the cittie. The Venetians and other Christians, although in number of men and ships they were farre inferior to the Turkes, did neuerthelesse resolve to assaile them; supposing that by a sodaine assault they might amaze them, and in that feare, to set fire on their vessels. To further whose purpose the night was verie darke and mistie, whereby the enemy was so farre off from discerning them, as they could hardly descie one another. It is thought, That the enemy could by no means haue discovered the intent of four men, and that perhappes the Turkes nauie might haue bene defeated, and Christendome thereby freed from the losse of so noble a Citie, or at leastwise, that it would not haue happened so soone; if those of Pera, who de- 10 fired the ruine of the Citie, had not discouraged the Christians deligne to the enemies: By whose aduertisement Mahomet sent the same night as many souldiers to ouerthrow our nauall Armie, as he had done at the former time.

The Captaines of the Christians vessels being full of hope and courage, set forward against the enemy, thinking that their comming had not bene knowne; but the Turkes being prepared for fight, waited for them, and did not onely courageously receiue them, but hauing on a sodaine discharged a peece of Ordnance vpon a Candior gallie, which was commanded by Zacharia Gria, they went to inuiron all the rest. The Christians being amazed to see them in that readinesse, turned theyr 30 backs. One Gallie which was commanded by Giacomo Cocco comming inconsiderately with two others to charge the enemy, was by a cannon-shot suncke in the enemies view, with all those in a manner that were in her; Three and thirty men that fell into the enemies hands, were murdered before the Cities gates.

A great quantitie of the wall in the meane time on the other side of the Citie neere to the gate Sutrina was beaten downe. This breach was forthwith repaired with new fortifications according to the vsuall manner. The Turke attempted to enter the Citie by a mine, which tooke no effect; for by a counter-mine it was made vnprofitable. A Tower at the Roman gate which the canons had much shaken, fell downe, and had made a great breach, and neere thereunto the enemy had 40 raised a rampire and gabions against the Christians Ordnance. There was a great breach neere to the gate Cherfina, which caused Mahomet, vpon hope to enter the citie there, to giue a furious assault. The Turkes, the more to amaze the besieged, did before day enter the rampires with fearefull and terrible clamours. The Emperour riding vp and downe the citie, encouraged his souldiers to fight valiantly for their Countrey, wiues, children, and liues, telling them, That the time was come, that vnto this day they had bravely beare themselves, that famous Citie would not onely be lost, but the same and renowne of ancient Greece would be cleane extinguished. Hee tolde them moreover that they had to doe with an enemy, from whom they were to expect no grace nor fauour: It therefore behooued them, either to liue with their Countrey, or to die with her 50 ruine.

This did hee speake to the souldiers as hee walked the round vpon the walles; but comming to the Roman Gate, hee found Iustimano the Genouese grieuouly wounded, who began to talke of yeelding, from which the Emperour could by no means diuert him. It is reported that the Emperour perceiving those that fought in Iustinians companie, to thinke on nothing but flight, did stand in his place with those few forces that he brought with him, and that hee did brauely attempt to beate the enemies from the walles; but perceiving that his souldiers were too weake to resist such multitudes, hee was well-neere ready to haue slaine himselfe. But considering that it did not become a Christian to vse such desperate meanes, he did intreate his owne souldiers to kill him, and vpon their refusal to do so, he resolved to die more nobly. For hee threw from him his Imperiall ornaments, fearing if he should be knowne, that they would take him aliue, and with his sword in hand ran in among the thickest of the Turkes that were entering, where this Prince, worthe of eternall memorie, fighting valiantly with the enemies was slaine by them. His bodie falling downe, together with that great Empire, was confusedly mingled among his other subiects: and being afterwards knowne among the dead bodies, his head by Mahomet command was stricken off, and borne in triumph through the Campe and Cittie. Some say that hee was smothered at the Roman Gate among the throng which fled, and that hee was afterwards knowne by his Coate-armour. The enemies nauall armie was not idle in the meane time: for the Venetian Gallies, and the rest of the Christian nauall armie, with diuers others who came running to the shippes at the enemies first assault, being out of hope to defend the cittie, presently went their way, but the Turkes tooke diuerse of them neere the sea-shore. The city was wholly sacked, Virgins were deflowered, yong boyes forced, and wifes tormented with detestable filthinesse, according to the manner of that cruell Nation. Men that escaped death were made slaues. Diuerse Venetians were on that day slaine and taken, among whom were seuen and fortie Gentlemen.

In this manner was Constantinople the chiefe cittie of Grecia taken by Mahomet the Turkish Emperour, and thus was that most ancient Grecian Empire ouerthrowne, the year 1521. after the establishment thereof. The newes of this losse gaue great terrour to all Christendome. Pope Nicholas sent to Venice to haue five Gallies armed at his charge against the Turkes, and propounded to as manies should take armes vnder the Ensignes of the Roman church against those Infidells plenarie remission of all sinnes, which they had till then committed: And if anie souldier that was worth of pay should refuse to enroule himselfe for that warre, hee did incurre his bitter curse.

The Venetians sent Bartolomeo Marcello to Mahomet, to craue restitution of their countrymen with their goods. Another Messenger went ouerland before Marcello, who promised to returne to Venice from Constantinople within five and thirtie dayes. The Senate was verie desirous to vnderstand what was become of those Venetians which were in Constantinople when it was taken, whether they were still aliue or dead, and if they were liuing, in what state they were, either at liberty or captiues. The aboue mentioned Gallies, with certaine shippes of burthen, had already before then sailed to sea vnder the command of Giacomo Lauretano, who vpon newes of the taking of Constantinople retired into the Isle of Nigrepont.

The Senate thought vpon this new warre, whilst all Lombardie was filled with armes and souldiers: for Sforza hauing recovered all towns vpon the plaine approached with his armie neere to Rhoades, that he might become Master of the mountaine: where during his abode, the townes of Romans, Martinenga, the Canonick valley, and Brisanza yielded to him; the like did all the Inhabitants of the Gytrade. Rhoades also being afterwards taken, hee went to besiege the new Orgies, in which meane space, those of Soncina yielded to him. At the last, the Orgies being recovered, Romanenga, who alone did obey the Venetians, did voluntarily yeelde as the rest had done. Afterwards, there were no greater exploits done in Lombardie.

Toward the latter end of Haruest when Winter drew neere Sforza was desirous in the behalfe of Lodowick Gonzaga to take Asola, but he was enforced to giue ouer his his enterprize, and to put it off till some other time, as well by reason of a mightie tempest which then happened, as in regard of the continuall raine that followed it. Renatus being in a rage (as it is supposed) against the Florentines and Sforza, went his way in the middle of Winter, and returned through the countrie of Alt and Thurin into Fraunce.

But to returne to the affaires of Greece. The Venetians being desirous to vnderstand of the welfare of those, who with the cittie of Constantinople had bene taken by the Turkes, had intelligence within a while after by some that came to Venice, that the Venetians that were taken in Constantinople were prisoners, and that the enimie had vsed no crueltie on those whom Fortune had saued: within a while after Lauretano's letters did assure the Senate of the prisoners redemption, and that the Turkes for seuen thousand crownes would set them at liberty. The very same day of these newes, the Popes Nuncio came to Venice, who was receiued by great troupes of people. Hee spake to the Senate concerning peace which he said he had motioned at Florence, and said, that at his departure thence, he would go to Sforza to treat likewise with him: And that the Pope did determine to quiet Italie, the better afterwards to preuent the great daunger which threatened all Christendome from the Turkes, and to that end, he was desirous to be Iudge and Vmpire of that peace, and that hee which should impugn it, should be held as excommunicate, and for an enimie, not onely to Italie, but to all Christendome. This advertisement being giuen, which the Venetians did willingly entertaine, hee tooke his leaue of the Venetians, and went to Sforza.

The Popes Nuncio cometh to Venice to treat of peace.

Lauretano who had intelligence (as hath been said) of the taking of Constantinople, was gone to Nigrepont, from whence he writ to the Senators, certifying them that he was resolved to tarrie there for the guard of the Island; that he had funke foure of the enemies great Gallies, and thirteene other small ones; that their Rowers and Mariners swimming to Land had bene all slaine by the Countrey people; and that he had hanged those whom he tooke in the Gallies. No sooner were Lauretano's letters read in the Senate, but the Popes Gallies which were ready to set saile were commanded to goe and ioine with their Nauall Armie, with which Lauretano being strengthened, determined to tarrie for the Gallies from Alexandria and Syria, and then with that mightie Fleet to set forwards against the enemies, whom he had still forborne to meddle with, till such time as the troubles of Italie being pacified, he might increase the number of his vessels.

Lauretano his exploits in the Isle of Nigrepont.

Within a while after, Christophoro Moro and Viso Iustiniano were sent to Rome to treat of peace with the other Ambassadors of Italie in the Popes presence. The Venetian caullerie before the Ambassadors departure had surprized certaine victuals from the enimie, together with those which conuoyed it, but after that the treatie of peace was mentioned the Venetians made no more incursions into Lombardie: Yet, because they would not seeme quite to abandon the Prouince, they sent a certaine number of Archers and some vessels thither by the Riuer Po. They did afterwards make a league with the Genoueses and those of Luca, for which, generall processions were made in the Citie. They did likewise at the same time procure Bartimeo Coyoni vnderhand to come and serue them.

Christophoro Moro and Viso Iustiniano are sent Ambassadors to Rome.

But whilst this was done, the Popes five Gallies which at the beginning went against the Turkes, about the Spring-time returned to Venice without Lauretano's leaue. Giuanni Dandulo, Antonio Quirini, Andrea, and Nicholas Contareni who were Captaines of them, were by the Senates decree committed to prison: Andrea Contareni and Giuanni Dandulo being found guiltlesse were acquitted, and the rest condemned in a pecuniarie fine and to indure imprisonment for halfe a year, & were declared vnworthie euer after to haue any command at Sea: And against foure others of meaner qualitie who were known to haue been the chiefe motiues of leauing the army, they proceeded more sharply than against the gentlemen; for they were whipt from the market-place to Rialto, and their noses being slit they were for euer bannished the Citie.

The conditions of peace concluded by means of an Hermit.

Within a while after, peace was concluded with Sforza & the Florentines, which, contrarie to the Popes opinion was effected by meanes of Simon Camerles the Hermit, who after fundry iournies concluded it on these conditions: That Sforza should restore to the Venetians whatsoeuer he had taken from them in the last warre (the Townes of the Gyradade excepted) That the Marquis of Mantua should reuint his brother Caro in his State: That the Florentines should receiue from Alphonso whatsoeuer he had taken from them, (Chastillon excepted and the Sienna Territorie belonging to the Florentines): And for the greater confirmation of that peace, the Pope interposed his authoritie, and it was exprefly mentioned, that if henceforward any strife did arise betwixt them, that the Pope should haue ample authoritie to decide and end it, That either of them which should first take Armes against the other, after the wrong knowne should presently be declared an enimie not only to the partie wronged, but to the Pope, and to as many as had bene present at that accord. And in this manner by these conditions of peace, euerie one was satisfied, sauing the Genoueses. For Alphonso would still continue warre against them; which we must suppose to haue bene granted him, because otherwise hee would hardly haue bene drawne to haue consented to the peace which ensued.

The Citie of Venice being tired with so long a warre had neuer a more welcome day than that, when peace was published ouer the Citie with sound of trumpet: They did first appoint praiers to be made in Churches, and generall processions, in which, the relics and images of Saints were carried about with great solemnity, the whole Clergie following them with the Prince and Senate, and all the orders of the Citie. The night following manie torches were lighted, and other signes of ioy were shewed ouer all the Citie. This was in the yeare of our Saluation 1454, and the eighth after the warre was renewed in Lombardie against Philip concerning Cremona, & the fifth against Sforza in the behalfe of their associates the Milanefes. Italie was afterwards a long time quiet, and especially Lombardie, which was very peaceable till such time as it felt the terrible tempest of the Ferrarese war.

Ambassadors sent into Ger-manie to the Emperour.

Zacharia Trensuno and Nicholas Canalis were sent Ambassadors into Germanie to the Emperour Frederick who had written to most parts of Europe, That Commissioners might be sent to him, with whom to consult in open assembly concerning the warre with the Turke. Bartimeo Marcello did in the meane time returne from Constantinople, who in the Republikes name had made peace with Mahomet and freely obtained of him whatsoeuer he craved. *Mahomet*s Ambassadors followed Marcello to Venice to cause that peace to be ratified. But the Senate fearing to do any thing inconsiderately, did delay the businesse a long time, till the league among Christians was contracted, and then, (for they rather witheld the wealth and commoditie of Italie and all Christendome than any good to the Turke) they would haue war and no peace with him. Yet, in the mean space, because they would not seeme to contemne the friendship of so mighty a Prince, they returned the same Marcello together with the Turkes Ambador to Constantinople with new Articles, & commission, that if Mahomet should receiue them, then to conclude peace in the name of the Common-wealth, and that he should remaine there as their Magistrate.

The Venetians
great discretion in doing nothing without good ad-
uise.

But here an occasion may seeme to be offered to condemne and tax the Venetians. It was very well knowne that the Venetians had forsaken the Christians alliance (will some detractor say) in regard they had inioined their Ambassador, that if the Turke should entertaine the offered conditions, then to make peace with him, the which being once sworne to, it would not haue bene lawfull for them (their publike faith saued) to alter. But we must imagine that they did foresee this; for wee finde no certaintie thereof, because that the enterprise against the Turks had been propounded in the Emperours preface two moneths before, so as it is to be supposed, that it was then concluded, whereupon they had time ynough to determine which was the profitable way for their commonwealth, though perhaps some will be of another opinion. But according to all mens saying, the Venetians dealt very discreetly, creetly, as they haue alwaies done, who would not rashly thrust themselves into so dangerous a warre, wherein being entangled by Sea and Land, the other Princes of Europe might in derision haue looked a faire off vpon their losse and ouerthrow, as it hapned within a few yeares after, when the Venetians being enforced to make warre on the Turke, they were not only forsaken of all other Christians, but were betraied in the verie confines of Italie. But we will speake of this in his place.

Let vs now returne to that which happened after the peace in Lombardie, which seemeth to be worthy the noting because that armes being scarce laied downe, a new war had like to haue entangled the Venetians at their doores. The Senate demanded Bagnacuallo a dependant on Rauenna, and some other Townes of the Pollesin, of Borgia D'Este. To this end they sent messengers to him to Ferraro to denounce war according to their custome, vntill he did surrender those Townes which they demanded. But he being a louer of peace, and one that made great account of the Venetians friendship, did by his Ambassadors write to the Prince and Senate, that he desired peace with them and no warre, and that hee would referre himselfe to their discretion: Vpon this honest answere they did presently lay downe their Armes which they had already put on, and attempted nothing against him.

The honest an-swere of the Ferraro.

Then the Venetians hauing changed the warre by Land to that by Sea, did Arme two vessells against Neaupator the Venetian, who hauing receiued some disgrace of his fellow-Citizens, was become a Pirate. The Senate accounted it an heynous matter that any Venetian should in those dayes scoure and robbe the Seas, seeing that their Ancestors from the first foundation of their Citie had rigorously pursued such theues. About the same time Vittore Capello was sent to the Princes of Morea, who foreseeing the great danger which threatened them from the Turkes had sent to the Prince and Senate of Venice, to treat with them about the deliuering vp of their Island into the Venetians hands, provided that they would giue them in recompence as much reuenue in Italie as would suffice for their honorable entertainment according to their present fortune, though not so much as they were wont to haue.

The Genoueses
come into Mo-rea for the same purpose as the Venetians did.

At Capels arriual, the Genoueses had approached the Island in hope to become Masters thereof, their Nauall Armie consisting of tenne Gallies and eightene other shippes of warre. Laurentino likewise was come thither with his Gallies; Each of them did but waite for a fit occasion. The same yeare there were such Terrible tempests ouer all Italie and especially vpon the Venetians Coasts, as wonderfull hurt was done thereby. It is reported that one storme brake as manie glasse windows in Venice, as were thought to be worth seuen thousand Ducats. The Venetians being at peace euer since the taking of Constantinople, there was no Prince nor Common-wealth in all Italie that had warre, but only Pope Calixtus and the Genoueses: who for the losse of Pera (for so soone as Constantinople was taken, those of Pera yeelded) had some attempts vpon the Turkes. Calixtus all the time of his Papacie did not cease both by Letters and messages to stirre vp all Europe to take Armes against those Infidells, and to those endes, himself Armed thirtene Gallies, whereof Lodouico Patriarke of Aquileia was made Generall. This man for three yeares space, did scoure all the Sea Coasts of Asia, doing great harme, and tooke diuers Islands from Mahomet.

This cruell Tyrant in the meane time preuailed so farre in Europe by an admirable course of victorie as he subdued all Thrace, the Tribals, and Macedonia: and in Asia likewise he vtterly subuerted the Empire of Trebisond, howbeit rather by treacherie than force of Armes: Then he tooke the old & new Foglies; and drawing one war from another, he seized on Imbria and Smirna: Then he tooke from the Githelofis of Genoa (against whom he began the war about a child) the Isle of Lesbos which yeilded on conditions: He did afterwards vsurp vpon Bolonia, killing the king there.

thereof: And in a manner, reduced vnder his Empire whatsoeuer the Christian Princes had till then enioied, from Constantinople as farre as Albania and Dalmatia, betwixt Hungarie and the Danubie, and the Ionian and Ægean Seas. But whilst the Infidell made all these conquests, the Venetians attempted nothing, although their aide sundrie times had beene earnestly implored. Morea onely (which at last they tooke from the Princes Thomas & Demetrius) did certaine yeares after Arme against the Turke. We will in the bookes following set downe the originall and successe of that warre. But whilst Othoman executed these exploits the which we thought good briefly to touch, in regard they do in some sort belong to our Historie, the Venetians had no warre.

THE Venetians State for the space of tenne yeeres had peace both by Sea and Land. But this securitie was mixed with feare and care. For the Venetians in this meane time might well be likened to that man, who seeing his neighbors house on fire although his owne be free from it, can not for all that but feare, lest the same flame being disperfed should take holde of his, and runneth forthwith (according to the prouerb) to the Riuer. Euen so the Venetians, though they had no open warre against the Turkes, omitted not carefully to obserue his tenne yeeres actions in Asia and Europe; to ruminate diuers things in their minds; and to premeditate on that warre which they foresaw they should one day be informed to make vpon that barbarous barous Tyrant. Yet in all that time they kept themselves from taking Armes, till some iust occasion should enforce them. But heereof we will speake hereafter. Now wee must set downe that which happened at Venice during that peace. The Venetians limits were mightily extended during Foscari his principalltie. Which came to passe, as well by reason of the publique felicitie and good fortune of the State, as by the long time of his gouernement, which was managed with singular skill and discretion: And not the State alone, but the cities selfe was illustrated with rare and costly buildings. For in his daies, the Porch of the Pallace was on the outside beautified with white Marble. Saint Gregories church, which was begonne to be repayred from the foundations, was finished in costly manner. After all this the Prince, when hee had gouerned the Common-wealth foure and thirtie yeeres, being foure score and tenn yeeres old, and in regard of his age being no longer able to manage the publique affaires, was deposed from the soueraigne Magistracie. And because his fortitude and vigor of spirit was not yet diminished, although his bodie were enfeebled, hee was reduced among the ranke of Gentlemen.

Pascalis Mari Pietro (the other yet liuing) was subrogated in his sted. But Foscari suruiued not long after the creation of the new duke. The honorable Ensignes that had bene taken from him in his life time, were restored to him after his death: For he was buried with Ducal pomp in the Church of the Friars Minors; and by this meanes it came to passe, that one Prince accompanied anothers funeralles, which had neuer hapned till then, since that the custome of associating a Colleague was abolished. His Nephews built him a Tombe of white Marble, richly guilded, neere to the high Altar.

In the time of Mari Pietro that great Earthquake happened, which about the fift day of December, did shake all Italie, especially the Realme of Naples. This Prince was adorned with diuers eminent vertues: Hee had a sound and excellent iudgement, without faining or dissimulation. He was a lover of peace, a friend to Religion, and a seuerer punisher of vice: Hee did execute offenders according to their deserts, or at leastwise banished them from the citie. The peace which hee had receiued from Foscari, as by tradition, which had bene well obserued in all times and places, was by him deliuered entire to his successor.

of Printing may be added, which in those daies was inuented in Italie. The inuention thereof is attributed to a Germane. But this diuine art being by succession of times dispersed ouer all Italie, the chiefe workemen in that misterie did openly contend for the garland of singularity: In which art we finde Nicolaus Janssone of Venice to haue exceeded all the rest. Mari Pietro hauing gouerned foure yeeres and a halfe, departed this life, and his bodie lieth honourably buried in the Church of the Truyns.

Christophero Moro succeeded him. The second yeere of his gouernement, the warre began against Ottoman: We must briefly set downe the cause thereof. The tyrant hauing done much hurt to the Christians of Grecia and other Prouinces of Europe, determined to take Morea. This Prouince is almost like an Island, and is (as they terme it) one of the three rockes of Europe, ioyning to the streight of Corinth. For the Ionian Sea on the one side, and the Aegean on the other, doe in a manner make an entire Island of it. It is in forme like to a leafe of a Plane tree, by reason of the Seas which enuiron it, to wards the North the Ionian, the Sicilian towards the West, the Greeke on the South, the Aegean on the East, and that of Mirtona towards the Solitticall. It is in circuit (according to Isidore) three hundred and threescor thousand paces. Towards the streight on the North sidelieth the Sea of Corinth, at this day called Patras: Iust opposite to that is the Saronic Sea, where in times past the ancient Hauen of Cencrea was, and in the other, that of Leches. This whole country in former times was called Iappigia, afterwards Pelagis, and for a long time Peloponessus, which name by diuers is yet giuen vnto it. It is commonly at this day called Morea.

The description of Morea.

Ottoman hauing mightily enlarged the confines of his Empire was desirous to take this Prouince as a member of the Greek Empire from the brethren Thomas and Demetrius. In regard of the situation therof they might haue defended it a long time, if they had bene assured to haue bene relieved by the Christians in time, or if the brethren with a mutuall consent would haue vndertaken it: But both those meanes were wanting. For Demetrius went to the Turkes side, which was the first and chiefe cause of the ruine of that state. He gaue his daughter in marriage to Ottoman, and gaue him entrance into one of the goodliest Prouinces of Grecia. Thomas made some resistance neere to the streight, but in vaine. And hauing lost all, flying from the rage of that cruell enemy, he went to Rome whither he brought with him S. Andrewes head: in regard whereof, Pope Pius being accompanied with all the Cleargie went to meet him as farre as the Miluian bridge, and appointed a marble Chappell to be built in that place where he had first saluted the Apostles head, and another larger than that in S. Peters Church where the head was afterwards laid vp with great solemnitie.

The Dominion of the Greeks being extinct in Morea, the Venetians still kept those townes there which they had a long time enjoyed. But the violent and perfidious inclination of the enemy would not long let them rest. For after that he had taken 10 Argers by treacherie, he entangled the Venetians in a warre more necessarie than profitable. The Senate being thereby enforced, did presently take armes against him. Vissor Capello was then Admiral of the Sea, who being entreated by the chiefe of the Isle of Lesbos, (at that time when Ottoman tooke it from the Catoloses of Genoa) to come & defend the Island, would not do it as also when the Theodorans sent to him who dwelt in a part of the Island, that he would aide them, and receive them vpon their homage, when the Isle of Mitilene was taken, he refused it, notwithstanding that he had a mightie nauall Armie, fearing least by any inconsiderate attempt, he might precipitate the Repulicke into a manifest danger of warre, although he might iustly haue taken Armes, seeing Ottoman had contrarie to the ancient accord, which 20 the Venetians had made with Anurash his father, and afterwards with himselfe, crossed the streight of Gallipolis with his Armie. This is the report of such as were there present. For there is no Venetian Anuall, nor any other Historian whatsoever which makes mention thereof: Cepio excepted, who in an eloquent stile hath written the notable actions of Pietro Mocenigo. Neuerthelesse it is certaine that so soone as the warre was proclaimed against Mahomet, it began in Morea where the wrong had beene first offered. And whilest they expected greater forces from Italie, certaine foot companies vnder the command of Pietro Palmiero together with two hundred light horse, which the Greeks call Stradiots, entering fiercely into the enemies country, did by a sodaine incursion surprize a small towne betwixt Arcadia and 30 Modon; the Garrison whereof being put to the sword, they brought away a great bootie.

Within a while after, Bertoldo d'Este, Betin of Calcina, Cicco Brancolino, Giovanni Attellano, Roberto Thyente, Giovanni Massano, Leon Ilirico, and diuers other great persons with gallant forces arrived at Modon: From thence the whole Armie went speedily to Naples, where making no long stay, Este, who was Generall of the Armie, went to besiege Argers. This towne among all others of Greece was verie famous, as well for the originall thereof, as for the residence and Court of Kings. It was easily taken, and as soone giuen to the souldiers who spoiled it. The Turks in the citie who were no great number were retired into the Castle. Two daies after the 40 Christians arriual in that place five hundred Turkish horse came and assailed the Christians neere to the Citie, & in the skirmish slew an hundred of our souldiers, and among others Martin of Dalmatia, who held an honourable ranke in the Venetian Armie. Those of the Castle yielded within a while after. The Priest who had deliuered the towne to the Turkes being taken in that place, was put to death. Bertoldo hauing left three hundred Candiot Archers in the Castle, brought backe the troupes to Naples.

VWithin a while after, the Venetian Generall departed from Naples with fiftene thousand men. He went first and encamped at Balilia, the which being taken at this first arriual, he marched the morrow after to the streight through the territorie of 50 Corinth, and fortified his campe neere to the Saronich Sea. Lodouico Lauretano was there with a mightie nauall Armie. They had before placed a Garrison on the the other side of the streight, opposite to that place: Sixe Gallies rode at Anker not farre off. Now (because that the Sea and Land troupes were come thither for that purpose) they presently with great courage began an admirable peece of worke, which in 15 daies was finished. They fortified with a wal & double trech the whole length of the streight, which from the Aegean Sea to the Ionian containeth 4000. paces, though the circuit of the walls makes it appeare greater. It is reported, that in the same place they did for 30000. men on worke; but the great number of men did not so much preuaile for the speedie ending of the worke, as the aptnesse of the matter wherewith it was made, which was readie at hand. The stones of old buildings were scattered heer & there which had bin in times before cut foure-square for the same purpose. With that the wall was easily builded, with Rampiers & trenches on both sides: This Streight was by the Greeks in Xerxes time enclosed with walls: It is certain that many great Princes in diuers ages haue attempted to cut through that streight to make it Nauigable: King Demetrius first, then Cesar the Dictator, next him Calligula, and lastly Domitian Nero, whose enterprizes neuerthelesse were in vaine.

Four thousand Turkes that were encamped neere to the walls of Corinth, did within three daies after their comming thither, attempt to diuert the Venetians from their enterprize; but being repulsed and enforced to retire to their Campe, the night following before that the streight was enclosed with walls, they dislodged without any rumor at all, and went their waie through the places which were yet left open, leauing no Garrison in the whole Island. The Venetians being freed from 20 their encombrances, did at the same time as they were busied in the worke execute some slight attempts. Benedetto Coyani was sent to Misistræ. Some Cosmographers say, That the same Towne is that which was in olde times called Sparta. All the places round about it were taken at the first: the Castle excepted, with the enemy held, at the assault whereof, Coyani the chiefe of the enterprize was slain.

Joan, surnamed the Great, with a troupe of Souldiers hauing assailed the Citie of Londaria, did presently take it, but not the Castle. The Fortification of the streight beeing finished, and manned with a strong Garrison, Bertoldo went with the rest of the troupes to besiege Corinth. This Citie is seated in a place as difficult as com- 30 modious; whereupon, Philip King of Macedon was wont to call it one of the keyes of Greece: It stands almost in the midst of the streight neere to the Mountaine in times past called Ephiro, three score fadij distant from the one and other shore: From the height of the Castle which is called Acrocorynth it looketh vpon two Seas, the Ionian on the one side, and the Aegean on the other. The Venetian assailed it in three sundrie places. Bertoldo encamped toward the West, Giovanni Attellano on the East side, and Lazaro Pontoliano towards the North, neere to the Walls, with certaine foote companies. They gaue two assaults to the Citie, but the first was in some sort most fortunate, because that Attellano tooke a very strong place from the enemy, which did afterwards keep them more strictly shut vp. But whilest they prepared for the second assault, and that Bertoldo was 40 very busie in ordering matters, and approaching the ordnance neere the Walls, he was grievously hurt in the head with a stone which was throwne from the towne, of which hurt within a while after, he died. The Generalls misfortune did not diuert the Souldiers from the determined assault, but they gaue in furiously vpon the enemies Rampiers, & though all the defences wherewith the Souldiers couered themselves the more safely to approach the Walls, were broken, neuerthelesse with great valour they made good the place which they had once taken. But the night follow- ing those of the Citie making a sodaine falliey, as many as remained neere to the 50 Wall were throwne downe head-long from the Castle rocks, where they all died. And because great numbers of Turkes were reported to be neere at hand, they raised the siege and retired into the streight.

(small number) for besides the Sea troupes which kept the vessels, they were far inferior in number to the enemy hauing left the streight without a Garrison, they speedily retired to Naples; whither they were scarce come, but word was brought them that the enemies were arrived. For after that they had recovered and burnt Argers, and made a great massacre of the poore Countrey people, they did the next morning by daie breake without any rumour shew themselves before the Walls of Naples. But before their approach those within the Castle had discovered them from farre. Their arrivall being divulged over the Citie, certaine mercenarie Souldiers would needs make a rash sallie vpon them, who being enuironed with thirre horse, most of them were in a moment slaine before the Citie gates, the rest escaped into the Rampiers. The Turkes seized on a small Rising beneath the Towne, but great numbers of them were there slaine as well by the Archers which continually shot, as by the ordinance which scoured amongst them, wherewith they were not only tormented, but in a manner wholly ouerthrowne.

The Turkes before Naples.

The Turkes before Naples.

The Turkes before Naples.

The Venetians would not looke so faire an occasion, but diuers troupes did with great cries enuiron the Rising, and gaue great terror to the enemies: Others ranne fiercely vpon the troupes of horse which stood close together before the Cities Rampiers, and slew great numbers of them. Diuers that were there present report, That tise thousand Turkes were slain at that time; others lessen the number. They skirmished likewise vpon the Dike of the Citie, and along the rampiers from whence the Barbarian was repulsed with great losse. The enemy being discouraged with these two losses so loone as he perceived that he lost but his labour to lie any longer before Naples, did on a sodaine make incursions vpon the Territorie of Modon, where at his first arrivall hee tooke Molines, and certaine other small Townes by force. This storme spread it selfe likewise vpon the Territorie of Coron, where the Greekes were wonderfully molested. The Turkes being desirous to depart from Morea, they did for three daies space besiege the Towne of Zonchia. Giovanni Crasso of Coma lay in Garrison there and did brauely defend it: wherupon the enemies dislodged, and went to their wintering places. After their departure the Venetian Captaine would needs haue their reuenge, and went with three thousand men to scour Arcadia, from whence they carried awaie a great bootie. They did besides make an attempt to force the Towne which at this day beareth the name of the Prouince, but not being able to doe it, they sacked the suburbs and went their way.

The cause of the war betweene the Thryestines and those of Cap-Histria.

This happened in Morea during the summer and harvest season. The Venetians likewise in the meane time had some troubles in Italie, about a contention betweene the Thryestines & those of Cap-Histria, by reason of tributes and high-waies; the strife on both sides grew so hot, as although the Senate were busied in a greater warre, they were neuertheless constrained to send forces thither. But for the easier vnderstanding of the matter, we must fetch it a little farther off. The Alman marchants were wont to come directly to Cap-Histria & other townes of the Prouince to trade, not comming neere to Thryeste by five miles. The Thryestines perceiving that them selues had no profit at all by this commerce were greatly vexed. Wherupon they sent an Ambassador to the Emperor Frederick whose subjects they were, to craue that it might be lawfull for them to enforce all Germane marchants which came into Histria to passe by Thryeste, supposing thereby that their citie would become the chief Mart of all Histria. And because the Emperor had not flatly graunted nor denied their request, they fought by faire and courteous meanes to diuert the Marchants from their vsual way and trade, but if gentle meanes would not serue, they resolved to vse force, and to proceed by constraint. Those of Cap-Histria taking the matter in bad part, did speedily dispatch Messengers to the Prince and Senate, who complaining of the wrongs done to them by the Thryestines, did vnfold the great discommodities which all Histria was like to receive by that new insolencie of their neighbours. The Senate being moued with these complaints plants, commaunded that certaine armed vessels should lie at anker neere to the moare of Thryeste, and should haue a speciall care not to suffer any victuals to enter into the city by Sea. The Thryestines seeming to make small account thereof, and constantly dissembling their grieft, it was resolved; the better to bring them to reason, to put garrisons for the same purpose in the fittest places by land. Gaurardo Iustinopolitano was sent thither with some horse, who hauing borrowed a certaine place of Count Gorician, and streightly shut in their confines, should aduise the Marchants to keepe their ancient way: And if the Thryestines should attempt by force (as they had done) to hinder their iournies then by Armes to repulse them.

Gaurardo Iustinopolitano is sent against the Thryestines.

By chance, one of those souldiers that were appointed to conuay the marchants, was slaine by a sodaine incursion of the Thryestines, and the rest put to rout; Gaurardo not digesting this iniurie, went with a braue troupe of Histrians, and wasted the Thryestines territories on the other side of the Sea. The Senate, in regard this tended to an open warre, commaunded those of Cap-Histria to send three of their Townesmen to Venice that might instruct them more amply in the matter. The Senate by these mens report perceiving that the strife could not bee ended but by armes, warre was on a sodaine concluded against the Thryestines: And according to this Decree, Antonio Martiano, Bernardino sonne to Carolo Montone, a young man, Girardo Martinenga, Antonello Cornetano and diuers other Noble men were sent into Histria with foure thousand horse, and gallant companies of foote. Diuers that were present in that action say, that the armie consisted of tenne thousand men; others say the number was not so great. With these forces, such as they were, it was resolved to besiege Thryeste. The Venetians encamped in three several places. The first was at S. Francis Gate on a little rising. The second towards that part of the citie, which is opposit to the high way of Pucina: And the third not farre from thence on a high place vpon the way of Chersina. The inhabitants were first assailed with the ordinance which did beate downe the toppes of the houses; wherupon they craued truce for three dayes to consult about the yielding vpon of the towne. Vitalis Lande Prouiditor in the Armie did freely graunt it, for he had determined to plant ordinance against S. Francis Gate, the which during that space he hoped to doe without impediment, because there was some likelihood that he could not otherwise doe it without fight. But so loone as the enemies perceived the ordinance to be removed, doubting the matter, they did presently breake the truce, and shot at the peasants that wrought in the worke.

Thryeste is besieged.

News in the meane time was brought to the Campe, that a companie of German horse was comming to the reliefe of the towne. The Prouidator sent Gaurardo Iustinopolitano before with a braue troupe of light horse, to surprize them by ambuscado.

Antonio Martiano comes Prouidator to the Armie.

On these termes stood the affaires before Thryeste, when Giacomo Antonio Martiano came as Prouidator to the Armie. This man before then had bene Gouverneur of Vidina. He at his arrivall hauing altered the forme of warre, the enemies Caualerie without any let entred the Citie, and giuing in on a sodaine vpon the camp toward the high way of Chersina, tooke two hundred horse from the Venetians, and did not onely afterwards defend the citie; but as long as the siege lasted, did greatly molest the Venetians by their continual sallies and incursions. And because that by frequent shot of the ordinance, part of the wall had bene beaten downe, and that the souldiers in an other place craued to be sent to their wintering Garrisons, they resolved to giue a generall assault to the citie. But the businesse had no great good successe. For an houres space they fought valiantly on both sides, some with ladders mounting the walls, but the hottest fight was at the breach. The citie was brauely defended by the valour of the Alman and the townesmen; and the souldiers were enforced to retire with bad successe.

The Almanes make sallies vpon the venetians.

The assault giuen to Thryeste hath no good successe.

The siege continued all Autumne, and would haue lasted till the enemy had bene been subdued by famine or force: But Pope Pius, who besides his ancient friendship and alliance with Fredericke, was much unwilling to haue the Thryetines receive any harme, in regard hee had bene their Bishop, had from the beginning of the siege solicited the Venetians to abstaine from pursuing them, and euer after had not ceased to intreate and exhort them, to draw their troupes vpon certain conditions from their Gates. It was concluded betwixt the Pope and the Venetians, That the Pope should cease from making warre on Sigismund Malatesta whom he belieged in Arimini after that he had vanquished him in fight by Frederico of Vrbin, and had taken from him the greatest part of his State; and the Venetians did raise their Campe from before Thryeste: and so by this accord those of Arimini, and the Thryetines, were wholly freed from the warre about the thirteenth day of Nouembet.

Thryeste and Arimini are freed from the siege.

Sigismund having obtained the Popes pardon, for that in the warres of Lombardie hee had molested and waited the Country of Flaminia, on promise euer afterwards to be obedient to him, and to the Venetians, went the Summer following into Morea against the Turkes.

Lauretanus nauall Armie at such time as the land troupes abandoned the streight, and after it went forth of the Sarronic Gulph, and had inuironed all the Islands, receiued of Cominius the Pirate the Isle of Lemnos in Morea. He with two Gallies had taken it from Mahomet, who had made it his owne, by reason of the Empire as to whereon it depended, and after that hee had held it for a time, distrusting (as it is to be supposed) his owne forces, he did deliuer it into the Venetians hands.

The Isle of Lemnos delivered to the Venetians.

The nauall Armie wintered in the confines of Modon, Zonchia, Naples, and Coron. Vrso Iustiniano did at the Spring time succede Lauretanus in the place of General. He departed from Venice about the beginning of Ianuary, but in regard of the extreme cold he arriued in the Prouince three moneths after with three gallies. At Zonchia he receiued one and twenty Gallies that lay in the Hauen; with those, and them which he brought with him, he sailed towards Modon, where halfe way he met Lauretanus with three great Gallies, who after sundrie reciprocal embraces did according to the Senates commaund surrender the charge of the Gallies to him, and retired himselfe to Sapienza.

Vrso stayed at Modon till the whole Armie were come thither together, then departing thence with two and thirtie Gallies, he sailed towards Corón, and within a while after, passing by Naples, he came in a short space to Nigrepont, and from thence, hauing coaled all the Islands of the Ægean Sea, he had heedfully obserued what state they were in: But whilst Vrso made these reuiues, Nicolas Ragio, and Iohn furnished the farte, Captaines of the bands of men at Armes; with those troupes that they had with them, tooke certaine small townes from the enemy vpon the Gulph of Patras. Francisco Sidicino, Cicco Brandolino, with diuers other Venetian Captaines were encamped with three thousand men at Mantinea, and the enemies at Pithyma, five hundred of whose horse being come to Tulmutha (which was a towne betwixt both Armies) came to defie the Venetians, who concerning the small number of the Barbarians went forward presently to assaile them, who a long time stood firme against the formost ranks of the Venetians, vntill that the rest of their Caualerie whom they had sent for by sundrie messengers did arriue. For then by their coming, those which beganne the fight being slaine, they which were left aliue, were without armour, Captaines and ensignes; miserably massacred heere and there. It is reported that fiftene hundred Christians lay dead vpon the place, among whom were Brandolino and Giuanni Attellano, who the day before was come from Modon to Mantinea with Andrea Dandolo the Prouidator, Giuanni Massano, and diuers other noble men, who had commaund in the Venetians Armie. The Republic had no better successe nere to the Islands. For Vrso hauing viewed them, went to Lemnos, and from thence returned to Nigrepont, where within a while after hauing receiued supplies from thence, and hauing fortie tie Gallies in his companie, he sailed fiercely against the Isle of Lesbos. From Nigrepont he came directly to Lemnos, & hauing by the way taken a ship of the enemies he did put tenne Turkiih Marchants to death that were in it, and hung vp the rest.

Vrso Iustiniano saileth against the Isle of Lesbos

Then about midnight departing from Lemnos, he went with great rumour about the third houre in the morning, and encompassed Mytelene, the chiefe Citie of the whole Island. It hath two hauens on the North side, and one towards the South: The Armie entered into this as being further off. Those of the countrey betooke themselves to flight, and the whole Island was in allarme. Then three hundred Turkes that were brought to the Gallies, were by *Vrso*s command, impaled, throwne into the Sea, and some of them hanged. Within a while after, he did by day-breake giue an assault to the Citie by Sea and Land, hauing first sent a ship of Genoa, which to that end he had stayed by the way, and a Dalmatian Galley, to take the tower vpon the hauen: And himselfe in the meane time landed his troupes on the other side of the Citie. The two vessels being sent against the tower, did presently retire by reason of the Ordnance shot. The troupes being landed, went brauely to the assault, throwing themselves inconsiderately to manifest danger; whereupon the fight lasted with wonderfull furie for sixe houres space to the losse and ruine of the Venetians, who being vanquished by the multitude of shot, and grievously wounded, after a great ouerthrow were enforced to retire. It is reported that three thousand of them were slaine that day.

The Venetians do giue two assaile to Mytelene

This losse did not abate the Venetians courage, for within a while after, returning againe to assault the enemy with greater furie, they were after sundrie vnprofitable attempts beaten from the wall with like losse as at the first. In the meane timenewes was brought, that the enemies nauall Armie did approach, the which besides, other smaller vessels: consisted of five and fortie Gallies. It was likewise reported that two thousand horse, landed on the other side of the Island, would presently arriue. Vrso being daunted with these newes, after that hee had lost five thousand men, and the rest for the most part hurt, quitted Mytelene, and came to Nigrepont, where with remorse of conscience for such bad success, he fell into so great sorrow and melancholy, as notwithstanding that he was a man of a great spirit, did neuertheless behaue himselfe like one that had lost his senses. From Nigrepont being brought to Morea, and from thence to Modon, he was landed by his owne seruants, where on a sodaine being oppressed with griefe, he died within halfe an houres space. Such was the end of Vrso Iustiniano, a man valiant and noble among his countrimen.

Giacomo Lauretanus was after his death sent to command the Armie. He departing from Venice, was followed by Sigismund Malatesta accompanied by a thousand Italians. A long time before, Pope Pius had made a league with the Venetians, the king of Hungarie, and Philip Duke of Burgondie against the Turkes. But Malatesta so loone as he came into the Prouince where he heard of the death of Giuanni Attellano, and Brandolino, and saw the small forces there, made a lowde protestation, that he would neuer haue imbarcked himselfe for that warre, if he had but knowne in what state the affaires of that Countrey had bene: yet, because men should not say that his comming thither was in vaine, he marched with all the troupes he could leaue to take Sparta (a Citie in old time most famous among the chiefe Cities of Greece) the which in a short space he forced. It being taken which at this day is in a manner inhabitable, he began to batter the Castle with his Ordnance. That siege continued many moneths, and it could not be taken by reason of the strong Garrison within it.

Malatesta besiegeth Sparta.

About the latter end of Autumne, fiftene thousand Turkes arriued there, who encamped verie nere to the Venetians. Sigismund distrusting his owne small number (for he had but two thousand men in his camp) durst not assaile them with his whole forces at once, but skirmished oftentimes with them: And so long as the enemy remained there, he did by cunning and force so amaze him, as the Turks hauing put some supplies into the Cattle, dislodged without any losse to the Christians: And perceiuing his encamping there to be but to small purpose, after that he had burnt the Citie, he brought backe his troupes to Naples. During the siege of Sparta, Laurentino besieged Rhodes, and did great harme to the inhabitants, he spoiled and burnt their farmes and countrey-houses. He did afflict them in this manner, because that the Rhodians not long before had by force taken forth of the Venetians ships which lay in the haueen certain Syrian marchants with their goods, and would in no sort giue satisfaction to the Venetians that carried it: This being done, he returned to Nigrepont. From whence he craued all the Islands on the Aegean Sea, without any other memorable exploit for that yeare.

But at the beginning of the next, he did put to Sea and came verie neere to the streight, meaning by force of Oares to passe through betwixt the Dardans, that hee might afterwards scoure the coast of Galipolis. The Lardanes are two Castles iust opposite to one another at the mouth of the streight, in which was great store of Ordnance to sinke all enemies ships that should passe that way. Mahomet so soone as he had made himselfe master of the Constantinopolitane Empire, caused one of these to be redified which was in a manner ruinate, and builded the other from the foundations, that he might with a continuall Garrison keepe those of Europe from entering into the streight.

The fleet being come thither (as hath beene said) Venieri his Gallie which according to the manner went before for discouerie, being deceiued by the Admirals signall, which as he thought willed him to passe through the streight, being driuen forward by the winde and Oares, went through notwithstanding all the shot. Some say that Venieri craued leave to be the first to attempt that passage, and that the enemie would not spend all his shot vpon this one Galley, but determined to bestow his bullets vpon the rest of the fleet: that would attempt to passe, whereupon, the next that followed it, being struck through with the Ordnance, and many of her men slaine, and in great danger, returned: the like did the rest of the fleet, except the first Galley that went through: Venieri, who although he was Prouditor of the Gulph, did neuertheless follow the publike ensignes vnder the command of Laurentino being a man of singular iudgement and experience in marine matters, did comfort his souldiers, and willed them to hope well: but in the darknesse of the night, he returned towards the enemies, sailing faire & softly without vse of Oares. Diuers canon shot were made at him, and to speake truly, he did not auoid them all, yet at last, with the losse of some few of his men, he did contrarie to all mens hope returne to the fleet.

This same Summer Pope Pius determined to set on foot the voyage against the Turkes which had beene propounded in the Councell at Mantua, and was afterwards neglected by the ambition and auarice of some Princes. For although all his associates should haue failed him (the Venetians excepted) he neuertheless resolving to bring it to passe, came to Ancona. Vpon the rumour of this holy voyage, great numbers of people from Lombardie, and both the Germaines were come to Rome before his departure thence. But as he passed through the Dutchie of Spoleta and La Marca, he met with greater multitudes. These men with plenarie remission of their finnes, he sent home againe into their countreies, because they were come as well without meanes to defray the expences of that iourney, as for that most of them were men vnfit for warre. Christophero Moro, the Venetian Prince, came to meet him there with ten well-armed Gallies, to the end the Venetians might haue a share in the honour of that warre. Two daies after his arrivall the Pope died of a lingring feauer. To speake truly, he had but small store of money for such an enterprize, which by a decree of the Colledge of Cardinals was giuen to Prince Moro, on condition that he should send it to Mathias king of Hungarie towards the expences of his ordinarie warre with the Turkes.

Some thinke that the whole summe amounted but to fiew and fortie thousand Ducats.

Ducats. But the Venetian did not onely send this summe into Hungarie to king Mathias, but a greater quantitie of gold for many yeares after, that he might with his forces stop the incursions of those Barbarians into Dalmatia and Hiltria. After Pope Pius death, the Venetians alone did for a long time vndergo the burthen of so great a warre, in the view not only of all Italie, but of all the Princes of Europe, who were not ashamed to be idle spectators, whilest the cruell enemie had already ouerthrowne two mightie Empires, and many kingdomes: and yet it cannot be denied but thacking Ferdinand and the Pope did at times send aide by Sea, but it was seldom; and then, when as they had no need of it. There was no memorable matter either by Sea or Land done during that Winter in Grecia. The next Summer, the pestilence being dispersed in Naples, Sigismund went into Laconia, against whome came ten thousand Turkes, but vpon their arrivall, he with his souldiers retired to Mantinea. After his departure the enemies assailed Pithimia, and hauing beaten downe the fortifications, entered it by force. In the meane time Victor Capello succeeded Laurentino, who hauing receiued the flee at Sapienza, failed to Modon, from thence departing within a while after with fiew and twentie Gallies, he went to Nigrepont, and afterwards, going into the enemies countrey, he tooke Aulida by force, which stands in the firme land ouer against Nigrepont, with Larfa on the Salonicke Sea. Then he took Imbra in the Aegean Sea betwixt Thrace and Samothrace neere to the mount Athis. At the last, coming to Pirea, he besieged the Citie of Athens, the noblest of all Greece, and hauing made a breach there before day, and burnt the Citie gates, he entered it. It is at this day called Serbina. Capel sackt the Citie, the bootie whereof was so great, as it did enrich the Marriners and Rowers.

Within a while after, the Fleet left Pirea, and came to Nigrepont, where taking in victuals, it went to Modon, from whence departing in secret, it failed into the Gulph of Corinth. Those of Patras had promised him to deliuer the citie into his hands, and to kill all the garrison. Capel had three and twentie Gallies, and six and thirty other lesser vessells well armed for the fight; and besides the souldiers and mariners, Nicolas Ragio was there with two hundred men at armes. The souldiers, who the day before had beene grievously tossed in a tempest, and by reason thereof could not hold vp their heads, were presently conducted to the citie by Giacomo Barbado the Prouditor, they were in number foure thousand: And beeing come to certaine Farmes within a mile of the citie, the souldiers being desirous of bootie, did without any commaundement fall to pillaging those countrey houses. Whilest these were busied in spoyling, and expected nothing lesse than the enemies arrivall, three hundred Turkish horse did with great cries inuirow and assaile them, who were all slaine there, hauing no meanes of defence or escape. Barbado riding vpon a Mule, and coming by chance to that place where the enemies made great slaughter, was beaten downe among a number of thicke bushes, and there trodden to death vnder the horses feet. His body being afterwards knowne by his Coate-armour and Signet was carried to the Castle of Patras, and impaled vpon the highest tower thereof: and of so great a number, one thousand onely escaped. Ragio being taken by the enemies, was impaled alieue.

Capel for all this was not discouraged, supposing it to haue happened, rather by the carelesse of his owne souldiers, than by the enemies valour and prowesse. Therefore eight daies after, he sent the brauest men of his troupes together with the Ensignes to assaile the Citie. Vincimanica the Sicillian, who commaunded the nauall Armie as Vice-admirall, with Dominicke the Blacke, and other valiant men that followed the Ensignes, went and displayed them before the citie. The enemies did not refuse the fight, but making a furious fallie, came courageously vpon the Christians. There was a cruell fight for some houres space, at the last, fortune inclining to neither side, the Venetian resolved to send threecore horse of the remainder of those which were Ragios, downe the hill which was on the one side, to charge the enimie in flanke, and thereby to make him retire, and abandon his standing: but they were not gone farre ere they discovered the Turkes comming forward for the same purpose; at the sight of whom, Ragios horse betooke themselves to flight, and fell in among the troupes of the Islanders. There a great slaughter of men, and horses, was presently made. The Turkes in the meane time arrived who did cut the disordered squadrons in peeces. And this losse would haue proved farre greater than the former, had not a great duft risen vp into the aire like to a black cloud which tooke away the sight both of Turkes and Christians. A thousand Christians lay dead vpon the place, and the rest with the ensignes escaped to the vessels.

Capello being daunted with these two overthrowes, went to Xant, from thence to Modon, and within a while after to Nigrepont where he remained fixe whole moneths without any memorable exploit. After the overthrow at Patras, he was neuer seene to smile, though Gionanni Diedo the States Secretarie with diuers others of his familiar friends told him that it happened not through his default. At the last being wasted with griefe and melancholie, eight moneths after the battaile of Patras, he died at Nigrepont. Giacomo Venieri after his death commanded the Armie vntill that Giacomo Lauritano sent by the Senate to succeed the late Capello, arrived in the Province.

Capello died

This man for the space of fixteene moneths that he was Generall of the Armie, did brauely defend all the Islands and Sea-coasts from the enemies assaults and incursions.

About the same time likewise, or soone after, or rather a little before Laurentians departure to the Armie, although the Venetians were in some sort quiet in Italie, the cause neuertheless is not knowne why Bartholomeo of Bergamo a great Captaine in his time, did by his sodaine incursions into Romagnia, in a manner trouble and entangle them in a new warre. This man departed from Lombardie with great troupes of horse and foot at the pursuit of Angelo Accaiuola, and Nicolas Soderino that were banished from Florence, vpon hope that they gaue him of good successe in Tuscanie by means of a popular commotion: this was the common rumour. But others supposed that he departed in Armes from Lombardie at the soliciting of Pope Paul, to the end, that bringing his troupes through Romagnia and La Marca, he might on a sodaine in his name make warre on king Ferdinand, who refused to pay vsuall tribute to the Church of Rome. But whatsoeuer the cause was, it is certaine that al his attempts which seemed at the first to be fearefull to all Italie, did soone decieve euerie mans expectation. For so soone as he came into Romagnia Galeas Maria Duke of Milan, a braue and couragious young Prince, made head against him: Then did the forces of king Ferdinand and the Florentines withstand him, wherewith this great Captaine being troubled, did in some sort begin to decline. A battaile was presently giuen at Molinella, a towne on the confines of Bologna, which was fought in the absence of Galeas vnder the conduct of Frederike of Vibin. Those that were at the battaile affirme that in memory of man there was neuer a more furious or mortall in Italy.

The Senate fearing if his forces should be broken (for till then he had euer beene in the Venetians pay, and therefore it was thought that the Venetians did fauour him) the aduerser Princes and Commonwealthes being armed, would cast the whole burthen of the warre vpon them, sent him some supplies of horse and foote, with expresse charge to make peace, and safely to bring backe the Armie into Lombardy. Ieronimo Barbado, a man of excellent wisdom and aduise, and who not long before was made Procurator of S. Marke, was in the Armie; yet this new dignitie, nor the entreaties of his friends were of power to keepe him at home, nor to stay him from assisting the Republike in so great a danger. But his authoritie and wisdom being greatly feared of the enemies, it fell out that before peace was concluded, he was by their means, (for so it was thought) poisoned. There is no other mention made made of Laurentians exploits at Sea, besides that which hath already beene said.

Nicolas Canalis succeeded him: He departing from Venice with two Gallies arrived at Nigrepont, from whence setting faile with twentie Gallies, hee spoiled certaine farme houses, and villages in Theffalie; and then returned to Nigrepont; and from thence went to Modon, and afterwards to Coron. He resolved to seize vpon the citie of Lagostitia on the Sea of Patras, which the Turkes had forsaken, and speedily to fortifie it, the which he easily performed without any resistance. Ieronimo Nouello (for Malatesta had left Morea) had well fortified it; and there the whole Armie remained, consisting of six thousand men, at such time as two thousand Turkes made an attempt to recover it: but they being beaten from the rampires with great losse did within a while after dislodge.

Nauall Armie.

Canalis hauing left Giacomo Venieri with six Gallies for the guard of the citie, returned with the rest of the fleet to Nigrepont; and hauing there re-enforced the fleet with fresh supplies he failed to Lemnos, and thence to Imbres, where he determined to assault Oenos; and comming by day-broke to assault the citie he commanded his souldiers to reare ladders against the walls, which being done, they mounted them, and hauing broken open the Gates, they gaue entrance to the rest of the Armie. The towne was spoiled, and for the most part burnt, many were slaine, but more were made slaues, men and women that were taken prisoners were villanously handled, the Sacred places were polluted and prophaned without any respect to the name of Christians; for although they obeyed the cruell Turkes, they had not changed their Christian Religion; besides all these outrages, Nunnies were rauished and deflowered, whom the barbarous enimie for recurrenco Religion neuer durst touch. Diuers haue thought that for the punishment of this sinne, the taking of Nigrepont ensued, together with the Generalls banishment. A great bootie was brought to Nigrepont, with two thousand captiues. Within a while after he took and spoiled the new Foglies. But at the Spring time the Turkes with a mighty Nauall Army surprized the citie Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos, and after they had spoiled it, and carried away the Inhabitants, they made it desolate. Canalis vpon report hereof, being come to Lemnos with foure Gallies, so soone as he perceived all places to be ruined (for the enimie was already gone from thence) returned to Nigrepont. There he found six Gallies of new supplies, which were come from Venice. With these and the rest, he went to Modon, whither sending for all his Gallies that had wintered in sundrie places, hee made a fleet of fiftie and thirtie Gallies, and presuming on his forces he returned to Nigrepont, determining to aduance forwards against the enimie. But whilst he was busied in preparing his fleet, those in Albania fought with good successe against the Turkes. Alexis, and Nicholas brethren, straued for the principallitie there; who followed seuerall parties. Nicholas being aided by the Venetians, had 1200

souldiers, which were commanded by Iosepho Barbaro as Prouiditor. Alexis had assembled a thousand Turkish horse. He comming in haste with his cauerlie encamped in the valley of the Blacke Hill, vpon the Riuer Drimon, where the next day he drew his brother to battell, by whom being vanquished, all his horsemen were slaine, except two hundred that fled. Canalis was still at Nigrepont, when news was brought him thither, that the Turkes had about an hundred Gallies nere to Tenedos, and that their fleet did daily increase by new supplies. Being moued with this report, hee departed from Nigrepont, and went to Lemnos; and from thence to Imbres, where at his arriual hee vnderstoode by the Islanders, that the Turkish fleet lay vpon the other side of the Island, and they being not able to tell him in Latine the number of their vessels, did by plucking the haire from their heads demonstrate vnto him, that it was very great.

The Turkish
fleet at Tenedos.

The Venetians gaue no great credit to this aduertisement, nor did he altogether reiect it. Matters seemed more terrible by the Islanders report, than they were discerned them to be. Now because he would be thoroughly satisfied, he commanded

Lorenzo

Lorenzo Laureano to goe with tenne of the best Gallies in the fleet, to discover the enemy, and if hee should perceive that hee had but three score Gallies, to turne his prowes towards him, and hee forthwith would come to his rescue with the rest of the fleet; if they were more, then to put to Sea, and to avoid the fight.

Laureano sent Francisco Quirini with one Gallie, to descrye the enemies number, who should as farre make it knowne to him by his ordnance shot. Their number being knowne by Quirini his signall, the Venetian fleet speedily returned, and put to Sea-ward. The Gallies that were sent abroad for discovery, so soone as they saw the Turkish fleet, beganne to flie with saile and oares: for so soone as the enemies had from farre descryed the Venetian Auioses, and the rest of the fleet that came after, they presently sent tenne Gallies forth of the Haven, who gaue chase to the Venetian fleet till late in the evening. Cavalis with foure Gallies went into the Haven of Paleocastro. The Turkes hauing by the darkenesse of the night lost sight of the Venetians directed their course to the Isle of Scyros.

The morrow after, the Venetian Gallies being all together, failed in close battallion towards the Isle of Scyros. The enemy was on the other side of the Island, and fiercely battered the citie. Against him thus busied in the siege the Venetian sent tenne Gallies which durst not goe neere to fight, but by their Ordinance shot, did from farre attempt to offend them. The Venetian would not assaile them, fearing lest the rest of the enemies fleet should come and inuelt his Gallies, the which without all doubt would haue bene done, if hee had offered to fight. The enemies failed from Scyros into the Isle of Nigrepont, where at their arriual they tooke Stora by force, a Towne in the Island seated towards the West, and afterwards, that of Basilica: both which were burnt and spoyled. This being done, they went directly to besiege Nigrepont. The Venetian was come from Scyros to Cape Martillo. This place is neere to Nigrepont, and from thence before hee had possessed all the passages, hee sent three Gallies laden with victuals, through the channell of Loretto to Nigrepont, and commanded the Captaines of them to carrie there for the guard of the Citie, if the officers of the Towne should thinke it expedient. The victuals being receiued, the Gallies were returned to the fleet.

Not long after Giovanni Troni was commanded to go thither with two Gallies. But all passages neere to the Citie being already stopt, and his owne Gallie being bruiued with the shot of the enemies canon, he was inforced to returne.

Now the better to vnderstand the State of the siege, wee will make a briefe description here of the Situation of the Island. The Isle of Nigrepont being diuided from Boetia, is an hundred and fiftie thousand paces in length, the breadth thereof is not aboue fortie thousand, and the narrowest not aboue twentie thousand. It is in circuite three hundred three score and fise thousand paces. There are two little hills in it, the one termed Gerafa, and the other Capharia. It was in ancient time enriched with very goodly cities; at this day there is in it but Nigrepont. The citie of Nigrepont which is seated right ouer-against Aulida, is diuided from Boetia by a small Gulph: Wherefore the Turke the better to besiege it, made a bridge-ouer that Gulph, so soone as the land forces were wholly arriued.

On the fifth of Iune the enemies fleet, wherein were three hundred yessells, and amongst others aboue an hundred Gallies, approached the citie; but by the valour of the Inhabitants and the souldiers which were in it, the enemies that then landed were beaten backe to their ships. The 13. of the said month, the Emperour Ottoman being come with three score thousand souldiers through Boetia, caused a bridge to be made ouer the channell, as farre as Saint Marks Church, within a mile of the Citie. In that place all the forces being landed, the Citie was inuironed, and deuers peeces of Ordinance were planted in sundry places: and with fise and fiftie canons euerie day the wall was much battered. The siege continued 30. dayes, in which time, besides sundry light skirmishes made before the walls, vpon occasions, the Turke, with all his forces, gaue three assaults, wherein he lost fise and twenty thousand thousand men, as it was afterwards knowne at the muster of the Armie. Some report that they haue heard the Turkes say, that after the taking of Nigrepont, more than fortie thousand were found to be wanting in their Armie.

But during this siege by Sea and Land, the Venetian Fleet wanting victuals by continuing too neere Nigrepont, failed to Candie, where by the way meeting with some Turkish Fults, it flankethem, and tarried there foure daies. Jerónimo Molino Gouvernor of the Island, did presently take order to furnish them with necessarie victuals, and did besides in that short space cause seuen ships of burthen to be armed. Being strengthened with these armed vessells, and with his owne fleet of 35 armed Gallies, the Venetian returned from whence he came. The newes in the meane time of the liege of Nigrepont being brought to the Senate, did afflict them with griefe and feare. It was certaine that without some speedie remedie, that most excellent Island of all others of the Aegean Sea would be subdued by that cruell enemy, to the great losse of the Common-wealth: whereupon they speedily decreed to send as manie Gallies as could possibly be made readie one after an other without intermission, to the reliefe of Nigrepont. Cavalis in the meane time, departing from the place where he ankored, went with his whole fleet & lay in the streight of the channell neere to Laureta: then with sailes, oares, winde and tide, he went forwards against the enemy.

Those within the Citie being tired with continuall fight, had already endured the siege almost a moneth; and yet they durst not well truit some of their owne Citizens. For Thomas of Sclauonia that was sent with a troupe of Souldiers to guard the citie, being convicted of treason, and sent for before the Magistrates, was by commandement cut in peeces. Some say that hee did by secret intelligence sollicit the Turke to undertake that enterprize: and that at the beginning he would haue deliuered the Citie to Ottoman, if he would haue but graunted him and the townsmen their liues & liberties. Ottoman promised the traitor any thing sauing that which he demanded, and he would haue none other recompence but that. Now whilst these practizes continued on either side as well by those which fled to the enemies, as by letters tied to arrowes, the whole matter was discovered to the Magistrate by a yong maide of Nigrepont.

The besieged being afflicted with so many miseries, had in their extremitie but only one hope left, which was, that the Venetian Nauall Armie, hauing first broken the bridge ouer the channell, would come and bring them aide and assistance. This did they talke of day and night, and wilhed for it with teares in their eies, when on a sodaine they descryed fouretee Gallies and two ships of burthen, within view of the Citie, with which Cavalis was come before the rest of the Fleet: There was then great ioy in the Citie, and the townsmen from the walls beganne to crie out vpon the enemies thereby to terrifie them. This Generall noyle did altogether amaze them.

Some say that Ottoman hauing intelligence of the Venetians approach, began to thinke on flight, and to that end he mounted a very swift horse, determining presently to passe forth of the Island into the firme Land, and that without all doubt he would haue gon his way, had not Mahomet the Gouvernour of Asia, a valliant and courageous man, dissuaded him from it, telling him, That if he fled, the Souldiers and his Nauie being affrighted with the departure of their Generall, would at one time together fall into great danger: And therefore that he should do better, to giue a generall assault to the Citie by Land and Sea, more fierce than all the former, and promise the spoile thereof to the Souldiers, with a great recompence to him that should first aduance his Ensignes on the Walls. The great Turke being moued with this good counsell commanded his Souldiers to giue the last assault: His Gallies at Sun-set came forth of the channell neere to the Walls.

The Venetians that were come forward with the Generall (as hath bene said) went with full saile within a mile of the bridge. Then, because the winde, tide, and necessity did invite them to set forward against the enemy with as great courage as they were come thither, all men cried out that a fit time and occasion was offered to do a notable peece of service. Canalis alone was of opinion to tarry for the rest of the Fleet, which staid at Politia; no man knoweth whether they did it for feare, or else because the Captaines of the Gallies were commanded so to do; howbeit Canalis did condemn their slownesse: Those which were there did earnestly sollicite him to set forward, laying aloud that there was no good meaning in that delay. The Picemenes of Candie, brethren, Captaines of a ship of Burthen, craved leave that they with their ship might Saile against the enemy, promising, by the force of their ship, and by the winde and tide to breake the bridge, and if their enterprize should succede badly, they would at least thinke themselves happy to haue exposed their liues and fortunes in the service of the Common-wealth. The Generall commanded them and all the rest not to stir, but to tarry still where they were, till the rest of the Fleete were arrived.

given to the city.

Those of Nigrepont who in the meane time were furiously assaulted by Sea and Land, perceiving by day-broke that their Fleete Lay still, like men amazed could hardly hold their weapons in their hands. Great numbers of Arrows couered the wretched inhabitants: The ordinance confusedly beat downe whatsoever it encountered, steeples, towers, walls, and people. Leonardo Caluo Gouvernour of the Citie, Giovanni Bondemaria the Prouidator, Paulo Hericio the Magistrate, and manie 20 other Venetian Gentlemen were vpon the Walls and in the trenches, some to exhort and encourage the Souldiers, others to run vp and down to those places which had most neede of help. And although many thousand enemies were nere to the wals, they did not cease for all that still to fix their eyes on that side from whence they had defied the Venetian Gallies: The wretched inhabitants held vp their hands and ciesto Heauen and them. Then by day-broke they erected a black Ensigne vpon the highest tower of the citie to demonstrate their miserable condition, to the end that those which lay in the channel being moued with their disaster might come and relieue them. The fierce assault continuing without intermission, had in such sort tired the beleaged as those which guarded the gate Burchiana being gricuously wounded 30 and weakened with hunger and watching, did quit the walls to the enemies, which they on a sodain seizing on, all other parts of the wals were in an instant abandoned.

The Turkes take the Nigrepont.

Then they began in euerie place to murder the poore inhabitants, together with the Magistrates and officers. Leonardo Caluo was murdered in the Palace, Bondemario in the house of Paulo Andreatio, who hath written the historie of the taking of Nigrepont. And Hericio comming vpon Ottomans word forth of a verie strong place which he had made good, was by the tirants comand sawed a sunder in the middle; that trecherous scotter saying, That he had promised to pardon his head, but not his flanks. Then he made a cruell decree, That all yong men of twentie yeres of age should be slaine, and that he which should saue any one of that age, should himselfe be put 40 to death. Then was a horrible slaughter made vpon the towne-men, and against those whom aduerser fortune had brought thither, all places reeking with blood. The heads of those that were slaine being laid on an heape in S. Francis market-place nere to the Palace before the Patriarkes house, did serue for a pittifull spectacle to women & children. The dead bodies lying heere and there, for feare least the stench should infect the aire, were throwne into the neighbour channell. At the very same time that the citie was taken, the Gallies whom the Generall had ouer night sent for, arrived when it was too late: And perceiving that the Venetian Ensignes were no more vpon the towers, and that by other euident signes they knew that the Citie was lost, they did in sad and lamentable manner with teares in their eyes, behold the Cities wals; and because there was no safetie in abiding there, they weighed Ankers and sailed thence.

After the taking of Nigrepont, the Venetian fleet was for a time banished as it were from their countrey, wandering vp and downe in the neighbour Islandes. At last, returning to their first Rendezous, it was in a short space, (though too late,) meruailously encreased. Giacomo Veniers came to it with five and twentie well-armed vessels, and within a while after fourteene other Gallies arrived, who were followed with sixteen others, after them presently came diuers more, so as in a verie short time, the number amounted to more than an hundred vessels fit for service. The ships of burthen, because they would not saile without winde, were left at the Isle of Cea, 50 nere to Nigrepont. The Gallies gaue chase to the enemies fleet which was laden with bootie as farre as Chios. For Ottoman having left a strong Garrison in Nigrepont was gone forth of the Island, and retired by land with all his troupes.

the Nymph Chione. It is in circuit a hundred and five and twentie thousand paces, and it is seated right ouer against Erethrea. It was in former times free, now it acknowledgeth the Genouetes for her Lords, who by a corrupted speech call it Sio. The Venicians being come to the Promontorie of Mastic in the enemies view, Canalis fearing if he should loose the battaile which he determined to giue, that then he should more encrease mens hatred towards him, called all the Captaines of the Gallies to counsell, and craued their aduise, if they thought it expedient for the Commonwealt to fight that day with all their forces, and to giue the enemies battaile. Their opinions thereupon were various. At last, most of them being of opinion not to precipitate the Commonwealt into an apparent danger, the fleet returned to Sea without fight.

It is reported that so soone as the enemy descried the Venetian Gallies neere to Chios, he presently determined to make away, resolving by no means to fight in regard of his small number of men, so as some of them were already embarked in light vessels fit for flight; and others so soone as they perceived the Venicians comming towards them, determined to leaue their vessels, and to swimme to the neighbour shoares. But when they descried that the Venetian fleet shaped another course, they presently left Chios & sailed to Lesbos to man their vessels with rowers. From Lesbos going to the streight, they were afraid lest the Venetian fleet should be at Tenedos, and there whether they would or not, enforce them to fight. But having intelligence by their discoverers, that all there was quiet, after that they had passed by Tenedos, they sailed with great cries and wonderful ioy to a safe Haven. It is reported that the Generall of the Turkish fleet hauing crossed the streight turned towards his fouldiers, & with a smiling countenance said vnto them: The Venicians haue dealt verie courteously with vs, for they haue accompanied vs with great numbers of Gallies from Tenedos to Nigrepont, & then from thence to Chios.

The losse of Nigrepont did affe the Senate and people with such discontent, as they would hardly haue received greater if they had lost all that they possessed on the firme land or at sea. All men generally said that this losse did not onely concerne the Venetian State, but all Italie: That they had no Island, channell or sea streight left, that was able to withstand the attempts of that barbarous enemy, but that he might at his pleasure with a direct course saile to Italie: That their owne negligence with that of others, had bene the cause thereof, who hauing bene able in time to haue quenched that fire, had by their mutual hatred & auarice, suffered it to encrease: That they were to blush for shame, & to repent that they had not relieved that loyal Citie, during the siege. Therefore all men with one consent desired both the fleet and the Generall: and a Decree was made that hee should be dismissed of his place, and being sent for home, he should giue an account why he had not relieved Nigrepont. Pietro Mocenigo was by a generall consent subrogated in his place: who was presently commanded to make hast to the Armie. In the meane time, after the fleet had made some aboad at Sea, Canalis and the rest determined to surprize Nigrepont, and by an vnlookt-for assault to attempt the recovery of the Citie. They concluded then among themselves that Gionanni Trono, Niccolao Molino, and Federico Iustimiano should saile before with nine Gallies, and so soone as they from the channell should perceive the fleet to be neere the Citie, then to land their men, and march to assault it on the other side. But these men were somewhat too forward, for being euironed with great troupes of Turkes, more than two hundred of them were in a moment slaine: among whom was Gionanni Trono, a man whose valour did greatly appeare in that fight, although their forces were not equall. The rest of the fleet landing on the shoare being daunted with the death of their fellows, and perceiving those in the channell to goe slowly to worke, escaped to their Gallies: And in this manner the fleet retired without any good successe to Aulida, not farre from Nigrepont.

The same day somewhat before Sunne-set Pietro Mocenigo with three Gallies came came to the fleet, so soone as Canalis descried him, hee descended into a long boat, and went to meete him, where after mutuall embracements, hee acquainted him what his purpose had bene, and why he had assembled that great fleet, for the recouerie of Nigrepont; which hee hoped to haue effected if hee had any longer tarried in commission. But his hope was, that what himselfe could not execute by reason of the losse of his place, the new Generall by his valour and conduct would fortunately bring to passe, all things being in a readinesse for that purpose. Mocenigo said vnto him; Pursue what thou hast begunne, and if thou hast anie hope to recouer the Citie, goe on a Gods name: as for my selfe, I am so farre off in this my new authority from hindring the publique good, as on the contrarie I freely offer to aide and assist thee in this important businesse, as a friend or ordinarie Captaine: but her refusing to enter vpon an other mans charge, Mocenigo dismissed the Gallies that had bene sent for, and determined not to continue, to the weale publiques losse, and his owne dishonour, an enterprize which had bene so vnfortunately begunne. Then he departed (for winter was at hand) with the rest of the fleet into Morea, determining at the Spring to remoue from thence, and to attempt some notable exploit which should recompence the losse of Nigrepont. Canalis so soone as hee came to Venice was condemned to perpetual banishment. Hee was confined to the Port of Gruare, a town of the Forlani, where to lessen the griefe for the losse of his country, he spent the time in hunting and studie.

Mocenigo during that winter was not idle, for hee repaired his Gallies, and sent to the Islands on the Egean Sea to comfort and assure the Inhabitants, who were yet daunted with the losse of Nigrepont. Thus was hee busied when Marino Maripetro and Ladauico Bembo, did about the beginning of the Spring come as Providadors to the Armie, who were sent thither, that Mocenigo together with them might manage the affaires of the Republique. Riccasia came thither likewise from Apulia with tenne Gallies, being sent by King Ferdinand to make warre on the Turkes, in the company and by the aduise of the Venetian Generall.

The losse of Nigrepont had troubled all the Princes of Italie, and especially king Ferdinand, who, the more he perceived the frontiers of Apulia and Calabria to lie open to the Turkes inuasions, the more did hee feare their prosperitie and aduancement. Ottoman fearing that by his taking of Nigrepont from the venetians all Christian princes would arme against him, was willing to trie if hee could make peace with the Venetians, or at least, if that could not be done, to draw the businesse out in length, to the end that time might sweeten the sharpnesse of that losse. But because hee would not haue them thinke that hee did it for feare, hee was content to vse the mediation of his mother in lawe, who was a Christian, and Daughter to George, who in former times had bene Prince of the Tribulles.

She hauing bene made acquainted with her sonne in lawes meaning, sent one of her household seruants to Venice, from her to aduertize the Venetians that they should doe well to send their Commissioners to the Turke, and that if they were desirous of peace, it should be graunted them, and peraduenture vpon better conditions than they hoped for. Hereupon Niccolao Coco and Francisco Capello were sent to her by Sea, who found her in a village of Macedonia where shee remained, and from thence they went by land to Ottoman. But peace being treated of, and the Conditions propounded not pleasing, and the Commissioners beeing by Letters called home to Venice, Capello being troubled with a feauer, died at Constantinople: Coco in a fisher boat went to Lemnos, and from thence in a Gallie that he found there by chance, sailed to Candie: And thus by the going to and fro of Ambassadors by treaties of peace at Constantinople, and by transporting of Letters from both sides, all that Summer was spent to no purpose.

Winter drawing neare, the Kings naue returned to Naples, and the Providadors being called home by the Senate, went backe to Venice. Within a while after, Prince Moro died, hauing gouerned the Common-wealth nine yeeres and six months:

The Commissioners are returned without any conclusion.

neths : Hee was buried in Saint Iobs Church, which, together with the Monasterie neere adioyning, hee had erected at his owne proper costs. During his gouernement, the Citie was not onely beautified with that building, but the inner side of the entrie into the Pallace, which was begunne before then vnder Maripietro, was in his time wholly finished, where his Marble Statue is to be seene, with two others vnderneath him, representing our two first parents, wrought by Antonio Crijpe the skilfullest Caruer of his time. Saint Peter's Steeple of the Castle made of a white square stone, which is an excellent peece of worke, was then builded.

Mocenigo his first exposit.

Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos was reedified.

Nicolao Trono succeeded Moro, whose short gouernment was verie fortunate, because the Venetians in his time made a league with the king of Persia, and vnitied the famous Isle of Cyprus to their dominions. The Senate sent Messengers to the Pope, and to King Ferdinand, to intreat the, that they would the summer folowing arme against their common enemy the Turk, and to tell them that the matter was not to be delayed, but that it was time alreadie to be at Sea. The Ambassadors were courteously entertained by either of them, who promised all assistance according to their power. Mocenigo likewise, did by Letters intreat the King of Cyprus, and the great Master of Rhodes, that they would arme against the Turkes : Himselfe in the meane time visited all the Islands of the Aegean seas, and confirmed them by his presence. There is a small towne in Ionia opposite to the Isle of Chios, which is called Pasfage, whither from Asia all goodes were brought, at such time as the Italian Merchants did frequent the Isle of Chios, as into a common store-houise. Mocenigo hauing intelligence that the same place was without garrison, came with his fleet before day neere to the shore, and sent his Mariners and some of the Rowers to fetch this rich booty. The Inhabitants of this Towne being affrighted at this sodain incursion escaped into the neighbour-mountaines : the Shoppes full of Asian marchandise were rifled, and the whole booty being brought to the Gallies, the towne was burnt. Mocenigo returning to Modon (for Winter was not yet spent) made some stay there. Then being prouoked by the common report, how that the enemies fleet of fortie Gallies were ready to inuade Lemnos, he with his fleet speedily failed into the Island. But finding this rumour to be false, and being unwilling to haue his comming thither to be to no purpose, hee caused the towne of Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos to be repaired, which before had beene ouerthrowne by

by an Earth-quake, and hauing reedified it, hee manned it with a strong Garrison.

Hauing provided for the affaires of the Island, he returned to Modon where hee found two new Prouidators sent from Venice, who were Stephano Maripietro, and Vittori Soranzo, two of the chiefe Senators. At their arriuall, they concluded betwixt themselves, that in euerie Gallie, besides the Souldiers and Mariners, tenne horse-men whom the Greekes call Stradiots, should be placed: These men are more apt to take booties than to fight. They vse a buckler, sword and lance, few of them were curafes, but they quilt their doublets and casocks with cotton to beare off the enemies stroakes. They haue very swift horse and wel breathed. The Venetians did vse these kinde of men in the wars in Albania and Morea. But those of Morea neere to Naples wee reaccounted most valiant : The choicest of these, were put into the Gallies. The Fleete being furnished with such supplies, put to Sea, to walle and spoile the Prouinces of Asia. It spared the Cities and Islands of Greece, for respect it did beare to the Christian name, notwithstanding that they were subiect to Ottoman. From Morea hee went to Lesbos, where neere to the Promontorie on the East-side, where the Island is least habitable, the Fleete cast Anchor in a safe Haven. Right ouer against it on the Sea shore stands the Citie of Pergamus, a towne in olde time very famous in the lesser Asia, it was well knowne to the Romans for the Tapestry that was made there, but much more because it was the inheritance of King Attalus. There is nothing to bee seene at this day but the ruines of olde buildings. The Territorie by reason of the fertilitie thereof is storcd with villages. The Venetian departing about midnight from Lesbos, landed his troups on the opposite shoare in the lesser Asia, and commanded Giacomo Parisotto the Admirall of the Fleete, to place part of his troups in Ambush, and with the rest to spoile and wast the enemies Countrie, putting all to fire and sword. According to this commaundement, all places were spoiled to the great terror of the Countrie-people, and great store of cattail with many prisoners were carried thence : But the Turkish horse-men of the neighbour Garrisons, hearing the lamentations of the poore people that fledde, did fiercely charge the Venetians, who retired to their shippes, and by that vnlooked for assault did greatly molest the Souldiers that were laden with booty : Then the light horse of Morea comming speedily to their reskew, did easily chace and pursue them with great slaughter. The enemies heads together with the booty were brought to the vessels, and for euerie head the Souldier received a Ducat, the which recompence the Generall promised to all those that serued him in that iournie against the Turkes, and was exactly performed during that warre. The Fleet departing from the enemies Countrie, went and cast Ankour in a desert Island betwixt Chios and the firme Land : There was the booty laied abroad, and sold to them that offered most : The Treasurers appointed for that purpose distributed the monie to the horse-men, Souldiers, and Mariners. The same night the Venetian failed to the Islands neere to Caria which in times past had belonged to the inhabitants of Gnidus, to spoile and wast them. Gnidus in times past among the Cities of Caria was very famous, in regard of her Arsenal and two Hauens, and at this day sundrie ruines of olde buildings are to bee seene there. The Territorie neere adioyning, is not tilled, but frequented by sheepherds. The Fleete being come to this place, both horse and foot were landed to waste the Countrie : many of all sex and ages were taken and brought to the Gallies, but of Cattail no more than serued for their present vse. They found nothing else there but certaine tapestry and fustians to make tents, such as the Numidians vsed when they were wont to goe wandring vp and downe.

What Gnidus was in former times.

The Venetian putting to Sea went to Delos an Island of the Cyclades, famous in former times for Apollo's Temple, and the great concourse of people that resorted thither ; it is now desolate and inhabitable ; there is nothing now to be seene but but the ruines of the temple with those of an amphitheater of white marble, columns and other statues, with a Colossus of fiftene cubites high. From Lelos, Mocenigo directed his course to Morea because victuals grew scant. By the way nere to the Cape of Mailles he met with Rüchaisis the Generall of King Ferdinando his fleet with seuentene Gallies, and after reciprocal salutations with great acclamations and other signes of ioy after the manner at Sea, they went together to Modon. There the Venetian had intelligence that the Popes Fleet would soone arrive there. But because he would make no long abode there, hauing victualled his Fleet, he and the Kings Generall departed from Modon, and with a faire winde sailed to the Islands of the Rhodian Sea next to Asia.

Those of Rhodes possessed the Citie (which was exceeding strong by arte and manned with a strong Garrison) called the Castle of S. Peter, seated in that part of Caria opposite to the Isle of Coos, the only refuge of the Christians that laid forth of Asia. The Turkes were Masters of all places nere to the Rampiers, so as the inhabitants durst not come forth of their fortifications by reason of the enemies daily incursions,

There the Venetians were tolde a wonder of the skilfull sent of their dogs, how that the inhabitants kept fistic dogges which in the night time they did put forth of the Rampiers for the guard of the Citie, and that their manner was, if any Christian did by chance come thither in the night they would gently fawne vpon him and lead him to the citie, but if they met with any Turke, they did first by their loud barking as it were by a trumpet giue warning of their coming, and would then fall vpon them and teare them in peeces. Now the better to procure means for the inhabitants to come forth and to seeke for their commodities abroad, the Venetian resolved wholly to ruine all the Townes and villages nere adjoining: And for the effecting thereof hauing failed all night, hee came before day nere to the enemies shoare, where finding that all his Gallies were not come vp, hee determined to stay for the rest of his Fleet which the error of the night had caused to stray about the Promontorie: And early in the morning when the inhabitants perceiued the enemies on their shoare they sent their vnexperienced troupes vp to the Mountaines determining on the assurance of the steepness of the places there to fight with them. The Venetian perceiuing the boldnesse of those people, did put his Souldiers in battaile, and gaue them a fierce charge. They did not refuse the fight, but answered them as brauely, the bickering was for a time doubtfull, and the horse-men could doe no great matter by reason of the stony and steep waies: the Souldiers and Mariners did with darts and arrowes charge the enemies from farre, and at last came to handie stroakes with swords, pikes, and iron maces, but many of them beeing sore wounded by the Turkes fell downe dead. In the end the Venetian beeing stronger both in valour and number, enforced the enemy to quit the place, and with great slaughter brake and defeated him, diuers threw away their weapons & were taken prisoners, but the greatest number being skilfull in the craggie waies escaped by the Mountaines. Then the Venetians fell to spoile, and hauing wasted all that Countrie they retired to their vessels laden with tapestrie.

In that part of Asia the women are cunning in weaving of tapestrie, and do not only deale in household businesse, but in trade of Marchandize. The heads of those that were slaine being numberlesse were carried to the Generall; many were taken in the fight, but very few in the fieldes and villages.

Four daies after the fight, the Fleet departed thence, and in a morning before daie drew nere to Tabia a Citie of Caria. In that place, two Seas comming to ioine together, make part of Caria in a manner like an Island: The Territorie in time past belonged to those of Halicarnassus, with their roiall Citie, famous for the magnificent tombe of King Mausolus: there is yet to this day (as Caroliand writeth) among the ruines of the citie certaine markes of that admirable worke to be seene: The inhabitants of those places, detesting husbandrie giue them selues to feeding of Cattaile: from thence great store of Cattaile and many prisoners were brought to the Gallies. Then Mocenigo failed to the desert Island, called Capraria, where whilst the bootie was diuided; newes was brought that the Popes Legat was athand with his Fleet: The Venetian to do him honour prepared certaine Gallies and went to meete him, and after that he had welcommed him with the generall applause of all men with sound of trumpets and reciprocal embracements, Mocenigo said vnto him.

How sure (most reuerend and excellent Father) that you are not ignorant how valiantly hitherto the Venetians haue borne them selues for the Christian faith. This is the ninth yeare we haue fought by Sea and Land against this cruel enemy, without the assistance of any Christian Princes, but of King Ferdinand onely: It is needlesse to rehearse the losses, traoules, and dangers which we haue sustained; for there is no place in all Morea, no shoare in Greece, nor Island in all the Ionian and Aegan Seas which is not watered with our blood, or with that of our enemies: we haue not spared our labour, nor expences, and we hartly wish that whatsoener wee now doe, or shall hereafter execute, may be for the wealth of Christendome. We haue lately with fier and sword wasted Aolia and Caria two rich Prouinces of Christendome. We haue lately by thine happy arrivall to bring to passe (some nobler enterprize: it rests therefore on your part to teach vs what you know to be profitable for Christendome, and to prescribe vnto vs what to execute; and on our partes forthwith to obey thy commandements.

The Legat answered. It is sufficiently known with what zeale & affection the Venetians haue till this present defended Christian Religion; and how by their valour and industrie they haue preserved Cities, Commonwealths and Islands: But for thy own particular, I may well say, That although other Generalls haue done valiantly, yet thou hast not only carried thy selfe valiantly, but most fortunately, and (if I may so say) almost diuinely. This being thus, I entreate thee to continue as thou hast begun, and let not our conduct or that of any else, interrupt the course of thy happy fortune: For my selfe (as it becommeth a Church-man) I will pray vnto God and his Saints, that all thy enterprizes may succeed fortunately, & those troupes which I haue brought with me, shall follow thy commandement.

After this they failed into the Isle of Samos, intending there to consult whether they should shap their next course. This Samos is at this day desolate: for wee speake not of that which is nere to Thrace, but rather of that which is right ouer against it. This that we now speake of is vpon the coast of Ionis, and is (according to Isidorus) an hundred thousand paces in circuit, called in olde time Parthenia, afterwards Adria, and Anthemusa, Melamphila, and Ciparista, and lastly Samos. At this day it aboundeth in wilde Beastes, in regard of many desert places thereof. In this Island the Fleet made some abode, till such time as the horse that were tired with their long being at Sea had refreshed themselves in the pleasant meadowes. The Souldiers and Marriners in the meane time going on shoare, spent the time in banquets and hunting. The Generall and Captaines of the Armie concluded to assaile Satalia on the Iodaine, a Citie of Pamphilia builded by King Atalau. This Citie is at this day the greatest of all the Sea-townes of Asia. It hath an Haven fortified on both sides, and is embarrued with a mightie iron chaine. The Syrian and Egyptian marchants do usually come thither as to the ordinary Mart of the whole Prouince. Mocenigo commanded the Captaines of the Gallies speedily to prepare ladders the which being made readie, he departed from Samos with a gentle gale of winde, and failed to the assault of Satalia: Being come to the Islands of Calidonia, he receiued supplies of two Gallies sent to him by those of Rhodes. The whole Fleet consisted of foure score and fiue Gallies, namely twenty which the Pope sent, seuentene from King Ferdinand, two from Rhodes, and six and fortie of the Venetians: The Fleet departing at Sun-set from the Calidonian Islands, did the next day by

by three of the clock in the morning arriue vpon the enemies shoare. Mocenigo presently commanded Victor Soranza one of the Prouidators to go with ten Gallies to seize vpon the Hauen, and Maripietro the other Prouidator, to Land his Souldiers, and with them to giue an assault to the Citie on the other side, and he commanded the horse-men speedily to make good a little Hill neere to the Citie, from thence to send supplies where need should be: He did moreover exhort them to remember their accustomed valour, and to consider that they were to deal with an vnexperienced enemy, and such an one as was to be taken vnprovidid; and that they did as faile a Citie, which being taken would for euer enrich them. Thus beeing full of hope and valour they marched towards the Citie: Himselfe with the Captains of the associates tarried in his Gallie to behold the assault. The horse-men without delay ranne to take that Hill. Soranza with force of oares beeing come to the Hauen, after that he had in the middelt of a terrible shower of darts and arrowes broken the chaine, was himselfe the foremost that entred into the Hauen. The other Gallies that followed him seized on the Fortes on both sides the Hauen & slew all those that were within them; then they brake in to the houses in the Suburbs and into them that were neere the walls, where the Marchants for the most part dwelt in regard of their trafficke, who at the first approach of the Fleete had abandoned their wares and retired them selues into the Citie: All the store-houses were full of pepper, cinamom, ginger, perfumes, and other costly marchandize. All which being taken and brought to the Gallies, they set fier on the houses the more to terrifie the inhabitants: Then because their ladders were vnprofitable by reason of the great height of the Walls, the Souldiers fell to the spade and mattock.

The small Armie giue an assault to Sathalia.

The Generall of the Rhodes, whilst inconsiderately with his Souldiers he was busied in breaking open one of the Citie Gates, was slaine outright with the fall of a great stone which fell vpon his head. His Souldiers carried his body to the Gallies. The death of this valliant man did greatly afflict the Souldiers, but their feruor was most of all, which being throwne into the aire were by the winde carried into their faces, and falling thicke amongst the assailants did grievously scalde them, whereby they were enforced to giue ouer the assault and to retire to their Gallies. Maripietro likewise with his Souldiers fought valiantly on the other side of the Citie, which being encompassed with a double wall, the first was presently entred by scaling ladders with no meane slaughter of the Turkes, but comming to the second, and the ladders prouing to short, the courageous Souldiers fell instantly to vndermining. Our men did many gallant exploits there, and it was certainly thought that the Citie would haue beene taken that day, had not the darkeness of the night prevented them, which enforced them to retire.

A Generous act of a Dalmatian woman.

It is reported that a Dalmatian woman who had a long time beene a slave to the Turkes, was so valliant as with cries and exhortations from the walls she encouraged the Christians, whereupon, some that were not farre off threatening her with punishment, she clapt her gowne round about her and leaped downe from the walls, where being wounded with the fall, she died among her Countrymen. The Prouidators hauing left a strong guard in all places neere to the Citie, that none might come forth or enter in, they retired in the night with the rest of their forces to the Gallies: where after that they had well considered among themselves, that the Citie being strongly encompassed with high walls, and well-manned with Souldiers, could not bee taken without great ordnance, and that it would bee too long a time to fend for any from Morea, and very dangerous to bring it thither in regard of the continuall tempests which are vsuall along the coast of Pamphilia, exposed to the South-east wind which doth fiercely tossle those Seas, they determined to depart the next day, hauing first burnt the Suburbs, and wasted the Countrey which was the richest of all Pamphilia.

The Venetians resolution.

The Fleete beeing gone from Sathalia, did within a few daies after come to Rhodes, Rhodes, where, whilst it remained, the Ambassadour of Wan-cassan King of Persia came thither. He told them, that at the intreatic and pursuite of Catharin Zeno a Venetian Gentleman and their Ambassadour in Persia, his King had determined to ioine his forces with those of the Venetians to ouerthrow the power of Ottoman, and that his troupes were already entred into the greater Armenia which was subiect to Ottoman, and had taken the City of Toccata the wealthiest of all the Prouince, and some other townes of great worth. Hee told them besides, that he had great numbers of men and horse: That the Persians in their warres did skillfully handle the lance, sword, and bowe, but that they were not accustomed to other armes: That he was sent to the Venetians, Pope, and other Christian Princes, to intreat them from the King to furnish the Persian Army with Artillery against their common aduersarie.

Mocenigo and the rest gaue a willing care to the Ambassadours discourse, and did put him in good hope that he should easily obtaine all his demands: They shewed him their mighty fleet well furnished with men and armour, and told him that it was ready to faile whither his King should command it, if his pleasure were to employ it. The Persian being in this sort dismissed, went towards Italie, and they made themselves readie for some other enterprise, wherein to spend the remainder of that Autumne. But whilst these things were done at sea, Ottoman did invade the Venetians in sundrie places: For the Turkes made incurfions into Albania and Dalmatia, and entred into Italie. They did at the beginning of the warre at a certaine time prefixed make incurfions twice a yeare into Albania, namely in the time of haruest, and grape-gathering, neere to Scutarie, Lefia, Croya, and other places with the Venetians held in the Prouince. For before the Venetians were open enemies to Ottoman, Amurath his father had a long time before made warre in Albania, and especially then, when hee came to invade Scanderbeg, who in his time was a famous and valiant Captaine, and such an one, as next to Pyrrhus, who warred on the Romans in Italie, Albania neuer bred the like. Those which haue scene him in Apulia when hee came thither to the aide of king Ferdinand with six hundred horse, say, that he fought with his armes bare, sometimes with an yron Mace, and sometimes with a Sword, and executed there so many braue exploits, as himselfe alone was more feared than all the rest of his caualerie. He, after that he had by his owne industrie recovered the principalltie of Albania, did so long as he liued, with few forces defend it against the whole power of the Turkes. He had six hundred choice horse, with whom he did ordinarily vse to ouerthrow farre greater numbers of his Turkish enemies. For which his glorious exploits it is reported, that the people after his death, in admiration of him, as if they had observed in him somewhat that exceeded humane performance, did by Hymnes and Songs solemnize the memoriall of so worthe a Prince. Some credible Authors as-40 same, That in the hottest time of the warre when the Turkes filled all places with armes and terror, great multitudes of Virgins would assemble themselves together in those cities where he had commanded, and euery eight dayes would sing the praises of that dead Prince, therein imitating those of olde time, who in their high feasts did publish the acts of notable men that were dead. But this (as I haue said) was done in former time. The Turkes likewise made sundry incurfions into Dalmatia. But because it was done rather to forrage than to fight, it is not worthy of memory. It had beene good for the Venetians, if the Prouinces onely, and not Italie, had felt their cruell armes, who whilst Mocenigo executed his fortunate exploits in Asia, did enter the Confinnes of Italie, and came as farre as Vdina.

Scanderbeg a famous captain.

About the midst of Autumne, a company of Turkish horse in an euening at Sun-set, came with great rumour and incamped on the Riuer of Sconcinio, and many of them had already foarded the streame, when one Sodaine they encountered the Venetian troupes. For diuers troupes of horse lying in the Villages heere and there vpon the riuer, assembled themselves vpon the enemies arrivall to stoppe their their passage; and although the Venetians vsed great speed, the Turkes neuertheless by their swiftnelle were gotten before them, and some of their caullerie had already crossed the Riuer, when as the Venetians vpon their first charge did beate them into the water, and enforced them to returne to the other side to their fellows. The Italian caullerie remained on the riuer banks most part of the night, but through feare of the enemies great number, before day they retired into the Ile of Ceruia. This place is neare to Aquileia, and is made an Island by the circumference of the Riuers Ronedula, Amolore, and Alfa. But so soone as it was day, and that the enemy had lost sight of the Venetians, he speedily crossed the Riuer, and with great out-cries made incurfions into the Countrey of the Forlani.

All those in the villages betooke themselves to flight, and they in the Townes thought themselves not secure. The smoke of the Villages and Countrey-houses which were seene to burne a farre off, had greatly terrified the Inhabitants of the cities, but much more the sight of the poore Countrey people, who dragged their wiues, children, and cattell to their very gates. The Inhabitants of Vdina, which at this day in wealth and populoufness is one of the most renowned of the whole Prouince, was greatly affrighted at the approach of the Turkes, who were come within three miles of the citie, no lesse than if the enemy had bene at their gates.

In which amazement, mothers with their children stode weeping before the Altars, and others ranne vp and downe to the Market-place, and to the Castle. And it was certainly thought, That if the Citie had bene assailed by the Turkes in that generall confusion, it might haue bene endangered without any notable danger. But so it was, That the Turkes fearing some Ambuscado, because they knew not whither the Venetian caullerie was retired, went backe the same way they came with great numbers of prisoners and cattell. Now the Venetians at the same time were not onely molested in that place, but neere to the Po likewise, by reason of the troubles of Ferrara. After the death of Borsia d'Este the Venetians assisted Hercules his brother with men, money, and shipping, for the obtaining of the principalltie of Ferrara against his Nephew Nicolas sonne to his brother Lionello, who claimed it, and being therein established, they maintained him in it by force (notwithstanding that in other places, they were pressed with the burthen of a greater warre) when by the conspiracie of certaine particular persons, hee had like to haue lost it. In the citie of Venice, they called in all siluer coyne, which (for the most part) was counterfet, and coyned other bigger peeces of a new stampe, which were called Troni, by reason of the Princes effigies vpon it. After the Persian Ambassadors departure forth of Asia, Mocenigo, and the Associates, being desirous to spend the small remainder of Autumne in some honourable exploits, directed their course towards that part of Asia which is opposit to Chios neere to Thermena a Promontorie of those of Mindos. The horsemen and mariners beeing landed in that place, and sent vp and downe that Territorie which aboundeth with vines, oliue trees, and rich villages, they made a great spoile, and carried away infinite numbers of prisoners. The souldiers brought an hundred seauen and thirtie heades of the enemies to the Gallies. The prisoners were sold by the sound of Drumme, and the mony was equally diuided among the troupes. From thence being come to Nasso, the Generall of the Kings Gallies (for winter approached) took leaue of Mocenigo, and with his fleet went home into his Countrey.

The Venetian and the Popes Legate being desirous to attempt some memorable action before winter, leauing Nasso, sailed directly to besiege Smirna, in times past a famous Citie of Ionia. They had intelligence, that because it was seated in a Gulph farre off, it had not of a long time tasted any misery of warre; and that therefore, the Inhabitants of the place did liue in all securitie, which had bred in them a carelesse neglect of fortifying their Citie, which in many places was much ruined. They first arrived at Pira a desert Island: From thence sayling by night, they came the third day after in the morning to the strand of Smirna. A great part of the Citie standeth vpon the hill, but the better halfe of it is in the plaine, and yet the hill is most inhabited. The troupes being presently landed, gave a furious assault to the wailes of the Citie where they found small resistance: but so great was the terror of the distressed Citizens, as all their attempts could not long hold out the Christians: for whilst they ran vp and downe confusedly, the Citie was spoiled by the souldiers and mariners. Great was the lamentation of the flying townsmen, whilst women with their children, ranne into their Temples or Mosquets, embracing the Altars, and imploring the aide of Mahomet. At length the inhabitants being reduced to all extremitie, did from the tops of the houses throw tyles and stones downe vpon their enemies. The victorious Venetians in the meane time ran vp and downe the Citie, and violently drew women, children, & maids forth of the temples: the men that were vnarmed they tooke prisoners, and such as made defence were slaine: They tooke away their goods, gold, silver, and all their curious plate, and spoiled all places of what condition soeuer.

It is reported that a young woman being perforce led towards the Gallies, did by the way fall downe vpon her husbands graue, and embracing it with warme teares, did often repeat his name, and spake in this manner. O my deare and welbeloued husband, the misfortune and fate of my countrey compels me, whom neither loue nor force could euer change from being thine, to be at this present carried away by a cruell enemy into perpetuall bondage: I poore wretch am hurried from thy sight, and shall neuer more behold my louing country nor this deare monument. I plore these last teares of mine on thine ashes, and with sighes I inuoke thy Ghost: But why should I doe so? I will rather die than be drawne from hence. And in this manner lying close to the graue, she could not be removed thence, neither by threatnings nor force, whereupon a rash young souldier thrust his sword through her bodie: happie onely in this to be entombed there where she desired.

Balaban Gouverneur of the Prouince, vpon report that the Citie was taken, came from the neighbour Garrisons where he lay, with great troupes leuied in halt. The light horse of Morea encountered him, and they had scarce begun the fight, when as all the other troupes from the Gallies arrived: the fight for a time was equal, but on a sodaine the enemy was broken and put to rout with great losse. The victorious souldiers returned to the Citie, from whence carrying all the bootie to the Gallies, and the Citie being fired in sundrie places, it was in a moment burnt to ashes. Cepis saith, that he saw there among other old monuments, that of the excellent Poet Homer with his picture, and ouer his head his name written in Greeke. The towne being sacked and burnt, the whole territorie was wasted. Two hundred and fiftene of the enemies heads were carried to the Gallies. The fleet departed thence, and sailed to the desert Islands of Ionia, where the bootie was sold to them that gave most, and the money according to the custome was distributed among the souldiers and mariners.

The fourth day after, the troupes landed on the shoare of Clazomene. This towne is seated in the farthest part of the Gulph of Smirna, and was in old time verie famous in Ionia: From thence they carried away no great bootie. For the newes of the taking of Smirna had caused the people of the countrey to retire with their goods, wiues, and children into the mountaines: verie few tarried in their houses, who were carried away prisoners, and with them many Camels and much cattell. From thence, because winter approached, the two fleets left Ionia and with a faire wind sailed directly into Morea.

VVhen they came to Modon, it is reported, That the Popes Legate after he had embraced Mocenigo, spake thus vnto him. I will take my leaue of thee O thou valiant man, and will be the publike witness and trumpet of thy heroicke deeds. And if it shall please God to send me safe into Italie, not onely the Pope and our most Reverend uerend Colledge of Cardinals, but all Italie, together with the Princes and re-most nations of Christendome, shall vnderstand what the Venetians vnder thy conduct, skill, and counsell, haue done against our common enemies the Turkes, in Asia, Licia, and Pamphilia. Go forward braue Captaine as thou hast begunne to enlarge the Venetian glorie, to defend Christian Religion: and thereby to immortalize thine owne name. I beseech Almighty God to fauour thine enterprizes, and I hope it will come to passe, that all the losses which Christendome hath sustained by this barbarous enemy, shall ere long by thine onely valour, and to their ruine, besely recompenced.

Mocenigo in his owne behalfe answered him briefly; but for the Venetians he promised much, provided that the Princes of Christendome would assist them in that warre. Thereupon, the Legate failed towards Italie, and the Venetian went to Naples in Morea, where, whilst the Generall fortified the towne, a young man of Sicilie came vnto him, (who was taken prisoner at the losse of Nigrepont) and told him that he had diligently viewed Ottomans Nauie at Gallipolis and his Arsenall there, and that it was an easie matter to burne them both, in regard they kept no nightly watch, and if that he would furnish him with some trustie mariners, he should shortly finde that he had told him nothing but the truth. The Venetian embraced the young man, and promised him great matters. The Sicilian hauing receiued failers and a ship, counterfeited the Marchant, and with his vessell loden with Apples failed to Gallipolis, and all day long made sale of his trash: (though his head were busied with greater designs) the same night hee did set fire on an hundred Gallies which were rigged, but he could not burne all the rest that lay at Anker by reason of the great concourse of people that came running thither at sight of the fire.

This being done, he fought to escape forth of the streight, but his owne ship by misshap being likewise set on fire, he with his fellows were enforced to hide themselves in the next wood. But when the Turkes saw the Apples float vp and downe the water, and the Barke funke not farre from thence, they presently imagined that the Marchant of Apples had done the deed. The next day the Sicilian and his fellows were taken and sent to Ottoman, who demanding of this young man what had moued him to doe it, he brauely and fearelessly answered, That hee had done it to hinder the common enemy of Christendome, and that his attempt would be much more glorious, if he might as easily runne his sword through his bodie, as he had set fire on his Gallies. Mahomet wondering at the young mans courage, did not like King Porcenna, but according to his barbarous crueltie he commanded the bodies of him and his fellows to be sawen a sunder in the mid-desert. The Venetian Senate in regard it could not recompence him according to his desert, gaue his sister a dowrie forth of the publike treasure, and to a brother of his, a yearly pension during his life.

The Fleet wintered at Naples, and the Generall was busied in providing all necessaries for the Citie and fleet, when as letters came thither from the king of Persia and Catharin Zeno directed to the Prince, and Senate, containing the selfe same demands which the Ambassador had craued certaine moneths before: Mocenigo in an expresse Galley sent them to Venice. The Senate being moued by these letters, did presently from all parts cause great quantitie of Ordnance to be provided, and gold plate curiously wrought, with many peeces of Scarlet cloth of Verona, and a certaine summe of Ducates likewise for a present to the Persian king, with an hundred young men skillfull in Gunners art to attend vpon the Ordnance, whose Captaine was Tomaso Himolao. Iosepho Barbaro an old Senator, a man skillfull in the Persian tongue, was appointed Ambassador for to carrie these presents to the king which loded three ships. All things being in readinesse, Barbaro imbarked himselfe, and with a faire wind failed to Cyprus, from thence along the coast of Cilicia and Syria, he arrived in the country of the king their friend.

Moreo-

Moreover, the Senate commaunded Mocenigo to make his fleet readie to saile with it whithersoever it should please Vassan-Cassan to command it.

Mahomet in the meane time hauing left a strong Garrison in Constantinople, marched with great forces into Asia, to oppose himselfe against that warre. The Venetian likewise (because the common rumour was, that the Caramani brethren, associates to the King of Persia, whom Mahomet had bereft of their fathers Kingdome, did invade the Sea-townes of Cilicia) did at the Spring time in the behalfe of the king of Persia, saile with his fleet to Cyprus, from thence to goe to the aide of the Caramanis. He had as many horse and foote troupes, and the same prouision for warre, as the yeare before. The Rhodians sent him two well-armed Gallies, and the king of Cyprus their friend and allie, gaue him foure.

The Venetian fleet being thus augmented, failed into Cilicia, neere to Seleucia, at the siege whereof Caraman was then encamped. There is an haven called Theodora, which the Venetian fleet made good: There in old time stood a Temple of Venus, and the place by reason of the commodiousnesse thereof was much frequented by Pirates; without the ruines of the Citie on the shoare there is at this day a verie ancient Temple to be seene, builded of square stone. Cassambet the younger of the Caraman brethren (for the eldest whose name was Piramet; and king of Cilicia remained in the king of Persias Amie) sent Ambassadors to the Venetian, who after they had congratulated his safe arrival, told him that the Caraman brethren, had euer grounded their hope and trust on the Venetians, in regard of the friendship and alliance betwixt their dead father and them; that Cassambet had for four moneths, besieged three Cities of Cilicia; Sichiin, Seleucia, and Coric; which if he might take, he did assure himselfe in short space to recover his whole Kingdome; that he wanted nothing but Ordnance and other warlike engines to batter townes: That he did entreate him to aide the king a friend and allie to the Venetians, till such time as he had recovered his fathers kingdome, which Ottoman their common enemy did wrongfully possesse.

The Venetian after that he had put the Ambassadors in good hope, dispatche his Vicor Sourance to Cassambet to consult with him concerning the forme of the warre.
He learned of him that of those three Cities which were besieged, it behooued him first to take Sichiin, for that being taken, the rest would presently yeeld: Mustapha the Cilician was Gouvernour thereof, a treacherous man, and one that with his fortune had changed Religion, and had in times past bene a friend to Cassambet and his brother, who so soone as he saw their Kingdome to be taken from them, did follow Ottomans Armie, and did wrongfully seize on that Citie. Carriolan Cepio of Traho, being sent to view the towne, reported that the Citie was seated on an high place, but that the wall was weake and vnfortified, the people vnskillfull and daunted, with other matters which did promise victorie. The Venetian resolving to besiege that Citie, sent Lodouico Lombaro the Venetian with ten Gal-lies to Coric by Sea, to keepe all victuals from coming to the inhabitants. By land Caraman with his troupes did neereley presse the enemy: the rest of the Armie drew neere to Sichiin, and gaue an assault, but by reason of the difficultie of the place the town could not be taken. The inhabitants waxing proud for that good successe, did from the walles mocke the Venetians, saying: Get yee home O Venetians, and command the Sea and fishes, but leave the Empire of the land to Ottoman. The Venetian by an Herald of Armes sought to draw Muslapha to a voluntarie yielding, wishing him rather to make proofe of the Venetians loyalty and gentleness than of their Arms:
but perceiving that the Turke contemned peace, he gaue a more furious assault to the Citie, and planting his Ordnance on the North side, and hauing made a reasonable breach, the enemy being daunted, presently yeelded.

The Venetians suffering Muslapha with his souldiers to goe whither he would, deliuered the Citie to Hisafa Caramans Lieutenant. From thence going to Coric, he did by the way meet with Zanchio General of the royall Armie, with ten Gallies.

The Sea enuironeth two parts of Coric, the rest on the land side hath a verie depe ditch fortified with a double wall: The haufen lieth towards the East, whose entrance is likewise fortified. On the South side is the Isle of Eleusia three hundred paces from thence, fortified with a wall of white square stone. The Venetian from the poepe of the Galley hauing curiously viewed the situation of the place, made a signe to his Gallies to enter: Thereupon the Gallies with discharging their Ordnance, and in a shower of arrowes did winne the Hauen, Mocenigo hauing landed his troupes, sent to the Gouvernour of the Citie to know of him whether he would yeeld and goe from thence: He made a proud answer, saying: Tell him from me, that the weake coward Mastapha is not heere, but another, who by his deserts com-

The king of Cyprus speech to Mocenigo.

The Turkish Princes doe vse to appropriate to themselves the fifth part of all captiues. They make choice of male children from ten yeares old to sixtene. If there be no captiues, they doe by their officers carrie away children of that age in despite of their parents, forth of such Prouinces as they haue wonne from the Christians. These by constraint hauing renounced Christianitie, are instructed in the Mahometan superstition, and then are deliuered ouer into the hands of tutors, who teach them martiall discipline, and when they come to be men, they follow the Prince to the warres. The vulgar call them Janizaries: such among them as are wise and valiant, attaine to great honours: of these, the Baschas, Gouvernours of Prouinces, Townes, and Castles are made: Some of them lie in Garrison in the Cities, and some of them remaine at the great Lords port, to be neere him with their Armes when he rides abroad. Out of these, he chooseth a Regiment for the Guard of his owne person when he goeth to warre. Ottoman had left many of these men for the Guard of Coric. Ismael the Cities gouernour presuming vpon them, would not endure to heare tell of yeelding. But when the Venetian perceived it to be time to vse force and no threatening, he planted his Ordnance on the South and West sides of the Citie, and hauing made a great breach in the wall, Ismael yeelded on conditions to haue his owne life, and those of his fouldiers saued. The Venetian surrendered the Citie to Caraman: From thence he went to besiege Seleucia.

Seleucus one of Alexander of Macedons successors builded it fife miles from Sea. This Citie is now ruinate. Nessembeg lay in Garrison in the Castle which was strong by situation and art, who although at first he made shew not to yeeld, yet so soone as he perceived the ordnance & other engines to be planted against him, he forthwith yeelded the fort & the garrison to the Venetians, who by Souranza did presently deliuer it to the king his friend. Caraman hauing won his kingdom, presented the Venetian general with a horse, bridled, saddled, & barded with silver, & with a tame Leopard giuing him infinite thanks, for that by his meanes he had recovered his fathers kingdom, assuring him that whatsoever his brother and himselfe should possesse, they would euer confesse to hold it of the Venetians. Warre being in this manner ended in Cilicia, & Mocenigo hearing no newes of the king of Persias Armie determined to inuade Licia, which had not as yet tasted the miseries of war. But newes being brought vnto him that James king of Cyprus lay grievously sicke of a Diffenteria or flux, he failed to Cyprus to visit him. The Venetian being come into the Island, hauing after reciprocall salutations enquired of his disease, & of the remedies applied thereunto, entreated the king to be of good cheere, and with patience to beare the force of his maladie, who made him this answer. I know verie well most excellent Captaine, and feele how that by the violent torment of my disease. I am in great danger of life, and not to flatter my selfe, I haue no hope to escape, I make my deere selfe wife with the childe which she beares in her body mine heires, and she is (as thou knowest) daughter to Marco Cornari, and being adopted by the Venetian Senat, was by it giuen to me in marriage. If I die, (which I make no question of) I recommend my wife, issue, and kingdom to the Venetians. And theareby entreat thee, in regard of our friendship and for the greatnes of the Venetian state, if it come to that that thou wouldest defend and keepe, both her selfe, issue and kingdom from all wrong and oppression.

Thy

Thy body (quoth Mocenigo) most Royall King, is yet in good estate, and thou in the prime of thine age, which may put thee in good hope of speedy recovery; but if it should fall out otherwise (which God forbid) I beseech thee be confident, that neither my selfe, nor the Venetians forces will euer be wanting to thee or thine. And then taking leaue of him, he speedily sailed with all his flecte to the Islands neare to Licia, from thence going to the firme land, and carrying away a great bootie from that coast, he resolved to be-liege Micra a towne neare to the sea; and because hee had small hope that it would otherwise yeelde, hee planted his ordnance on both sides. The wall was in some places very much shaken, when Aisabet Gouvernour of Licia shewed himselfe with 10 great troupes of fouldiers. The light horse of Morea went against him, and there was a cruell fight on both sides. Aisabet being slaine, the Turkes were with great slaughter broken and put to rout. An hundred and fittie of the enemies heads were brought to the Campe, and being fixed vpon launces with that of Aisabet, were set vp neere to the walles, to the end the beleiged might behold them. Charago the Tribull, who commaunded in the City, being daunted with the disaster of his Countrymen, and perceiuing a great part of the wall to be beaten downe, he capitulated for himselfe and the Inhabitants, that they might haue their liues saued, and depart whither they pleased. This being granted, the Venetians sacked and burnt the citie.

20 From thence the flect failed to Flisfa, which in times past was opposite to Rhodes, but at this day there is nothing to be seene but the ruines, the territorie round about it is filled with Villages. The horse of Morea and the Mariners being landed, wasted all that Countrey. The Generall had determined to passe the streight, and had already commaunded the Captaines of the Gallies, to be ready to that end, when the Messengers of Charlotta sister to the King of Cyprus, (whom her brother had driuen forth of the kingdome, and like a banished woman had liued a long time at Rhodes) artiued, who certified the Generall of the King of Cyprus death, by whom his sister Charlotta (being borne in lawfull matrimonie) had been wrong-fully expelled from her fathers kingdome. They craued his aide, and entreated
30 him to assist the King of Cyprus daughter, and kinswoman to the Duke of Saouay, and to restore her to her fathers kingdome, from which her brother, sonne to a concubine, had driuen her. Mocenigo, after that he had acquainted them with the ancient league and alliance which had beene betwixt the Venetians and King James, answered; *That in the Common-wealths name, he would doe the Ladie Charlotta all right: yet hee did greatly wonder that shee did not remember how that the right of Kingdomes is rather debated by the Sword, than by Law. And that the Reaine of Cyprus had not beene onely taken from her, and from the Genoueses, who then held a part thereof: That for his part, hee knew how that the wife of the late King, the adoptive daughter of the Venetian Senate being left with child, had beene, together with the fruit of her wombe, made
40 heires by the deceased King before his death; and therefore hee tolde them plainly, That hee would in that iust quarrell take vpon him the defence of the Queene wife to the late King, who did hope ere long to be mother to a King. Hee willed them then to depart, and to seek aide elsewhere against her, for hee was resolved, in honour of the Republique to defend her from all wrongs and oppression. The Ambassadors being dismissed with this answer, he determined to passe the streight, but in the meane time hee received Letters from Catharine Zeno which did aduertize him, that the Armies of the Persian King and the Turke were not farre off from one another, and that their meaning was to fight with displayed ensignes for the finall deciding of their contronerie; that he should doe well, speedily to bring his flecte to the sea coast of Cilicia, whither
50 the Persian king promised to bring his troupes, there to treat with him after what manner the warre should be managed.*

The Letters made the Venetian to giue ouer his iourney into the streight, and to shap his course towards Cilicia, and after that he had sodainly wasted the territories of the Mircians in Licia, hee failed to Cyprus, where after that hee had comforted the mournfull Queene for her husbands death, he intreated her to bee of good cheere, and to feare no warlike menaces; for he was readie to defend her and her kingdome from all assaults and attempts whatsoever. Then he made haste towards Cilicia. So soone as the fleet came to Coric. Lodovico Lauretano Capitaine of one of the Popes Gallies came thither to him, and told him that hee came from the Archbishop of Spalatra the Popes Legate who was arrived with tenne Gallies at Rhodes, to know of him what hee meant to doe, and whether he intended to preferre some notable service against the Turkes; for if his intention were such, he would meet him with his fleet, by which speech he gaue him to vnderstand, That the Popes Legate had no meaning to come forward, but vpon hope of some great enterprize, thereby going about to inferre, that till then hee had done no memorable matter: Mocenigo taking his speech in bad part, could not so much master himselfe, but that he tolde him, That peradventure the new Legate thought, that what hee till then had done against the enemy, was but a trifle, yet those who had felt his forces, did thinke that no greater mischief could light vpon them, and that it was at his owne choice, whether he would ioyne with the Venetians fleet, or not: but for his owne part he promised for the Popes sake, to haue the gallies, souldiers, and Legates selfe in singular estimation, and that he would haue no lesse care of them in all places than of the Venetians.

The Venetian fleet had already remained certaine dayes on the confines of Cilicia; when the Generall had intelligence by Letters from Catharine Zeno, that the Persian had fought twice with the Turkes. Ottoman had two of his chiefe Officers in his company, the one was the Governour of Natolia, and the other of Romagnia; The first commaunded the Prouinces of Asia, and the second, those of Europe. Moderne Cosmographers haue termed Romagnia, all the coast of the Ponticke sea from Tauris of Cherfoncissus, to the furthest part of Morea. This name (as some do thinke) was giuen it, at such time as the seate of the Empire was transported from Rome to Constantinople. Natolia, which in time past was called Ponticke containeth (with whatsoever belongeth to the freight), all Caria, Lycia, and Pamphilia: The great Lord vseth the aduise and counsell of these men in 30 any weighty and important businesse, and specially in martiall matters: in the Barbarian tongue they are called Balschas.

The Governour of Romagnia then, comming to fight with Vssancaffans sonne, was vanquished and slaine in fight. Some thinke that the Persians are superiour to the Turks in number of men and horse, as the euent of that battell did testifie: For Ottomans army being broken and put to rout, they were in a manner all slaine, together with their Generall. The king being puffed vp with pride for this victory, did the next day encompassse the enemies Campe. Ottoman in the meane time had fortified himselfe in the midst of his Campe where hee remained as in a strong fort; hee had inclosed it with a trench of foure thousand paces in compasse with 40 rampires, neere to which he caused waggons made fast together with yron chains to be placed, vpon euery of which two field peeces were laid, then there was great store of ordnance planted in euery place, to defend the fortifications. Round about it fiftene thousand shot were appoynted, continually to play vpon the enemy: within the rampires were fiewe and twentie thousand choice horse, all Thracians and Tribulls, and twenty thousand Ianissaries reputed inuincible, and like to the Macedonian Phalange.

At the enemies first approach, infinite cannon shot were at one time bestowed vpon his troups which made a great slaughter of men and horse. In that place Vssancaffans sonne a braue young Prince being emboldened by the precedent victory, fighting in the former ranks was slaine with a cannon shot. The Persians being amazed with the great slaughter of their men and horse, and being affrighted with the vnusual report of the ordnance, turned their backs. The Turkes comming furiously forth of their Campe, did pursue the vanquished, and made a great execution.

cution. All the Persian Armie consisted of horse, who by their swiftnesse did in a moment escape farre from thence. The victorious Turkes durst pursue them no further. The King retired into the mountaines of Armenia, where his wife and children were. Of ottoman accounting himselfe the Conquerour, for that he had wonne the enemies Campe, dismissed his Armie, and returned to Constantinople.

The Persians were reckoned to be three hundred and fiftie thousand fighting men, and the Turkes three hundred and twentie thousand: of the Turkes fortie thousand were slaine, and ten thousand of the Persians. The Generall hauing intelligence hereof by Zenos letters, went from Cilicia into Cyprus. For Zeno sent him word that the king in regard of the losse of the battell would not come to the Sea-coast that yeare.

Mocenigo held the Queenes sonne which she lay in off, at the Font, and was his Godfather. Andres Cornari the Queenes vncl was at the same time in the Island. The Queene and her Councell gouerned the affaires of the Kingdome. Mocenigo enquiring of Cornari concerning the state of the Kingdome found that all things were quiet there: Neuerthelesse, being vnwilling to leave such a Realme altogether naked of forces, hee added two Gallies to those that were come thither at the beginning of Summer, and commaunded them to remaine at 20 Famagosta vnder the commaund of Cornari. The Popes Legate likewise came thither with two Gallies, for the Treasurer had carried the rest to Sio. Both of them within a while after departing thence went to Rhodes, from thence to Sio. And after that they had coasted the Islandes Cyclades, they sayled into Morea. The Legate taking his leaue, returned towards Italie, and Mocenigo went to Modon. This is all that was done abroad during that Summer. In the midst of Autumne Prince Treno died, hauing gouerned one yeare and eight monethes. He was buried in the Church of the Friers Minors, where his sonne Philip did afterwards build him a verie sumptuous Tombe of white and blacke marble curiously guile, neere to the high Altar.

Nicolao Marcello a man of singular vertue, succeeded him. In his time they beganne orderly to paint in the great Councell-chamber that which the Venetians had done in times past for Pope Alexander against the Emperor Fredericke. The undertaker of this worke was Gentile Bellini, the excellentest painter of his time, who after the peace being sent to Constantinople to the Emperour Mehomet showed so many excellent proues of his skill, as he receiued of him the honour of Knighthood, and was sent home into his countrey with rich presents. During this Princes government a new kinde of money was coyned in the Citie, which was called Marcello by the Authors name.

Peace being made with the Turke, warre is continued for a time in Tufcanie in the behalfe of the Florentines.

THE Isle of Cyprus being afterward changed in new broyles, did in the midst of winter call the Venetian to her aide. The familie of the Gorbals was verie powerfull in that Island, for king James having in a manner thrust all the nobility forth the countrey together with his sister Charlotta, had mightily enriched these men, and seated them in the chiefest places of his kingdom. In former times they had given themselves to piracie, and lived onely by theft. But the king being dead, and they by his bountie possessing goodly inheritances were nevertheless desirous to embroyle the state of the Province. Of their faction there was a Cypriot Bishop, and esteemed by his countrey men no lesse ingenious than fortunate. At the kings death, he was his Ambassador with King Ferdinand. This Bishop determined to invade invade the Realme by tyrannie, and the better to effect his purpose, he perswaded King Ferdinand to pursue by his means the marriage betwixt his bastard sonne, and the bastard daughter of the late King James gotten on a concubine. And for speedie conclusion of the businesse, the Bishop with two Gallies returned to Cyprus, with one of King Ferdinands trustiest Counsellors.

Mocenigo who lay at Modon hauing intelligence of the arriual of the kings Gallies, began to suspect that they were not sent thither but vpon some great occasion, whereupon he presently dispatched Coriolan Cepio, and Pietro Tolmiere the Dalmatian with two Gallies into Cyprus, and commanded them to enquire of the Queene, whether those of the Island practized any inuouation, and if she feared any treacherie, boldly to send him word what she would haue him to doe, who would be readie to come to her with the whole fleet vpon any occasion. After their departure Mocenigo had intelligence by letters from the Gouernour of Candie, that the Cypriots had an intent to rebell, and that it was to be feared, that vnlesse their designs were broken by the sodaine arriual of the Venetian fleet in Cyprus, that the state of the Island would be greatly endangered. The Generall being moued by these letters, did speedily send Vill or Souranza with eight Gallies into Cyprus, who comming to Candie before that the two Gallies which were first sent, were gone from thence, Souranza commanded Coriolan to pursue his iourney, and told him, that he with the rest of the Gallies would follow after.

Mocenigo is aduertised of the enemies purpose.

Whilest the Venetians were on their way, the Cypriots hauing conspired with their Bishop, did in the night come forth of their houses armed, and slew Polisappa of Cyprus, and the Queenes Philitian, who being affrighted with that sodaine rumour ranne to his chamber. Andrea Cornari at the first noise fled to the Castle, whose the Capitaine refusing to giue him entrance, he hid himselfe betwixt the two walles, but being discouered, and comming forth vpon the conspirators words, that he should haue no harme, he was presently by them murdered together with Marco Bembo his Nephew, sonne to his sister. They left their bodies naked in the place. These murders being committed, they ranne with the selfesame fire to the Venetian Magistrates house, who remained in the Island to doe iustice, to his countrey men. Nicolaso Pasicali was then Magistrate; they told him that the souldiers had slaine Cornari, because he would not giue them their pay, and that they would not haue that nights murder committed through the couetousnesse of one man to be by the Venetians imputed to them, who protested still to continue loyall to the Queene and the Venetians, intreating him to write to the Venetian Generall, that Cornari had bene slaine by his owne fault for defrauding the souldiers of their pay: they told him besides, that they would send messengers to the Prince and Senato assure them of the Islanders loyaltie towards the Queene and her sonne, and of their friendship towards the Venetians.

Although Pasicali knew all this to be false, he made shew neuertheless to beleue them, and promised them to write to Mocenigo. They in the meane time entred into the Pallace, betrothed the kings bastard daughter of sixe yeares old to King Ferdinands bastard. They intituled him Prince of Galilee (whether with the souldiers in the kingdom were wont to be honoured,) and assigned him diuers lands and signories for her dowrie. These things being done, they presently in a Galley sent away King Ferdinands counsellor, who came thither with the Bishop, to acquaint the King his master what had past. They sent messengers likewise to Venice to fanishie the Senators with words, and to sweeten the bitterness of Cornares death, or if they could not appease them, yet at least in some sort to deferre the warre, which the Venetians might make vpon them, before their forces could be vntied. They compelled the Queene to write to Mocenigo that Cornari her vnkle had bene slaine by the souldiers for his couetousnesse; that with her sonne she freely gouerned the kingdom: that all the Cypriots were dutifull and loyall: all which the poore Prince being enuironed with traitors durst not refuse to write.

That

That done, they beganne to strengthen their faction, and manned the Castles and strong places with men at their owne deuotion, and sharers in the conspiracie.

In the meane time Coriolan arriued, who seeming to be ignorant of matters past, told the Queene that the Venetians had receiued aduertisement, that the king of Egypt had promised the Realme of Cyprus to Charlotta, and therefore the Generall had sent him thither to confirme her and the Cypriots likewise: That Souranza the Prouidator would shortly be there with eight Gallies, and that the Generall would follow him with the rest of the Fleet: That the Venetians determined to defend her selfe, her sonne, and kingdom against all forraigne attempts. These news did comfort the Queene and her followers; and on the contrary, the Conspirators beganne to feare. Foure dayes after, the Prouidator arriued. At his landing two of the Conspiratours came to him vpon his word; they entering into discourse of what had happened, imputing the cause of Cornares death to his only co-toussnesse, promised to continue loyall and obedient, and to account nothing so decreed to them as the Venetians friendship. Souranza although he knew the Islanders actions not to be answerable to their words, did neuertheless labour to quiet all matters, and promised them, that by surrendering to the Queene the forts and renewen of the kingdom, they should not only be accounted friends, but inward friends to the Venetians. As for Cornares death, it concerned one priuate man alone, and not the common-wealth: He told them that they might depart and shew by those means which he had propounded to them, what loue they did beare towards the Venetians. They promised to accomplish the Prouidators demand. But procrastinating the performance, all their promises were found deceits.

The Prouidator cometh to the Island.

Souranza his proposition to the conspirators.

Then did Souranza write both to the Generall and Senate, that the Queene and her sonne were by the conspiracie of some traitors straitly kept; and that vnlesse some speedie remedie were vsed, it was to be feared that theie would shortly loose both the kingdom and the name royall.

In the meane time the Conspirators messengers being come to Mocenigo were roughly entreated, and sent backe without any hope of peace: Then being prouoked by the present danger, although hee knew that Triadin Gritti was appointed his successor, and foreseeing how dangerous it was to temporize in a businesse of so great importance, hee made a stay of seauen Gallies that were going in trade of marchandize to Alexandria, and sent those of Alexandria to Candie, and them of Syria to Naples, that they might returne to him laden with horsemen of Morea, and the other with Candiot. Hee commanded the Magistrates of the Island to load as many ships as they could find with victuals, and to send them to Cyprus: And himselfe on the other side hauing assembled all the souldiers of the neighbour garrisons, and embarking them in the vessels, which hee had made readie in the Island, and in other places of Greece, hee sailed towards Rhodes. By the way he receiued Letters from Souranza the Prouidator which aduertized him of the manifest rebellion and conspiracie of the Islanders. These newes caused him to make haste. Being come to Rhodes, and expecting the troups which hee had sent for, hee had intelligence by later Letters, how that the Conspirators hauing notice of his great warlike preparations, together with his mightie fleet, were gone forth of the Realme, and thereby all matters quieted: yet, the Queenes letters, though they imported the same, intreated him, if his iourney might not preiudice the Common-wealth, to come into the Island, because that diuers partakers in the conspiracie were there, and did disquiet the peace of the Countrey, and that theie was well assured vnlesse the authoritie of some of them were abated, the Realme would ere long be greatly endangered. Mocenigo being moued by these Letters, left Rhodes, and within a while after arriued in Cyprus.

The conspirators flee from Cyprus.

This Island is seated vpon fundry seas: on the West side it is watered with the sea of Pamphilia, towards the South with that of Egypt, towards the East with the Syrian, and on the North with that of Cilicia. It was in old time called Achamante.

The description of the Isle of Cyprus.

Philonides

Philonides saith, That it was tearmed Cerasa : Xenagoras, Aspelia, Amathusa, and Machare : Asimones, Chritona and Colinnia. There were in it in former times fifteene goodly Cities, but at this day there are very few. Tymolenes writes, That it is in circuit foure hundred and nine and twentie thousand paces, and Isidorus mentioneth but three hundred seuentie five thousand : and in length from the East to the West, betwixt the Promontories of Dinaretta and Achamante, Artemidorus saith, an hundred sixtie two thousand, and Timotheus two hundred thousand. Damastus was decciued to take the length thereof from the North to the South. Cyprus is inferior to none other Island whatsoeuer : it aboundeth in wine and oyle, it hath corne sufficient, it produceth metalls, and diuers other necessaries ; in which respect it is no lesse frequented by marchants, than for those other commodities which they transport to Syria.

The Venetian after his arriual landed all his troops at Famagosta, and embattailed them, as if he intended to haue mustered them in S. Nicholas market-place, beneath the Royall Palace, in the sight of the Queene and the Cypriots, who were greatly terrified therewith. His musters being ended, he did on a suddaine dismishe the Gallies which went for traffique, and all the rest likewise which he had brought from the neighbour Islands, together with all the Cauallerie: he onely retained with him the Candiott Archers, and the old Armie. Then he mand the forts with natural Venetians. He did afterwards make a diligent enquire of Cornares death, and those that were attainted and conuicted of the crime, he punished with death, and banished such as were suspected of it. Those who in that commotion had continued loyall, were recompenced with the conspirators goods. The affaires of Cyprus being thus quieted, he receiued letters from Prince Marcello, and a Decree from the Senate, whereby he was made Gouvernour of Cyprus: where although he had carefully prouided for whatsoeuer was necessarie for the peace of the Island, and that all matters there were quiet, the publike Decree did neuerthelesse enforce him to remaine there for the defence of the Island.

In the meane time Giacomo Marcello, Prouidator to the new Generall, arriued in the Prouince, vnto whom at his coming into Cyprus Mocenigo surrendered tenne Gallies, that with them he might defend the Islands of the Egean sea, till Triadan arriual: but being certified by letters, that Triadan was come into Greece, and perceiving the Realme of Cyprus to be quiet, leauing Souwanza the Prouidator (who likewise by the Senates Decree was appointed to commaund the foot forces in the Island) with tenne Gallies for the defence of the Kingdome, he tooke leaue of the Queene, and entreated her to feare nothing, telling her, that the Venetian forces should be euer readie for the preservation of her State. She gaue him a Target curiously wrought, and a purple banner in consideration of his braue exploits; then departing from the Island with the rest of the Fleet, he went first to Rhodes, from thence to Candie, and lastly to Modon. Thither newes was brought him, how that the enemy with great forces lay before the Citie of Scutari.

This Citie standeth in that part of Dalmatia, which being possessed by the Epitots, was by the modernes tearmed Albania by a particular name : it is seated on an hanging hill, and in some places the access to it is very difficult. On the West side is a lake, in circuit fourescore thousand paces, though Authors make no mention of it. The inhabitants call it the lake of Scutari, out of which issueth a nauigable Riuer called Boyano. Plinie saith, That in former time the Riuer Drina did runne on the East side thereof, very neere to the Citie walls, where at this day the ruines of the bridge are to be seene : now the Riuer changing her course, it runnes neere to the Island, and deliuereth it selfe by two channels to the sea, ten myles from Boyano. The champaine country, which lieth betwixt these two Riuers, and the fields neere adioyning, are so fruitfull, as seed being cast vpon the ground without any tillage, giue a wonderfull increase; and they are enforced to driue their cattell forth of the pastures, for feare they should ouerfeed themselves. Alongst the sea coast are goodly woods, wherewith they build shippes.

Ottoman, who aspired to the Empire of Italie, being allured by these commodities, resolved to attempt Scutari, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, hoping by taking thereof, with ease to become master of the rest : he committed the charge of the siege to Saliman the Eunuch, whom he made Gouvernour of the Prouinces of Europe in his stead, who the year before was slaine in the Perian warre. And besides his other forces, he gaue him eight thousand Ianizaries of his ownguard, with an hundred Canoniers. He, hauing assembled great forces forth of all Prouinces subiect to Mahomet, had fourescore thousand men in his armie. The Citie being besieged, he made a bridge ouer the riuer Boyano, the guard wherof he committed to Alibeg, with his fierce troopes of Tribulls. Then he caused foure peeces of ordnance of a wonderfull bignesse to be planted neere the walls, to make a breach: the munition belonging to those peeces did load foure hundred Camels: Hee did besides cause twelue other smaller peeces to be planted to batter the houses of the towne. So soone as Mocenigo had intelligence of the siege of Scutari, he went to Corfu, where he receiued letters from the Prince, and a commandement from the Senate, to be careful of the defence of Scutari, and of the sea-coast of Albania. Therefore he presently passed ouer into the firm land, where at the mouth of the Boyano he met with Triadin Gritti his successor, and Ledouiso Bembo the Prouidator. Then, although he might haue commaunded alone, yet being in no fort ambitious, he resolved to doe nothing without their common consent. First of all then they sent Leonardo Bolda with foure Gallies to Catharra, and commaunded him to goe to Iohn Cernouch, who commaunded the Sclauonians, neighbours to the Lake, and to entreat him from them, that he would (as became a faithfull associate) leaue forces from all parts, in some sort to relieue Scutari, if it were possible: That Leonardo selfe, with his vessels appointed for that purpose, should together with Cernouch vse meanes to put some supplies into the towne by water. They did afterwards send five Gallies by the Riuer Drinon for the guard of the Island. The Citie is seated on a plaine, and is in no fort strong by Art or Nature. The riuer Drinon falling by two channells into the sea makes an Island, whither all the Country people of that Prouince which dwelt in the Villages were retired with their wiues and children vpon the enemies coming.

Now for the defence of this Island, the Venetian Generalls sent diuers armed vessels beside the Gallies. They did moreover assure Durazzo, with foure gallies, and certaine troupes of Albanian horse.

This cittie was in former time called Epidamnum, by the Founders name : his Nephew sonne to his daughter, added the Hauen to the Cittie, and would haue it to be called Dirrachium after his owne name. He lost his sonne Ionius in the war against his bretheren vnder the conduct of Hercules, who slew him by misfortune, and threw him into the neighbour Sea, of whom it afterward took the name. This is the opinion of the Greeke Authors. The Latines do not reckon the place to be of such antiquity, and affirme that the Romans named it Dyrrachium, in sted of Epidamnum, because that name seemed to preface some misfortune to such as went thither. It was in old time a very famous cittie, and much renowned during the ciuill warres of the Romans. For Pompey in that place made all his warrelike preparations against Cesar; but it is now desolate and vninhabited. The Venetians kept it for the commodiousnesse of the haue. They did afterwards place garri- sons in Buda, Antuari, and Olchina, which in former times, according to Plinie, was called Colchina, founded by the Colchians, who pursuing Medea, entred into the Adriaticke sea and Ionian seas. Some Authors woorthie of credit affirme, That the Inhabitants of that place doe yet retain the barbarous crueltie of their Ancestours, and that among all the Inhabitants of that coast, they are most vnciuill to strangers.

Sergius Church in view of the Inhabitants. This place is five miles from Scutari, and foureene from the Sea. The Gallies could not saile vp the Riuer beyond the Church, by reason of the shallownesse of the water. From thence the fleet gaue signes of encouragement morning and euening to the Cittie, by making fires. The riuer Boyano diuides it selfe into two very narrow channels beneath the Temple Eschella eight miles from the Armie. The Turks went about to imbarce those freights with yron chaines and piles, to shut in the Venetian Gallies; which would haue mightily endangered the Venetians, had not a fugitiue giuen them notice thereof in time; whereat they being somewhat troubled, did foudainly saile in order of battell to seize vpon the mouth of the Riuer. The enimie vpon the gallies 10 arriuall being landed was encamped vpon the shoare in a close battallion. The fight being begunne, the Turks did extremely afflict the Venetians with their arrows, and they them with their ordnance; howbeit in the end the enemy was enforced to quit the place with the losse of fiftie hundred of his men.

The victorious Venetians hauing left foure gallies for the defence of the place, returned to their campe neere the Temple. Many that were present at this exploit affirme that this fight against the Turks at the entry of the riuer Boyano hapned vnder the conduct of Triadin before Mocenigo his arriuall. But whilst this was done vpon the Riuer, the Turks did continually with the cannon batter the city walls, and ouerthrew the houses. Antonio Lauretano, a valiant gentleman commanded 20 in the city, and was Prouidor in the Prouince, who, as one well aduised, was carefull of all matters, and so soone as hee saw the walls to be beaten downe, he did repaire them with a countermure.

The siege which beganne in the end of Maie, had continued many daies, when Lauretano sent a boy through the enemies campe to let the Venetian Generalls vnderstand, that though himselfe and fellowes were bold and resolute to endure a long siege, yet because the euents of warre are still vncertaine, they requested them to thinke vpon some meanes to relieue the City. Triadin and Mocenigo did their best to effect that which Lauretano craued, by the meanes of Leonardo Belda, and John Cernovich: who hauing leuiued foot companies and prepared a strong fleet vpon 30 the Lake (for the enimie had Garrisons in all places) comming to stroakes with the enemies, returned without performance. And by reason that the Countrey was couered with enemies; and the Riuer banks by which they were to passe to Scutari, were manned with Turks, they had neede of greater forces, and especially of horse, if they intended, maugre the enemies, to come to the cittie; whereupon the Generalls hoping that the situation of the place would defend the cittie, together with the Prouidators valour, and the townsmens confluence, they gaue ouer all further attempts for that time.

Triadin in the meane time, with Bembo the Prouidor, by reason of the fennish aire fell sicke; and not they alone, but the whole fleet in a manner languished. 40 They went to Catharra to recouer their health. Mocenigo (although hee were crazie) resolued, with Mariopietro the Prouidor, to tarrie till the end of the siege.

The Turke on the other side, the cittie walls being beaten downe, attempted sometimes by menaces, and afterwards by intreaties, to induce Lauretano to yeelde. But his answer was not forting to the Turkes expectation, he caused certaine engines to be brought neere to the walls, with which his souldiers being protected, might with more safetie approach the rampires. Afterwards hee commaunded his Ianifaries, who were armed with swords and targets to second them. Moreover, he caused great numbers of Archers to gall those that were on the wals. His battailions being thus ordered, he did by day-broke march to the assault. 50

Those of Scutarie likewise prepared for defence, they had great store of wild-fier, which at the assault they abundantly bestowed vpon the enemies. They had besides laide store of great stones vpon the Rampiers, and did much hurt with their Murtherers. The Turks with great cries according to their manner, enuironed the

Cittie,

Cittie, and attempted to enter at the breach. The besieged without any feare at all, did brauely repulse them with shot and wild-fier, which they could not escape, and the huge stones being throwne downe vpon them, made a great slaughter. But the Turks like brute beasts marching vpon the dead bodies, did fearelessly assault the Rampiers. Those of Scutarie on the contrarie, did beat them thence with pikes and shot. Lauretano in the meane time went vp and downe encouraging his souldiers, furnishing them with necessities, and planting fresh men in their steads that were hurt and wearied. Soliman on the other side was not idle, but with an yron mace did driue his slow souldiers forward to the assault. At the last, the Turks being 10 tyred and mastered by the defendants valour, retired. Those of Scutarie being accompanied with the souldiers of the garrison, made a furious salley vpon them in their retreat, and slew them on heaps vpon the dead bodies of their fellowes, and then being laden with the enemies spoiles, and militarie ensignes, they returned triumphant to the Cittie.

Cepio, who hath curiously written the occurrents of this warre, saith, that three thousand Turks were slaine at this assault, and the number of those that were hurt, did far exceed it: the greatest part of whom died soone after. Those of Scutarie say, that at the assaults, and other encounters during the siege, sixteene thousand Turks were slaine and perished.

All things succeeding prosperously at Scutarie, Mocenigo thought good to provide for his owne health. For it was reported, that Lodouico Bembo died at Catharra, and that Triadin drew towards his end. And fearing that the like might befall himselfe, he went to Ragusa to take physicke. Ragusa is a Cittie in Dalmatia, builded in times past by the Epidaures, in a more happie seat, hauing their owne Countrey by the Goaths formerly ruined. It is a free Cittie, and adorned with good lawes and customes. Whilst Mocenigo remained at Ragusa, Soliman still held Scutarie straitly besieged, and was fully resolued not to haue risen from before it, till he should constrain them to yeeld either by force or famine, had not the warlike preparations of Matthias king of Hungarie enforced his dislodgement. 30

The Venetians from the first time of their warre with Ottoman, had made a league with that martiall king, and had promised to giue him a yearly pension. Francisco Venieri was sent thither Ambassadour at the beginning, to procure him to make warre with the Turks: Gibuanmi Hemo followed him. During the time of his ambassage, he fought fortunately twice with Ali Bey vpon the frontiers of Hungaria: Francisco died, & Francisco Iustiniano succeeded Hemo. At the last the Senate, hauing intelligence of the siege of Scutarie, sent Sebastian Badoario to the king with a great summe of gold. At his arriuall, he obtained such interest in the King, not so much for his gold he brought with him, as for his good carriage and discretion, as procuring him presently to take Armes, he did in such sort afright Ottoman, as he 40 presently wrote to the Eunuch to raise his siege from before Scutarie, and to returne home. Badoario by the Senats appointment tarried with the king, and continued with him more than two yeares. During which time the Hungarian performed many notable exploits vpon the Turks: For besides fixe battails wherein he ouerthrew them, he tooke Subassa, a verie strong towne, from Ottoman, together with a thousand of his Ianifaries.

Besides, at that time when warre was denounced to Stephen the Vainode, and that the Turks had besieged Zuzan, a verie famous Cittie, so soone as hee vnderstood that the Hungarian was comming thither, he left his ordnance and baggage behind him, and basely fled from them: whereby it came to passe, that the Commonwealth 50 being supported by the protection of so great a Prince, did for a time receiue no losse by the enimie. In regard whereof, certaine Princes and Commonwealths of Italie, did at the Venetians pursute, send an hundred thousand Crownes to him into Hungarie, by the Bishop of Arieta and Antonio Vitturi, who succeeded Badoario.

Soliman being called home by Ottoman, did forthwith mount his Artillerie, S f and and raised his Campe, having besieged the Cittie almost three moneths, and marched into Macedonia. This report is more credible than that which saith, That he disamped for feare of the great preparations which were made against him in Italie. Those of Scutarie (of whom two thousand died in the siege) were reduced to such scarcitie of water, as the want thereof would haue enforced them to haue yielded, if he had maintained his siege but a while longer. Whereupon so soone as the enemy was dislodged, they ran with such earnestnesse to the riuer, and dranke so excellently of the water, which had a long time been kept from them, as many of them surted, and died sodainly. Mocenigo being aduertised of the enemies departure, and being not able to recouer his health at Ragusa, went to Venice. Within a while after, Triadin the Generall of the Armie, a man of foure score yeares, died at Catharra. Stefano Maripietro whom Mocenigo had left with the Fleet at St. Sergius Church, hauing after the siege commanded all the Captains of Gallies, soldiers, and mariners, who in a manner were all sicke, by reason of the feiny aire of the Boyano, to remoue to a wholsomer aire; himselfe being verie sicke also, retired to Venice.

The report of the enemies disamping being brought to Venice before Maripietro his arrival, they did highly reioice the whole Cittie, which whilest the siege lasted, had been greatly afflicted with care. All men extolled Laureano; and a decree was made, that the Commonwealth should send him presents. The Captains of the garrisons likewise were much esteemed, but especially the loyaltye of the Inhabitants, and their constancie in defending their Cittie, and rewards were appointed for either of them: Then they went to Church to giue thanks to God, for that the Commonwealth had been freed from so dangerous a warre. Great Rewards were likewise giuen to Mocenigo, who after the death of Prince Marcello, which deceased about the beginning of Winter, was by the generall consent of the whole Senat declared Prince. Marcello gouerned one yeare and three monthes; and was honorably buried in the Chartreux.

Ntonio Laureano, who for that he had brauelie defended Scutarie, was made Generall of the Gallies, did about the Spring time of the same yeare, tooke a Geneuois Argozie betwixt Cyprus and Sicilia, laden with rich Turkish marchandize, and funke it: sixteene Gallies had fought with her, and could not take it, till Georgio Dragone arrived ued with a Venetian Argozie, and then it yeilded, her mait being struck ouer boord with a Cannon shot.

Not long after, Seiyman who the yeere before had besieged Scutari, did with thirtie thousand Turkes besiege the cittie of Naupactum, called at this day Lepanto, seated on the Corinthian Gulph, and in times past amongst the citties of Aetolia, next to Calidonia, verie famous, but at this day it is not much inhabited, and her walls are in a manner ruined. Towards the North on the toppe of an hill it hath a castle: This fort was valiantly defended, as well by reason of the trenches and rampires, as by the magnanimitie of those within it: For Laureano came thither with a mighty fleet before the Turkes arrived. The enemies on all sides made a great batterie. The souldiers of the Armie and five hundred horse that were in the Tower, did not onely defend the Rampires, but did make daily incursions vpon the enemies as occasion was offered: this siege continued foure monthes. But the enemy being out of hope to take it, (for besides the strong garrison within it, the Venetian fleet lay in the Haven, which did abundantly furnish the besieged with victuals men, and munition) and tyred with that warre, raised his campe.

This is all which the enemy attempted by land that Summer. But at Sea Ottomans fleet after it departed from Lepanto, went to the Isle of Lemnos, where, hauing besieged the cittie of Coccina, and with their ordnance beaten downe a great part of the walls, the enemy vndoubtedly would haue taken it, had not Laureano come in time to the reliefe of the besieged, who so soone as he had intelligence that the enemy had besieged Lemnos, left the Prouidator with foure Gallies at Lepanto, and sailed with the rest of the fleet to Psara a desert Island very neere to Lemnos. He durst not on a sodaine assaile the enemy, by reason that his souldiers were in a manner all sicke. But the enemy interpreting his delay in an other sence, as though the Venetian tarried there, but till all things were in readines for the battel, did put to Sea, and sailed thence. Then did Laureano go to the Island. The Inhabitants and souldiers of the garrison were highly commended.

It is reported, that a young Maide of the Island was presented to him that had fought valiantly, and by whose meanes (as it was reported) the city had beene chiefly defended. This Maide whose name was Muralla, her father being slaine fighting valiantly at the Coccine Gate, ranne to him and tooke vp his sword and target, where alone she withstoode for a time the Turkes assault, who had almost made themselves Masters of the Gate, and then being assisted by her Countrymen, they repulsed the enemy with great slaughter to their shippes: in regard whereof the Generall gaue her double pay, and the Prouidators with all the Captaines of the Gallies gaue her crowne apiece: The Generall bid her make choice among all those braue Captaines which shee would haue to be her husband, and promised her that the common-wealth should giue her a dowry. She gaue him many thanks, and answered, That for her part she did not altogether respect the valour of a man but his wisdom and discretion; and that the would neuer marrie before shee had exactly knowne the disposition of him that should be her husband. By this Maidens discretion and vertue (if it be lawfull to iudge of the rest) I do affirm that the women of Lemnos do not at this day degenerate either in fortitude or valour from that excellent Hippophile of old times, and from the rest, who with her did command that Island, and that the common Proverb is most true, How that the fortune of places is very often changed, but not the manners and behaviour of the Inhabitants.

This is all that was done by land and sea during that Summer; after which the Armies went to Garrison. About the Spring time of the yeere following, vpon a rumour that was spred, how that King Ferdinand determined to inuade the Isle of Cyprus: John, of the illustrious familie of the Georgies was sent thither with five gallies, and many shippes of burthen, but this report being found to be idle, vanished. Laureano in the meane time tooke speciall care for the defence of the sea-coasts of Morca with the Isles neere adiacent. We do not find that the same Summer or the next that insued it, till peace was made with the Turke, which hapned foure yeres after, any memorable matter was done in the Islands. Prince Mocenigo, the second moneth of his gouernement died, and was buried in the Church of the T'winnes, where at this day his sumptuous monument is to be seene, enriched with the spoils of Asia. Andrea Vendramino was chosen in his place.

THE Summer following, which was the third after the siege of Scutari, Croia in Albania was besieged by the Turke. Eight thousand of them besieged it at the Spring time, and continued there all that yeere and more: this city is seated on an high mountaine which the inhabitants call Croiana, and there are deeper Precipices roundabout it, wherby for a time all the enemies attempts were in vaine, and longer would haue bene vnprofitable, had not famine afflicted them.

The first Summer of the siege was already spent, and a great part of the Autumne, when two thousand Venetians came into the Island, to relieue the afflicted Croians: Among these were five hundred light-horfe commaunded by Nicolas Ducan the Albanese, a man famous among his Countrymen. The Captaines of the Italian Caualtery were Antonioatio Dotia, and Lodouico Tisernato: Leon of Dalmatia, and Carlo commaunded the chiefe troups of foote. These men on the sixt of December marched in a square battallion against the Turkes, who were encamped in a plaine which the Inhabitants call Tyranna foure miles from Croia. Being come to strokes, the enemy presuming on the swiftnesse of his horfe, made an attempt to disorder the Venetian Armie. The Venetian footemen on the contrary fighting at times vpon occasion forth of their rankes, after that they had repulsed the enemy with losse, retired into the close battallion of their horsemen, fearing to be cut off from their troups. The fight had continued from the sixt houre of the day till Euening when on a sodaine the Turkes turned their backs, and betooke themselves as vanquished to open flight. The victorious Venetians pursued them to their very campe, the which being taken, and full of riches, the Venetian fell to pillage, verie few pursuing the victory. Those of the city presently sallied forth and tooke two forts which the enemies had built not far from the city, which they presently razed.

But

But the ioy for this victorie continued not long: For whilest that Contareni the Prouidator, and the other Captaines were consulting, whether it were best to remaine that night in the enemies campe, or to returne backe to their quarter, the enemies returned with great cries vpon the Venetians, & presently enuironed those of the formost rankes. Then a cruell fight began. The Albanese caualterie, so soone as it perceived the foot troups to be enclosed, fled. The Italian caualterie did the like. The Turkes by reason it was Moonlight, chased & slew them vp and down the plaine, and followed the execution as far as the riuer Lamissa. The enemy that day and the night following made a great slaughter, but the trechery of the Albaneses did them more hurt, who to the number of eight thousand horse stood all day long in order of battaile and stirred not, as spectators of the fight: And when they perceived the Venetians to haue the worst, they likewise fell vpon them in the wood, and along the riuers side, in as vile manner as the Turkes. More then a thousand Venetians were slaine in that fight, & among them Francisco Contareni the Prouidator with diuerse Captaines. The bickering was no lesse bloudie to the enemies: for so long as the Venetians battallion stood firme and vnbroken, they flew great numbers of them.

The newes of this losse was grieuous to the Citie, but that which they withint a while after receiued in Italie, did much more assist them. The Venetians after the first incursions of the Turkes into Italie had stopt vp with strong Rampiers and Causesall places that were soordable betwixt the bridge Gorician and the marshes of Aquileia (the riuer Lizenza excepted) and builded a Fort vpon the ancient banke of the riuer not farre from the new channell. They had employed thousands of Pioners in this worke, who were commaunded by Citadino Fratrinus a famous Ingeneere. And they did not onely make Rampiers, but likewise neere to the marshes, where the woods were verie thicke, they cut downe diuers great trees, binding them so fast together as they could not be separated, and there left them, and on the champaigne they laid earthen turfs of seuen foot broad all along, and in them they did set branches of willow, and other small trees apt to take root, then vpon them they laid other rankes of turfs, so as thereby the fortification was drawne forth to the vertie end towards those places, by which the enemies were wont to passe: this fortification being made with small towers and bartlements, did a farre off shew like a towne. And where the riuer might easily beforded, they built two Fortes enuironed with strong Rampiers and deepe Trenches, the one named Gradiscan, and the other Foglian, by the names of the two townes that are on either side of them. This last after the ouerthrow giuen vpon the Riuer bankes was abandoned as a desert place, but the other is till this day kept by a strong Garrison, and for the most part is enclosed with walles, and by meanes of Francisco Trono sent thither to that end is reduced into the forme of a strong towne. This worke was in length more than an hundred furlongs. But these fortifications are almost ruined, and especially where the matter was but sand, which the continual raines haue easily washed away. There was besides, a little mount in forme of a Castle, neere to the bridge ouer the riuer hard by Goricia, & at first certaine foote companies were sent thither to guard it. Then they built two Castles within a mile of each other fortified with strong Rampiers, and in it three thousand horse, with certaine foot companies, but the infanterie was not proportionable to the horse. By these meanes the soordsand passages which before lay open to the enemy, were now stopt vp, by Rampiers which could not be forced, which being strongly garrisoned, kept out the enemy that way from entring into Italie, so as the Commonwealth thereby was freed from all danger and feare.

But by how much their securitie seemed great, by so much more was the Province afflicted with a terrible ouerthrow. For at such time as they least doubted of the enemies arriual, they perceived them on a sodaine to lie encamped with great forces vpon the farther side of the riuer Lizenza. Those which were in the Armie, doe not consent about their number, for some affirme them to be tenne thousand, others make the number greater, and other-somelesse. There was a great clamour in the two Forts when they first descried them, and presently the alarme was given, and had not night prevented them, the fight would haue begun on both sides. The Venetian troupes that were in the two Forts kept watch all night long, the horsemen were commanded to let their horse stand bridled, and themselves to be readie armed. Jerónimo Nouello was their Capitaine, a man from his youth bred vp in the warres, and had beene employed with great command. There were likewise diuers noble persons, as Giovanni Antonio Gaudolsca, with his sonne Anastasio of Romagna, Hercole Maluccia, Giacomo Piccino sonne to that great Capitaine Piccino, Giacomo Badoario, Philippo Nesalone, Georgio Galefia, Giovanni Clericato of Vincenza, with diuers others that held an honourable ranke in the Armie. They consulted together that night, whether it were best to fight with the enimie, or onely to defend their owne Forts. For it was likely that those Forts being defended the enimie durst not go farre forward, for feare least all meanes of returne should be taken from him: yet at last they made a more valiant than a discreet resolution, which was to oppose themselves against the enemies which way soeuer they should passe. They divided their Cauallerie into three troupes, and ouer euerie troupe appointed a Capitaine.

the Fort neere the

But the Turke in the meane time intending to vse policie as well as force, coming to the opposit shoure did about sun-set come vp and downe with his horse: 20 men, and at last without any difficultie seized on the Fort neere to the bridge, some of the souldiers retired to the bridge, resolving to breake both the ends, and to defend themselves in the middelt; but being on a sodaine overwhelmed with great showers of darts and arrows, they were beaten into the riuer. This place was foure miles from the campe, so that they had no newes of the taking of the Fort till it was late in the night, and then they hardly beleeued it. Marbeg (for so was the Turkish General named) hauing taken the bridge, did send vp and downe to discouer some fit place for an ambuscado, and finding one not farre from thence, he commanded a thousand choice horse, to passe ouer the riuer about midnight at a Ford, and to lie in ambush till a signal were giuen them to breake out, then to fall on a for- 30 daine vpon the enemies.

So soone as it was day, the Turke caused a troupe of horse to crosse the riuer, and commanded them to goe as farre as the enemies campe, and to gallop euen to their gates to draw them forth to fight, and then to retire by little and little to the place of ambuscado. But by the way they encountred Jerónimo, and the rest of the Cauallerie which followed him in order of battaile. At first they fought valiantly on both sides, but the Turkes at last did of set purpose giue backe, the Christians pursuing them. Jerónimo his sonne a couragious young man made a fiercer pursuit than any of the rest, and was seconded by a troupe of young gallants who were as forward as himselfe. The policie old man was displeased with their rashnesse, 40 saying that he was certaine that the Turkes would not so easily flie, but vpon some speciall aduantage. And because they were almost come betwixt two freights, which were much to be suspected, Nouello founded the retreat. Then the Turks returning to charge, renewed a fierce fight. Jerónimo sent for the first Squadron to come to his reskew. For from the other side of the riuer a companie of men at Armes were already coming to the aide of their fellowes.

In the meane time a great Squadron of Turks had gotten vp on the neere bankes of the riuer, where the fight being renewed, the Turks were repulsed as far as Graman (a little streame running a thwart the vallies Pergotanes.) But whilst the Venetians were wholly busied in the victorie the signal being giuen to the Ambuscado 50 from the top of the mount Licinia which was on their left hand, the Turkish troupes brake forth, and with fearfull cries fell vpon the Venetians, who were so terrified with the enemies sodaine eruption, as one would not haue taken them for those Venetians that euen now fought so valiantly: Neuerthelesse, perceiving that the the hope of their liues consisted onely in their Armes, they were inforced somewhat to giue backe, that they might fight more at large. But vpon a sodaine, the Turkes gaue them so furious a charge, as being beaten backe into a streight place, they could not haue roome. In the meane time the cruell enemy assailed them in front and in flanke, and made an horrible slaughter of them, so that the first band was in a moment cut in peeces by the enemies great numbers, and were all slaine, 10 leaving a few men of note, who yielded to the enimie.

The venetians
are distressed by the Turke.

The Captaine of the second Squadron perceiving their fellowes to be inclosed by the enemies, gaue backe by little and little towards the Plaine, but in such amazement, as those in the rereward supposed it rather a flight than retraite. With- 20 in a while, they all beganne in disorder and without Ensignes or Captaine to flie as vanquished into the thickets of the neighbour-forrests, the Turkes still pursuing them. Some leaving their horse and armour behind them, escaped into the Mountaines. In this battell died Jerónimo Generall of the Cauallerie his sonne, Giacomo Badoario, Anastasio of Romagna, and many other noble persons: most of the rest were taken.

The Turkes likewise bought this victorie at a deere rate: Marbeg their Generall was grievously wounded, and great numbers of souldiers slaine, who being heaped vp all together, were by his commandement burnt.

The news of this ouerthrow did much terrifie the whole Country, for the people thought themselves scarce safe euen in their walled cities. The next day about noone a great smoake was seene in the aire in many places neere to Vdina, whereby they knew that the enimie was not farre off, and in an instant, all the firme houses betwixt the Riuer Lizonza and Taillement were seene to burne. It was a lamentable sight to behold so goodly a Countrey filled with cloudes of smoake; but 30 most of all, when the night following the whole territorie neere adioyning was on fire. The Turkes spoiled and waited all places the same night, and by day-broke, vniuing themselves, returned merrily home to their campe beyond the riuer Lizonza laden with bootie, and store of prisoners.

The Turkes burne

Friuli.

The next day they marched with their Ensignes into the field, a dayes iourney from the Riuer, making shew to depart, but with greater furie than before, they came and incamped on the bankes of Taillement, and crossing the Riuer, they set fire on all places, carrying away more prisoners, and doing more hurt to the poore inhabitants than at the former time: And vpon report that the Venetian forces were coming against them by land and Sea. Marbeg raised his campe, and left Iralie. This ouerthrow at Lizonza terrified all men, and affrighted the famous Cittie of Verona. At Venice the fire of the Countrey houses which burnt by night, being seene from the highest Turrets of the City, did much amaze the inhabitants. Many said; That it was a great dishonor to the Seigniorie, to see the pleasantest coun- 40 trey of the Venetian Territorie, burnt and waited before their faces by a barbarous enimie.

This caused them presently to dispatch certaine armed vessells along the Seacoast, and certaine troupes of horse and foote through the firme land. But they arrived in Friuli, when the enimie was gone. The two Fortes were for a time without Garrison, and some were of opinion to haue them razed. The Senate sent certaine Gentlemen thither to view the state of the Prouince: Dominico Giorgio, who in that iourney died at Vdina, was sent thither with Zacharia Barbaro, Giovanni Heme, and Candiano Bellano to take order for that which should be expedient for the Com- 50 mon-wealth, and either to raze them both, or else repaire and fortifie them. And for safe withstanding the enemies incursions it was concluded, at the least to place a strong garrison of horsemen in one of them. Carolo Montano who the yeare before had beene called, was called from Tufcanie, and sent into the Prouince: he placed a strong Garrison in the Fort of Gradiscan, and fortified it with dikes and Rampires. But whilst hee continued his workes, Prince Vendramino died, the second year of his Principallitie beeing scarce expired. Hee was honourably buried in the Church of the Seruians.

Giovanni Mocenigo brother to Prince Pietro, a man of singular wisdom and iudgement, was by generall consent declared Prince. Such successe had the Venetian affaires in Italie, whilst in Dalmatia the siege of Croia without any intermission lasted one whole yeere.

Ottoman not satisfied heerewith did on the fifth day of Iune with greater forces than foure yeares before come and besiege Scutari. At his arriuall those of Croia oppressed with famine, and terrified with the fearefull report of the Turkes arriuall yeelded. Alibeg a little before his comming had with 15000. men beguirt Scutari: Foure daies after Solyman came thither, and incamped on the east side of it with threecore and tenne thousand men: The Gouvernour of Asia followed him with a power not much inferiour, and lodged on the south side. Last of all, the great Turke himselfe came thither in person on the fifteenth day of Iune. Those which were present at this siege, say, That the enemies multitude was such, as on the Mountaines, Plaines, and on all sides of the City as farre as mans sight could discern, there was nothing to be seene but Tents and Pauillions: The Ordnance was forth with planted to batter the walls. In the Citie there were fixteene hundred inhabitants, and two hundred and fiftie women. They had before the enemies arriuall rid the towne of all vnprofitable eaters. Moreover, there were fixe hundred mercenarie souldiers in it vnder the command of Carliuo, Antonio Cortene, Francisco Sanferobar, Micale Spalatino, and other braue Captaines; Antonio Legiero was Gouvernour and Prouidator of the citie.

This small handfull of men was in Scutari when it was the second time besieged by so great a multitude. The Defendants did cheerefully receiue the enemies, for they were now better provided of all necessaries for a siege than at first. A breach being made, the Turkes gaue two assaults. Both Christians and Turkes vsed the selfe same Armes and Engines as at the formertime. But by how much the preparation for warre was greater than at the first siege, by so much more great was the slaughter on both sides: And the assaults were much more furious by reason of the Emperours presence, than at the beginning vnder the conduct of Solyman. Those of Scutari were twice assaulted in a short space, and in both, the retreit was made with great great slaughter. The enemies shot such store of arrowes, as some worthie of credit report, That a dogge being frightened with the great noise, ranne home to his masters house with the leuen arrowes sticking in his hinder parts.

And because the Reader shall not thinke this to be a ridiculous report, all writers affirme, that for many monethes whilst the siege lasted after the great Turkes departure, the inhabitants vsed no other wood to heat their Ovens, nor to dresse them meat, but fagots made of Turkish arrowes. They write beside, that in the hottest assaults at such time as nothing was heard, but terrible reports of the Canon imitating thunder, and that a thousand sundrie kinds of death were presented to mens view, the inhabitants and souldiers of Scutari fought with such animositie and resolution, as nothing did lesse terrifie them than the hazard of their liues: so soone as one troupe of enemies were ouerthrowne, others presently marched to the assault on the dead bodies, and others after them. The dikes were filled with dead carcasses so were the hollow places of the mountaines, and though multitudes were slaine, others steeped in their blood. Those in the Citie likewise, contemning death & wounds though they saw their fellowes torne in peeces by the Ordnance, did not for all that cease valiantly to repell and beat backe the enemies from the Rampiers.

In the end Mahomet his wilfulnesse being overcome, and diuers telling him that it was in vaine to hazard so many thousand braue men to such manifest dangers, & that he had to do with enemies who rather resolved to die than yeeld, he al enraged founded the retreat, & after wards gaue no more assaults, yet still continued his batterrie.

But whilst he freightly besieged the Scutarians, he forgot not Italy. For he sent forces to those places, whither, hee thought the Venetians would send least aid, who arriued in Italie the same day as the first assault was giuen to Scutari. They encamped with great noise not farre from the Ports of Lizonza, where embattailing themselves, they sought to draw forth Carolo Montano to fight. But he, remembering the late overthrow, durst attempt nothing rashly, but containing his souldiers within the enclosure of his Fort, he kept the Turkes in expectation more than halfe a day. But they perceiuing that they could not draw the Venetians to fight, went from thence, and encamped within foure miles of the Fort Gradiscan, betwixt the mount Medea and Cremona. But the next day he left Masan, and marched through the deepe bottome directly to the foote of the mountaines. They were in number 30000. who went into Germanie through the precipices of those steepe hills which are in a manner in-accessible to the inhabitants of the country. In passing those mountaines, they performed matters scarce credible, and among others I thought good to set downe this one. Being come to the top of those craggie hills which were impossible to be defended by horse, they tied them with cords, and by engines and deuises which they made, did let them downe into the next bottomes, and from thence into the rest, till they were come downe into the lowest of all. What did they not to get out the top of the Alpes downe to the foote of the mountaine Carnana: where hauing intelligence that the mount Lanca, ouer which they were to passe into Germanie, was guarded by the inhabitants of the Alpes, being come thither, neither that danger, nor difficultie to ascend to it, could in any sort amaze them: who leaning on their targets crept vp those steepis rocks and despite of their enemies; wherewith they that guarded the passages being afrighted, betooke themselves to flight, and thereby goue occasion to the Turkes to commit great slaughter.

This was the last journey which the Turkes made into Italy against the Venetians. But in the meane time Mahomet still continued the siege of Scutari, battering it continually with his Ordnance: whereupon it lasted till the fifth of September, at which time the Gouvernour of Asia tooke Drina by force, from whence he carried away fise hundred of the inhabitants, and bringing them in view of the Scutarians did cut them all in peeces.

Foure daies after, Ottoman being wearied with so long a siege, went from thence with

with the greatest part of his forces: The same day he departed from Scutarie he tooke Lissa on the banks of the riuer Drimon, with two Venetian Gallies, wherein finding two hundred rowers and mariners, he sent them to Narbeg, (who with eight thousand Turks continued the siege) to be massacred before Scutarie. This siege lasted eight moneths after, and two forts were built at the mouth of the Boy, and with strong Garrisons in them, to keepe all reliefe from the Citie.

In the meane time the Venetian Secretarie began to treat with the enimie concerning peace, which was graunted and concluded about the latter end of Winter, on these conditions: That the Venetian should giue ouer Scutarie to Ottoman, (with libertie to the Garrison and inhabitants to depart whether they pleased) together with Tenarus a Promontorie in Laconia, with the Isle of Lemnos; and should pay him yearly 8000. crownes; and that the Venetian Marchants might freely trafficke on the Pontick seas. Peace being entertained on these conditions, the soldiers, and all the inhabitants came forth of Scutarie, and in regard of their ancient affection to the Venetians, they rather chose to be banished from their Countrey, than to undergoe the yoke of a barbarous enimie.

The Citie was yeelded according to the agreement vpon the fourth day of Aprill. Of 1600. men which guarded the Citie, there suruiued onely four hundred and fiftie: and of women there remained but one hundred, who followed their husbands through the enemies Campe, and accompanied them in their journey.

As many of the Scutarians as came to Venice, some of them receiued yearly pensions from the publike Treasurie, others were rewarded with governments of Townes and Castles, according to euery mans former estate and condition, so as the Commonwealth suffered none of them to be vn satisfied; some write that the like was done to those which escaped from Nigrepont.

Peace being published, did not so much reioice the Venetians tyred with long warre, as it did feare and terrifie other people and Princes of Italie; and not without cause: For it was likely, that the Venetians being at rest, the Turke would make some attempts on other parts of Italie, whereto he was already become too neere a neighbour, so as from the Hauen which he had newly gotten, he might easily see it: and indeed it so fell out afterwards. But of this we will speake after the siege of Ottranto.

In the meane time, the Venetians were like to haue incurred new troubles. For the Summer after the peace, a mightie Turkish flete sailed into the Ionian seas against the Lords of Cephalonia. This Island is opposite to Natolia: from whence the Lords being expelled, Ottoman became master thereof. Pietro Brailio was at Xant with five hundred braue horse of Morea, who not long before had taken it from the Lords of Cephalonia, and till then held it. So soone as the Turkish flete came thither, as to an Island which belonged to the Cephalonian Princes, Loretano, who was still Generall of the Venetian nauall Armie, did presently follow them; saying, That he would neuer suffer that Island to be besieged, so long as the horsemen of Morea remained there. He did afterwards tell the Generall, that he ought not, contrarie to the treatie of peace, assaile the horsemen being Venetians. Both of them wrote to Constantinople; the Turke to his Lord and master; and Loretano to Benedetto Treuisano Ambassador at the same time at the great Lords Port. He hauing informed the great Turke of the businesse, did freely obtaine from him, That it should be lawfull for the Venetians, not onely to draw all their horsemen forth of the Island, but as many others as would willingly depart thence. By this means the Venetians conueied many thousands forth of the Island, who otherwise would haue been made slaues; and being conducted into Morea, went freely whither they pleased to inhabite. The Turke after the taking of Xant, retired to Constantinople. These were the exploits done at Sea.

In Italie the Venetians, before the warre with Ottoman was ended, had taken

armes (as at other times) to defende the Florentines libertie. It fell out that the yeare before, Juliano de Medicis was by a conspiracie slaine at diuine seruice in St Liberatos Church; and his brother Lorenzo like to haue been murdered with him, but that by his owne valour and aide of his friends, he escaped. The Florentines being affrighted with the death of so eminent a person, tooke armes, and slew many that had an hand in this murder; imprisoned Pope Sixtus nephew, who then was at Florence, and did publicly hang Saluato Archbishop of Pisa, authour of the conspiracie, with diuers others, who came to Florence to accompanie either of them.

The Pope, incensed with the Florentines rigorous proceedings, hauing first interdicted and excommunicated them, raised an Armie: himselfe being first combined with King Ferdinand and the Sienois. The yeare before this murder committed, a mightie Armie was sent into Tuscanie. Frederick of Vrbin was made Generall, but the whole honor was attributed to Alphonso Duke of Calabria, sonne to Ferdinand; a sworn enimie to the Florentines, one, who from his great grandfather did mortally hate them. He was accompanied by Viso el Conte, Roberto Visigo, and Virginio his nephew, sonne to his brother Neapolo, Mathew of Champane, and Roberto d'Armini; but this last being afterwards entertained by the Florentines, was created Generall of their Armie.

The Florentines relying on their owne forces, and those of their associates, (for the Venetians, the Milanois, Hertules d'Este, and Frederick Gonzaga, were leagued with them) did brauely entertaine the warre: But the Venetians being still-bulied with Ottoman, both by land and sea, euen in the verie confines of Italie; being likewise daunted with the troubles of Milan arising by Duke Galeas death (who the yeare before was slaine in St Stephens Church by Giouanni Lamponiano and his complices at the time of diuine seruice) could not so soone send aide to the Florentines. But as well the one as other, struing to doe their utmost, sent forces to them; though vnequal to the greatnesse of both Commonweales, yet at least such as the qualitie of those times permitted. The Venetians sent Francois de Miceli to the armie as Provisioner during that warre.

Not long before they had sent Bernardo Bembo to Florence, who for the space of two yeares that the warre continued in Tuscanie, did good seruice to the associates: The Enimie in the meane time being backt by a mightie Armie, tooke Renze, Castellina, Rada, Broia, Caciiane, and mount Sabina in the Imbrin valley from the Florentines: And then, because Winter approached, they went to garrison in the Sienois territories. But the Venetians perceiuing some likelihood, that the enemies would the next Spring inuade the Florentines with greater furie, and hauing intelligence that Ottoman by letters and great promises from some Christian Princes was solicited to doe the like to them, they were moued by this common danger; and therefore first laboured about the end of Winter (as hath been already said) to free themselves from that warre.

The Spring following they sent Carolo Montone into Tuscanie with a braue Cavalerie: who falling sicke presently after his arriuall died at Cortona. He had five and thirtie Cornets of horse, and with them he crossed the lake Pergia, making furious incursions vpon the frontiers of the Perusins, where he took certaine Townes of small importance. Those of Perugia, who at the arriuall of the Venetian were thought to haue an intent to raise some insurrection in the Citie, in regard of the ancient controuersies betwixt themselves, being aduertised of his death, durst not rise against the Pope, notwithstanding that his sonne Bernardino el Conte reuiued his fathers practices. By this time halfe summer was spent, when as Robert with equal number of horse fought with Mattheo Campana Gouvernour of Rome, and Nephew to Pope Sixtus, on mount Sperella, in a small village: where, for two houres space was a fierce fight. But the enemies first Squadron being broken which came forth of the trenches, the rest terrified with the rout of their fellows betooke themselves to flight, and left a notable victorie to Robert, who became came Master of their horse and baggage. After this expedition he retired in safety, fearing least Alphonso upon newes of this defeat should with greater forces come and assaile him. Certaine lakes runne from Arezzo betwixt the Sienois and Perusian territories falling into the river Pales, and afterwards empty themselves altogether into Tyber: the Tuscans call them Chane. Two bridges cross these waters, the one at Clusina, which the enemies made good; and the other did Malatesta fortifie: these rivers ranne betwixt the two Armies. Whilest the Aragonian was coming to the bridge of Clusina, Roberto and his souldiers made a safer returne, and from their quarter wasted the Sienois territories: And if the Duke came to rescue the Sienois, Malatesta made incursions into the Perusian country: And in these idle and vnprofitable iournies was the greatest part of Summer spent without any other memorable action.

In the end about mid-haruest, Fredericke of Vrbino, and Alphonso had intelligence that the Florentine troupes at Podia Imperiale were much diminished, by means of a controuersie betwixt the souldiers of Aste and Gonzaga. For Hercules d'Aste not long before in a mutinie betweene the Regiments was like to haue bene slaine, whereupon he left the Armie and returned home; the Mantuan went to Milan, from whence Roberto Sanseverino was at the same time expulsed, because that he with his complices had attempted somewhat against the state: And that this mutinie might grow to no further inconuenience, Gonzaga came from Tuscany into Lombardie to appeale it. The enemies then full of hope marched against the Armie that wanted a Generall: By day-broke they sent a troupe of Archers vp the hill, who afterwards went downe brauely vpon the enemies: Andrea Buzzenis, whose quarter was in the mid-way vpon the hill being put to rout, the light horse seconding their foot, encouraged their owne men, and terrified the enemies: whereupon the Tuscan troupes thus disordered and put to flight, the Dukes of Calabria and Vrbino did with ease ascend the mountaine, and by gaining the Florentines campe, recompeced the losse of the Perusians. Then drawing neere to Colla, after a long and a tedious siege they tooke it. The Florentines terrified with this losse sued for peace for the obtaining whereof Lorenzo de Medicis the noblest Citizen, who was both enuied and esteemed by the Pope and king, went to Naples to free his country from so dangerous a warre: whereupon peace soone ensuing, the Venetians sent Ieronimo Marcello to call backe their forces into Lombardie, which were then commanded in Tuscany by Antonio Donato.

The whole Island of Rouiga is reduced vnder the Venetians command. ALPHONSO of Arragon wasteth all places neere to Rome. ROBERTO of Arimini is sent to aide the Pope, and by defeating the Arragonois getteth a gallant victorie vpon the Veliternian territorie. ROBERT of Arimini dieth within a few daies after his victorie. FREDERIQUE of Vrbino likewise dies not long after at Ferrara. VICTOR SOVRANZA vanquisheth SIGISMOND D'ÆSTE, and HUGO SANSEVERINO at Argento. SANSEVERINO, hipping crossed the Po at the obscure lake, encampeth in the view of Ferrara, and doth afterwards make an inexpugnable Fort vpon the River bankes: wherein he placed a strong Garrison.

His Historie which in diuers things resembleth that of the Romans, deserues in this place some comparison betwixt them concerning their actions by sea and land; saying in this: That the Romanes overthrew themselves by one onely warre, which the Venetians haue not done. For such as at first the Hernici, Equi, and Volscians were to the Romanes, such haue the Dalmatians, Liburnians, & Histrrians bene to the Venetians. The French was a dangerous enemy to them and left them nothing but the Capitoll; the same nation molested the Venetians, and tooke all from them but Rialto. The Cimbrians, Teutonians, and Ambrons were terrible to the Romanes and to all Italy: the like were the Gothes, Hunnes, and Lombards to the Venetians and their neighbours. Carthage was an enemy to the Latine name, the like was Genoa to the Venetians: But Carthage shewed her greatest furie against the Romanes when she was confederate with king Philip and the Siraculans against them.

them: Genoa was neuer more terrible to the Venetians, than at that time when in the warre of Chioggia she was backt by Lewis king of Hungarie, and the Paduans. Pyrrhus was an enemy to the Romans, but more milde than the Carthagenians. Pipus was so to the Venetians, but much more tractable than the Genouefe. The Romans had tedious warre w. th Mithridates, the Venetians with Philippo Visconte. Antiochus was great, but Ottoman greater. The Romans maintained the confederate warre, the most dangerous that euer was in Italy: and the Venetians to resemble them in all things, did not onely in Lombardie withstand the forces of all the Princes of Italy, enuying their greatness, but brake and defeated them.

We will then first speake of the cause and progression of the Ferrarese warre, from whence afterwards sprang that of the confederates, that we may the better understand what ensued. But before we enter into this discourse, we must set downe somewhat which preceeded that warre, among others, two iournies of Ottoman against the Christians: which, though they may seeme impertinent to our Historie, I neuertheless thought good to insert, because we account all Christendome for matters of religion to be but one intire bodie.

A yere and more after peace was concluded, Ottoman besieged Rhodes with as warlike preparation, as he had certaine yeres before iuuaded Nigrepont. Rhodes is the goodliest Island of the Egean and Ionian Seas, wherein in old time were three beautiful Cities, Camia, Linda, and Lalissa: at this day there is no more but Rhodes. It is in compass one hundred fye and twentie thousand paces, though Isidorus say it is not so much. The Turke at this siege attempted many notable enterprises, and by frequent assaults went about to vanquish the Christians, and at times the walles being beaten downe, entred the Citie, but by the valour of the besieged, most of whom were knights of Ierusalem (for those of that order had the absolute command of the Island) they were with great slaughter driuen from the walles, and the Citie by diuine and humane aide was preferred.

The Turkes themselves did afterwards report, that two men of diuine countenance so long as the siege lasted, with torches in their hands, did euerie night walke the round vpon the walles with their swords, threatening the enemies, so as they being terrified with this vision, retired. The common people said that they were Saint Peter and Paul. If this be true, we may then iustly affirme, that Rhodes at that time was not onely preferred by humane, but by diuine assistance. It was also accounted for a miracle, That the verie day that Ottoman a cruell enemy to Christians died, the Hauens of Rhodes stood drie. (and yet it is exceeding deepe) This happened a yere after the siege.

The Spring following, the great Turke resolving of some important enterprize, did by sodaine incursion take Otranto. This Citie is in Calabria, diuided from Valona by a small Arme of Sea. Valona is an ancient Haven. The small space of sea which separates this place from Italy, containing 5000 paces in length, king Pirrhus first of all attempted to passe over his Armie on foote, and to that end builded bridges there. After him Marcus Varro Admirall of Pompeis nauall Armie against Pirates, was desirous to doe the like: but both of them were diuerted from their enterprises by sundrie accidents. Otranto being taken, it was to be feared that Ottoman with all his force would come and invade Italy, which would mightily haue endangered Christendome, had not Gods prouidence preferred it from that mischiefe by the Tyrants sodaine death: for this plague to mankind was cut off euen in the midst of his warlike preparations: whereupon king Ferdinand besieging Otranto by land and sea recovered it, and tooke all the Turkes that were in it.

The Venetians in the meane time annexed the Isle of Coritia in Dalmatia to their dominions, which the modernes call Veglia. It was their owne in former time when they were Lords of Dalmatia, and the Islanders for a time had bene gouerned by Venetian Magistrates. But in the daies of Prince Raimiro Zeno, it being given in perpetuities to the Schimals in those daies one of the noblest families of the Island, they and their successors for two hundred yeres space continued loyall to the Venetians. But in succession of time, the affection of these petty kings beggan to alter in the troubles of Dalmatia, now following the Venetians party, and then on a sodaine that of Bela, Ladislaus, Lewis, and other Hungarian kings, euen till the time of Iohn sonne to Bano the last Prince of the Coritans: Hee hauing rashly and forcibly entred certaine small townes on the firme land belonging to Prince Martin his brother, by whose will and testament after his death they were bequeathed to Mathias king of Hungarie, he did in such sort prouoke the Hungarian against him, as he was enforced to haue recourse to the Venetians.

Maerblajus, who to that end was sent from Hungarie into Dalmatia, not satisfied with the recouerie of those townes on the firme land, passed ouer into the Island, and had already besieged the citie of Musella, when Giacomo Venieri sent by Antonio Lauretano Generall of the nauall Armie from Corfu, arriued there, followed afterwards by Antonio Vinciguerra one of the Secretaries sent from the Prince and Senate; who in the Common-wealths name willed the Hungarian to desist from inuading the Coritans, who were vnder the Venetians protection: But the Hungarian was so farre off from giuing ouer his attempt, as on the contrarie, hauing taken Musella by force, hee brought his Armie to the chiefe Citie of the Island: The Islanders standing ill affected to their Prince in regard of the grieuous subsidies hee exacted from them at the beginning of the warre, were in a manner all reuolted from him vpon the enemies arriual. Then the Coritan Prince hauing lost all hope, did by the perswasion of friends, quit all the claime which himselfe and predecessors had in the Island, to the Venetians, into whose hands hee resigned the Caste, and himselfe went to Venice whither already he had sent his wife and children. Not long after, foure Gallies arriued in the Island, wherewith the Hungarian being terrified, and fearing to be intercepted in his returne home, hauing first taken assurance of the Venetians, did peaceably surrender the Island vnto them.

Victor Souranza who succeeded Lauretano in the Admiralty, comming thither by chance, fortified it. The Senate assigned a perpetuall pension of a thousand crownes to the Coritan Prince, and foure thousand ducats for his daughters dowrie: But he accustomed to tyranny, and not being able to liue vnder Lawes in a free State, departed secretly with his household into Germany.

It is now time to returne to the propounded warre of Ferrara. The Princes of Ferrara had of a long time bene friends to the Venetians, so that Borsia Predecessor to Hercules, if at any time strife arose concerning their bounds, came with a small traine as a priuate person to conferre with the Prince and Senate, supposing that he could doe them no greater honour, nor better expresse his loue, than to come himselfe vnloued for to giue them satisfaction. This Prince to his dying day had nothing in greater admiration than the Venetian Seigniory, nor accounted any thing comparable to the peace and friendship thereof. This mans desires, and the hope which the Senate had conceiued, that no man would more resemble Borsia in his behauiour and affection towards them than his brother Hercules, the Venetians did earnestly embrace his cause, and assisting him by land and water, seated him in the Dukedome, for which hee lately strove with Nicolas, sonne to Lionello, fauored by his vnckle the prince of Mantua, and Galeas Visconte.

But not long after, Hercules married Leonora daughter to king Ferdinand, by means of which new alliance growing more insolent, his loue to the Venetians waxed cold, and he did not greatly care to infringe his league with them. For contrary to their agreement hee had permitted his subiects to make salt at Comachia: Neer the chiefe to cleere himselfe thereof, hee was content at the Venetians intreatie by Benedictio Treusano sent to him to Ferrara to that end, that a great quantity of salt made there, should be cast into the Sea. Hee did besides, lay taxes and impositions on the Venetians, notwithstanding their ancient freedome and exemption. But this was nothing: for he builded a Fort neere to Cap-Darger, as if himselfe had bene to haue bounded his owne confines. Lastly, the Venetian Magistrate, which by couenant remained in Ferrara, being outraged, expelled and excommunicated by the Cities Archbishop, the Duke declared himselfe an open enemy to the Venetians.

The Senate in the meane time knowing whereunto his designes intended, did sometime by Letters, then by Ambassadors, intreat him not to enforce the Venetians to become his enemies, but rather, imitating his brother Borsia and other his Predecessours to perseuer in their ancient friendship, which would both be profitable and honourable for him. His proude man, who by reason of his new alliance promised great matters to himselfe, contemned this counsell. Neuertheless, the Senate made Pope Sixtus a means to containe him in their ancient friendship. But his mediation doing no good, they being prouoked, as well by new as old iniuries (which they had dissembled during the warre with Ottoman) resolved to invade him, and by Armes to reuenge that which till then for quietnesse sake they had more kindly than honourably endured.

The opinion of these dissuading warre.

This determination did for certaine dayes busie the Councell. Some of the ancient Senators were of opinion not to make warre on Hercules upon any occasion whatsoever; not that it was unlawfull, but because the time permitted it not, and did often aduise those that craved warre to take heed, that by desire of reuenge, they did not precipitate the Common-wealth into danger, saying, That the City and Tributary Townes were tired with long warre: That it behoued them sometimes to lay downe armes, lest by heaping one warre upon another, the world should say that the Venetians loued nothing lesse than peace. Moreover, though there were nothing els in it, they ought to consider that Hercules besides his owne experience in Martiall matters, was allied to two potent Kings, and that undoubtedly he would neuer of his owne priuate motion haue so mightily prouoked them: Besides, it was certaine that diuers Italian Princes were leagued with him, which being so, they desired those that wished for warre to aduise themselves, if they had not more need of a Target than of a Sword.

Their answer was that craved war

At this speech most of the Senatours, (as euery man was inclined) cried out to the contrary, saying; That the allegations of cowards ought not to diuert their former resolution, and much lesse cause them to beleeue them, that by the example of one man, other Princes their neighbours would rise against them, who would be twice aduised ere they invaded the Venetians. That the Citie was able to vndergo the whole burthen of the warre, and being of a long time accustomed to warre, would not tume yelley. That the State by Gods goodnesse was so wealtheie, that notwithstanding the great masse of gold spent in the warre against Ottoman, her treasure was in a manner infinite, whereby warre might be manna-ged to the honour of the Common-wealth: That all passages to seay lay open to the Venetian Marchants, whose trafficke did daily augment their imposts and customes: That diuerse Senators present in Councell offered to aide the Common-wealth with great summes of gold, whereby they might perceiue that nothing could be wanting for the entertainment of the armie: That the King of Hungarie was in no sort to be feared: for besides his perpetuall warre with the Emperour Fredericke, the Turkes were still on his confines and wasted his Countrey, so that hee had enough to doe, to defend his kingdome from two such potent enemies: That King Ferdinand was not to be regarded, who had not yet recovered his losses at the siege of Otranto: That the Venetian fleet scoured the Sea coast of Apulia and Calabria, which if hee were desirous to defend, it behoued him whether he would, or no, to haue no hand in the Ferrarese warre. But admit (said hee which spake) that his forces be so great, as they may sily be diuided into sundry places, by what way shall he come to bring aide to his sonne in lawe? His souldiers haue no wings to fly through the aire from Calabria into Lombardie. Rome belongeth to Pope Sixtus, so doth Sabinia, the Dutchy of Spoleta, la Mores, and all Italie besides, from Tibers mouth, as farre as Ancona. His Holinesse so soone as hee perceived that hee could not preuaile with Hercules, hath not onely aduised vs to make war upon him, but together with the Venetians hath an hand therein. The Florentines and Milanois will not take our parts; But the Genouise and Prince of Montferat will assist vs: The Rubrians of Parma will doe the like, who as we vnderstand are ready to reuolt. And seeing wee want neither Armes, money, nor aide, what shall hinder vs from invading Hercules? When did euer any of your neighbours (most noble Senatours) more prouoke you? Ouer all his Territories hee hath cancelled your freedom and immunities. He hath of a long time vsurped vpon the confines of your dominions; Hee hath suffered your Magistrate to be outraged, expelled, and excommunicated: If this wrong cannot moue you, what then is able to incite you? Will you tarry till hee invade you first? Questionlesse hee will affaile you, and it may be sooner than you imagine. On then, follow the steppes of your Ancestours, and with fire and sword pursue this open enemy. Let your Armes quench this flame which our long sufferance hath so kindled, as but by this meanes will hardly be extinguished. Let all men see, that when neede is, the Venetians know how to draw peace from warre, and warre from peace.

Heereupon, the Senate with generall consent presently resolved to take Armes: And that all requisite solemnities might be obserued therein, it was decreed, that so soone as the people were made acquainted therewith, it should be denounced to the enemy. When it was published, the people were so ioyfull, as men might easily perceiue, that neuer any warre was more pleasing to them than that. Whereupon the Senate resolved to prepare two fleets, the one to invade Apulia and Calabria, if Ferdinand should stirre: And the other to passe vp against the streame of the Riuer Po into the enemies Territories. That by sea was committed to Vicior Souza, who had beene Admirall of the Gallies; and the other to Damiano Moro, both of them valiant Capitaines: But when the Senate considered, that he was not onely to be invaded by water, but by land, it diuided the forces into sundry places. Roberto Sansfermo (who not long before serued them for large entertainment) was appoynted to make warre vpon him on the hither side of Po, and Robert of Arimini Generall of all the troupes, on the other side towards Flaminia. Many did voluntarily follow the Venetian ensignes both by land and water, not so much for hope of bootie, as for particular hatred to the Duke, whose pride they could not endure.

Diuers Vessells were already gone from Venice when Roberto Sansfermo and Antonio Lauretano the Prouidator, marched towards Legnaga. These, hauing viewe-d all places, resolved with their troupes to passe into the enemies Countrey, ouer the Lakes of the Riuer Tartar, which are betwixt the Po and the Adice. But here it is requisite (seeing all Lombardie from Hofilia a Citie of the Mantuan on this side, and beyond the Po, as farre as the Sea, is watered by diuers streames) to discourse somewhat of the situation of the Prouince, and winding of the Riuer.

Now this Prouince is inclosed by part of Flaminia, and La Marca, on euery side by Mountaines, fauing on the South and East, where it is watered by the Adriatick Sea, so, as if it extended no farther to Sea-ward than towards the Appenine Hills, and Genoa, it would retain the true forme of a Theater. And if it might be called a Theater, it might truly be said to be that of Mars, and none other, as the Greekes termed Beotia, because there is no Countrey of Italie where Warre hath oftener begunne or lasted longer, than in Lombardie. It hath on the West the Appenine Hills, stretching themselves towards Genoa, and after that they haue coasted and left Tuscanie on the right hand, haue their extent towards Ancona. The Alpes in a manner doe the like towards the North and West. The Tuscans in times past possist the whole Countrey. The French drawne thither by the beautie and fertilitie of the Prouince, chased them thence, and did a long time after enioy the whole Countrey on this side and beyond the Po. Some thinke that the Gauls, Lebetians, Insubres, and Cenomans, haue inhabited betwixt that Riuer and the Alpes: Some likewise affirme that the Venetians are descended from the Gauls, and others say it is not so, because they differ from them in speech, though resembling them in habit and manners. The Boians, Egans, and Senonois dwelt beyond the Po, whereupon it was afterwards rightly termed Gaule. But they were extinct by the Romans. Lastly, by the arriuall of the Lombards (who did a long time inhabit the Prouince; where the greatest part of their power remained, with Pauia their Royall Seate) it was called Lombardie, one fillable being taken from their name.

The goodliest and greatest Riuer of this Prouince, are the Po, Thefin, Oglio, Abdue, Mincia, and Adice. The Po which as some say the Greekes termed Eridanus, receiues her Spring in the middlest of the Mount Vesula, on the confines of Liguria, from thence falling downe into the plaine, it runnes first towards the South, then turning towards the East, it entreth by fixe Channells into the Adriatick Sea, and being augmented by thirtie Riuers falling into it, it growes so great, as some thinke it nothing inferiour to the Danubium or Nilus. The Riuers which fall into it are very famous, and with great abundance of water, issue from very excellent Lakes. From the Lake Larica vulgarly called Coma, it takes the Abdue. From Verbana or the great Lake Thefin. From Benac, or la Garda, Mincia. From Sabina, or Isea, the Oglio. From the Lakes Epilles, whereof the one is called Pucian, and the other Ceruian, Lambroma. Besides these Riuers, snow melted in the Mountaines, doe much increase it, especially in the Dogge daies, and being once swelled, it is as dangerous to ships as to the Neighbour Territories, which causeth the Inhabitants to make great Bankes and Rampiers to restraine it, neuerthelesse in this it deales well with them, for it easily giues them againe whatsoeuer it hath taken from them.

Being thus augmented (as hath beene said) it runnes with a direct course to Ficarolles (this Citie is a little beneath Hostilia) where being ouer-pressed and glutted by superfluitie of waters, it begins to enlarge it selfe somewhat beneath the Citie, and diuiding into two, makes the first Island which the Inhabitants call Polefina, placing (as I thinke) one fillable before an other, pronouncing Polefina for Polinella, which is as much to say, as a long and broad Island. And because that Ferrara is not farre beneath the place where the Riuer diuideth it selfe, they commonly call it the Pollesin of Ferrara. The branch which runneth on the right hand, before it comes to the Citie recouereth her strength by succour of diuers Riuers, which in a little space fall into it, whereupon being ouer-loden with this new burthen, the Citizens looking on, as if it were troubled with some faction, it diuideth it selfe into two, and differently pursueth her course: by that second diuision making an other Island, wherein are the Cities of Argentinia and Comachia, enuironed with Lakes. The right Arme of this Riuer comming to the Argentine Territorie, on the other side neare to Faniola, receiue the Riuer Vaterna, which the Inhabitants by corrupted speech call Sauterna, comming from Forcornelia. And there, as though it were not able to endure all her encrease, comming neare to Comachia, at a Towne called S. Alberts; it prodigallie disgorgeth as much water as it tooke in at Vaterna, the which gliding through the Lakes of Raucna, entreth like a nauigable Riuer into the Sea: And in this manner the Hauen of Raucna may be termed one of the mouthes of the Po. The other part which is farre greater, from S. Alberts runnes directly into the Sea, and the Inhabitants call her entrance Primaria, in old time named Vaterna of the Riuer which falls into it.

That branch on the left hand beneath Ferrara, runnes into the Sea with the selfe same force, as it commeth from the Citie, and the entrance thereof is called Volana. Betwixt this and Primaria, which we lately mentioned, the Lakes of Comachia haue their mouth, or rather Hauen, which is called Magneuaca. But to speake truly these are armes of the Sea, as may easily be perceived by reason of salt which is made there.

Now I returne to the first diuision of the Riuer, which we said was a little beneath Ficarolles: This is esteemed to be new, not so much by the Map of Italie, which Robert King of Naples, and Francisco Petrarca haue made, where Blondus of Forliffirmes no mention at all to be made of this diuision, as by the authoritie of Polibius a learned Author, who saith that the Po entreth by two channells into the Adriatick Sea, by Padua and Volana, which are properly parts of that Riuer, whereof we euen

uen now discoursed. But to returne to the other part, it runs on the left hand without any diminution at all, as farre as the Confines of Hadria, and diuiding it selfe againe into two mouthes, entreth by two seuerall waies into the Sea: That which is next to Volana is called Abba, and the other Gorio. The Inhabitants of the Countrie call the other bigger Channell which runnes on the left hand into the Sea, the Fornaces.

This in briefe is all wee can say of the original of the Po, of her course and entrances into the Sea. Some thinke that it was called Paua, because that round about her Spring there grow many trees called in the French tongue Pines. Plinie saith that the Ligurians called it Bondimaca, by the name of the Village, and for prooofe of his saying alleageth the Towne of Bondicomaca neare to the Riuer.

The Adice likewise which diuided in fundrie forts makes diuers Pollesins, comming downe from the Mountaines of Trant runnes a thwart through the Citie of Verona, from thence being parted in two at Castagnare, beneath Legnaga; that part which enuironeth the Village, falls into the Tartar, issuing from her Lakes, and ioyned together are not long ere with a greater course they meet with the other part of the Adice at Malopra, and so all these Riuers meeting in one, doe behinde enclose the Pollesin of Rouiga. At last falling into the Lakes they loose the name of Riuers. But the Adice being diuided into two about the Tower Marchiana, That part which runnes directly towards Sendouare and Rouiga, before it comes to Capdarger, gently reenters into her owne streames, and thus mingled, runnes through the Lakes and Marthes vnto a place called the new Tower, where againe separating it selfe into two parts, falleth by two mouthes into the Sea, that on the right hand being called Fossiones, and the other Brandules. The Adice being there diuided (as hath beene said) makes two Pollesins, the one beyond Rouiga called the old, and the other on the hether side, termed the new.

Now these diuisions of Lakes and Riuers made the Venetians journey much more difficult, for in some places they were too deepe to be forded, and in others too shallow to be passed by Boat. First, Sanfuerino and the Prouidator Lauretano, were of opinion to cause diuers small Boates to be brought through the Lakes of the Riuer Tartar to Boaria, not farre from Legnaga, and in them to transport three companies of Foote, vnder the command of Anares de Parma, and Thomaso Himulano, first to Crocelta, and from thence to the Mellarian Confines. By this means the Venetian Souldiers came on the last of Aprill before day into the Enemies Countrie. Some of the Garrison of Mellaria with Francisco Sica comming from Hostilio with troupes of Horse, sought to repell them at their first arriual, but after some light skirmish they were glad to retire. The next night Antonio Marciano a very famous Captaine, beganne with three hundred Peasants to cut a way for the Arme through the Lakes neare to Casalon, They wrought there all that night, and the labourers stood in water and mud vp to the girdles: but so soone as it was day and the worke not finished, Sanfuerino and Lauretano comming thither, and considering the danger which those troupes were exposed vnto, that were already in the enemies Countrie, they presently sent for all the Countrie people there abouts of euery sexe and age, to helpe to finish the worke: more then one thousand persons laboured there, who the next day after finished it, and by three of the clocke after noone of the same day the troupes came to the bankes of the Riuer Tartar: so soon as their fellows which guarded the opposite shore saw them, they presently made a Bridge ouer the Riuer, ouer which euery man passed at his pleasure into the enemies Countrie.

This way (four and twentie furlongs in length) cut through the Lakes, was by reason of the great quantitie of Fagots wherewith it was made, called Falcinada. A Fort was builded on the hither side the Tartar neare to the Bridge, and strongly fortified that men might freely passe vp and downe. The same day the forces marched into the Mellarians Territories: some that were there agree not about their number, number; saying, that they were 20000. Others mention not so many. But Sanseuerino marching to besiege Mellaria on the Po, did at the first assault winne the enemies Rampier neare to the Castle: whereupon those within it presently yielded.

Mellaria being taken, the enemy shewed himselfe about Sunne-set on the other side of the Riuer: this gaue a sodaine alarme to the Venetian, who in armes presently ranne to the Riuer banks: but perceiving their small number their feare ceased. They had intelligence afterwards that it was Frederick of Vrbin, who came to crosse the Po at Hostilia, from thence to march to Milan. King Ferdinand and Hercules confederates, had made him General of their Armie, and sent for him to come away 10 speedily to Ferrara to oppose himselfe to the Venetians first attempts. The Venetian returned to the Camp, and two daies after leaving Mellaria, went and encamped at the Village Brigantino, which they had taken not long before. Then Sanseuerino had intelligence that the enemy had abandoned T recenta, and some other lesser Townes of no great moment. Hee thought it fit there to make a bridge, by which supplies and victuals might be brought to them from Verona. Though this was not so neare a way as that of Crosetta or Falcinada, yet was it more sure than any of them, whereupon he left a strong Garrison to guard the bridge.

Within a while after, the camp marched from Brigantino towards Castelnouo, where filling a great trench which the enemy had drawne from the Po to the lakes, 20 to stop the Venetians approach, the Armie came neare the Citie, where for three daies space the Ordnance playing vpon the walls, in the end after some assaults, the Citie yielded. In the meane time they made incursions into the enemies Countrie, and euery day brought great store of Cattaile and prisoners to the Camp.

The report of these incursions being bruted in the neighbour Villages, prouoked many to come to the Venetians campe vpon hope of bootie, so as in a short space the Armie consisted of 30000. able Men. From Castelnouo they went to Ficarolles, where an other great trench being likewise made by the enemy, did for a time restrain the course of their victorie; but this impediment taken away, they planted the Cannon against the walls, when speedie newes was brought from Mellaria, that 30 Frederick of Vrbin with great forces lay at Hostilia. The Venetian General, fearing if the enemy should at his backe shut vp all passages, he should not be able when he would to returne, did presently raise his camp and returned to Castelnouo: There he vnderstood by spies that the forces which were at Hostilia were not sufficient to make any attempt on this side the Po: Then Sanseuerino sent word to Count Marian presently to breake downe the cawties and banks of the Riuer betwixt Mellaria and Hostilia; for that once done, they needed no more to feare the enemies incursions: and himselfe returned againe to Ficarolles. But in his absence, the townsmen had fortified the trench, planted their Ordnance on the opposite shore, broken downe the camps Rampiers, and burnt the Souldiers Cabins. Vrbin comming thither afterwards from Hostilia had strengthened the Towne with a stronger Garrison, and from thence retired to Stellata on the opposite shore, and there remained to releue his people when neede were, with supplies, armor, and victuals: all his troupes came thither to him.

Robert in the meane time being somewhat tyred, did againe fill the trench, and encamped on either side thereof. But whilst these things were done there, Christoforo Muleto a valiant Captaine, who commanded the small vessells (for Damiano Moro General of the fleet vpon the Po had passed on beyond the enemy) besieged and took Hadria a very ancient Citie: The souldiers of the garrison and townsmen did at first brauely defend it. The situation of the place did greatly auail 50 them, which is for the most part enuironed with water, not navigable but by certaine Channels, through which very hardly vessells come neere the Citie. Dominico Hericeo a courageous souldier was slaine at the first assault. The Venetians incensed by his death, did with greater furie assault the Citie, and without feare of danger mounted the rampires, and neuer gaue ouer till the souldiers and mariners entered it. Then the inhabitants casting downe their Armes, cried for mercie. The Conquerors at their first entrance slew diuers, and the houses in many places were burnt and spoiled, and Hadria had that day bene wholly ruined, had not the Venetian presently commaunded the souldiers to abstaine from spoile and murder. We haue elsewhere spoken of the situation and antiquitie of this citie.

Hadria taken, the whole Countrey round about was wasted. Comachia likewise at the same time yielded to the Venetians. These Citties with others neere adjoining, some by force, and others voluntarily, being taken by them, and 10 Moro sailing with the fleet vpon the Riuer, all men fled on both sides the Po: for the Inhabitants of the Countrey terrified with the losse of Hadria, ranne with their wives and children to Ferrara and other Townes of safetie.

Hercules had fortified a place vpon the Po called Pilofella, by which the fleet was to passe, and had there builded three Castles of wood, one in the midst of the Riuer; and the other on both sides; which hee furnished with ordnance and other necessaries, and strong garrisons. Sigismund d'Este Hercules brother and Gian Bentiuole of Bologna lay there with six hundred horse, and as many foot. Moro had great numbers of vessells, to wit, gallies, small boates, Ganzaroles, with many other of sundry sorts to the number of two hundred well armed and readie 20 to fight. Himselfe in his owne Gallie, sailed against the enemy, the like did the forces by land. The Venetian beganne the fight with such animositie, as putting the Caustlerie and the rest which were on each shoare to flight, after a long and dangerous bickering hee tooke the Fortes vpon the water. The victory was verie bloody. But the ioy to haue vanquished made them forget their present losse. They sent the Castle which was builded in the midst of the water vpon a great vessel, to Venice, the others were burnt.

Moro victorious, caused his souldiers and mariners to spoile and waste all places neere to the Riuer; they being as well prouoked by reuenge, as desire of bootie, pillaged all villages, and countrie houses vpon the Riuer, and then burnt them, and so 30 satisfied, carried away with them great numbers of prisoners and cattell, and thus loaden with bootie, arriued at the campe before Ficarolles. These men by their speed, comming thither before the fleet, and being taken for enemies, did put the Campe in alarme; but when they were knowne to be friends, they did theerefully embrace one another, and continued the siege both by land and water: then they made so fierce a battery as they ouerthrew the Citties, walls, and rampires. Fredericke of Vrbin, who was on the opposite shore, beholding the danger of his friends, was not idle, but annoyed the Venetians with his ordnance from the farther side, and supplied the besieged with armour, victuall, and whatsoeuer else he knew to be necessary for a siege. But nothing did so much hurt to the Venetian as certaine 40 peeces called Bases, then not vsuall. For neither armour, rampire, or fortification could withstand their fury and yron bullets, which carried away with them whatsoever they met with. And because that contrarie to the discipline of those times they played aswell by night as day, Sanseuerino sent him word by a Trumpet, that if hee did not cease his new kinde of warre, hee would turne his Cannons from the walls of Ficarolles vpon his Campe, whereupon they agreed together, that when Sanseuerino should assault the Citie, or batter the walls with his ordnance, the enemy might vse those peeces.

Moreouer, Sanseuerino resolving wholly to shut vp the Riuer from the enemy, commanded certaine vessells of the fleet to be drawne by Land vpon the Riuer, beyond the enemies camp. Vrbin sent for nine Gallies from Hostilia (of those five 50 and twentie which he had brought with him from Milan) to ouer-runne those vessells. Five of them being come to an Island neare to the Venetians fleet, foure hundred of the Souldiers landed there to refresh themselves by reason of the great heat, and lay downe here and therein the shade vpon the grasse. tified of their landing, and vnwilling to omit so faire an occasion, landing on the farther side of the Island to the number of 150. did sodainly assaile the enemye halfe asleepe, who being amazed with such an vnlookt for assault, in sted of defending them seiuies fled towards the vessells: most of them were slaine or taken; threecore and ten being taken aliuie were brought to Sanseuerino, who vnderstanding that they were Milaneses and Artificers, not comming thither of their owne accord to fight, but sent by their Princes commandement, did vse them gently, and furnishing them with clothes and money, gaue them leaue to depart.

It was not long ere the enemye had his reuenge, with greater losse to the Venetians. The Po diuides it selfe into two branches (as hath been said) five hundred paces beneath Ficarolles. The Venetian Captaines determined to build a Fort at the point of the Island where this separation begins, that the right side thereof on the way from Stellata to Ferrara, might be shut vp from the enemye. Antonio Marciano was the first that propounded it, wherefore the charge thereof was committed to him. He being accompanied by Bartilmeo Falceria, Tomaso of Imbola, and two Companies of foot, did on a sodaine seize on the place, and then with great numbers of peasants brought thither with him to that end, began the worke. The soldiers and mariners in the meane time desirous of bootie, straying far from the worke, made incursions as far as Ferrara, from whence returning with great bootie, they went without leaue to the Campe on the opposite shoare, leauing Marcian and his workmen with few or no forces at all. By reason hereof the worke could not be finished in one day. Hercules, by messengers from the Duke of Feltré aduertised of the enemies designe, came speedilie thither to defeat them: For he was not ignorant how discommodious that Fort would be to Ferrara. At his arriual he charged them, but Marcian in the end being oppressed by the multitude, was taken, and Falceria with him: Many of his soldiers were slaine, Thomaso of Imola in a little boat escaped with some few soldiers, and went ouer the Riuer. Hercules presently finished the fortification which the other had begun, and placing a strong Garrison in it, did greatly relieue Ferrara.

The Venetians are put to rout, and their enterprise made fruitless.

Sanseuerino in the meane time lying longer before Ficarolles than he expected; the better to annoy the enemye, sent Fracasse, Gionan Maria, and Pietro Marcello the Prouidator, with part of the troops to take the Townes of the Rhouigian Pollesin: For the enemies Countrie neer to the Adice had not yet tasted the calamities of warre. At their first arriual there they tooke Castle-Guillielmo, the tower Sandona enuironed with lakes, Rouiga, Lendenara, the Abbey, and other places of the Pollesin, but not without fight, where Ieronimo, sonne to Count Marcian a braue young man was slaine.

For the assurance of the Townes yielded to the Venetians, Augustino Barbado at that time Gouvernour of Padua, a man of great wisdom and authoritie, did by the Senates command go to Rouiga, with whom they ioined Pietro Trevisano.

The Prouince being settled, Barbado by the same commandement returned to Padua: Trevisano falling grievously sicke, died soone after. Roberto Venieri sonne to Francisco, succeeded Trevisano in the Prouince. This man did not alone fashion the peoples minds to obedience, but by his meeknesse confirmed them in their duties towards the Venetians.

Whilest these things were done neere to the Adice, Frederick of Vrbin falling sicke, was carried from the Campe at Stellata to Ferrara. Sanseuerino, though his sonnes had part of the forces, did not cease continually to annoy the enemye, whose wals being beaten downe by the Canon, himselfe impatient of any longer delay, resolved to giue an assault, wherein the Venetian tooke the Parapet of the Tower, and made it good; many after the retreat was founded, remayning in it. Hercules soldiers, terrified with the enemies boldnesse, did set fire on the piles that supported the Tower, and ouerthrew it. Sanseuerino thereby perceiued the inhabitants small hope, whereupon he assailed the Citie more fiercely. Vpon the 29. day of June at midnight the soldiers went to the assault, and fauored by the night, made many bridges ouer the dikes and hollow places. The besieged, notwithstanding the darknesse of the night, did brauely defend it, so as this assault both in shew & effect was more furious than that by day. It continued till day-light: but the enemye being then vanquished, the Venetian in sundrie places entred the Citie, which taken the soldiers threw downe their Armes: some of them were cast into the riuer, others murdered, verie few taken prisoners. This being done, and the Venetian master of the Citie, he did forthwith begin to repaire it.

The Venetians take Ficarolles.

Within a while after, Sanseuerino and Laureano fell sicke, by reason of the vnhollesome aire of the marshes: both of them were carried to Padua, but with feutall destinies, for the Venetian died there, and the Generall recovered. Moro likewise, General of the nauall Armie, called home by the Senate, died soone after his arriual at Venice. This Summer was vnfortunate, but the Autumne after it much more: Some that haue written the Ferrarese warre, and were present there, affirme that more then 20000. men of those that were at the siege of Ficarolles by land and water, by some one accident or other died there, but most of all by reason of feauers occasioned by the infectious ayre of the marshes. This is all that happened in Lombardie during that Summer.

Great mortality in the Venetians campe.

In Flaminia, Roberto of Arimini did not cease to annoy the enemye by ordinarie incursions with those forces which he had receiued at the beginning of the war: he was abundantly furnished with victuals & other warlike necessaries from Rauenna, gouerned at that time by Bernardin Bembo. Roberto in the heat of Summer was commanded by the Senate to go to Rome to relieue Pope Sixtus which was besieged.

Alphonso Duke of Calabria at the beginning of the Venetians warre fought to bring 4000. men to aide his brother Hercules. But because his way lay through the Popes territories, he marched by assistance of the Colonesis, and Sauelli who were open enemies to the Pope, directly towards Rome, which Citie hath diuers noble families in it, among whom the Vrsini, Colonesi, and Sauelli, hold the chiefe ranke, as well for wealth as antiquitie of descent. These men of a long time being ill affected to each other, haue often by meanes of their mortall hatred banded together, sometimes in the Citie, but oftner in the field, as in a freer place: most of the townes and villages neere to Rome are theirs. But beside these, there be diuers other noble families in the Citie, yet the Vrsini haue for many yeares excelled them all both in wealth and knowledge in martiall discipline. Foure of this house, sonnes to Carolo, haue in our time bene verie famous, Latino, Giuanni, Neapoleo, and Roberto. The two first followed Pope Eugenius to Florence, where they did winne his loue and fauour, as Latino the eldest brother was made Cardinal, and Giuanni elected Bishop of Trani, and being enriched with diuers other benefices, did much augment the greatnesse & dignitie of his house: These two did greatly illustrate their familie, but not so much as Neapoleo and Roberto, who by their experience in martiall discipline, purchased such honour, as at one time the first was made Generall of the kings Armie, and the other of the Popes. They did not onely by their valour keepe their paternall principallitie, but did wonderfully encrease it, so as they became Lords of all the whole countrey, from the Tyrene sea as farre as the lake Picino; extends it selfe.

The noblest house of Rome.

The greatnesse of the Vrsini.

This prosperitie procured them hatred and entie. For at one time the Colonesi, Sauelli, and Arigulari were their enemies: and because they were all too weak to withstand the power of this one familie, they caused Pope Calixtus likewise to Arme against them, whose attempts they did not onely frustrate, but brake and defeated them, and chiefly at that time when Dorsis Nephew to Calixtus, with forces farre superiour to Vrsini, was by him vanquished at Varro his village.

But if Vrsini greatnesse was enuied before, it was most of all in the daies of Pope Sixtus, when their enemies desirous wholly to ruine them, had (in their owne opinion,) found out a fitt occasion. For these foure noble men being lately dead, they ioynly ioyntly bent all their malice vpon Virginio Sonne to Neapulo, sole heire to Vrbis principallitie. But he being young and powerfull, after the Precedent of his Ancestors, did together with Ieronimo Visconte follow the Popes partie, by whose counsell he was wholly directed. In hatred to him rather than the Pope, the Colonsi and Saueili did vpon Alphonso arruall praetize inuouation as well in the Citie as abroad, whereupon two Cardinals of both those families, men of great authoritie, were by the Popes commandement, as guiltie of treason, imprisoned for a time in Castle Angelo. Their kinsmen incensed thereat, did by their factions trouble all Rome, aided Alphonso with victuals, and the more to annoy the Citie, gaue him free entrance into their Townes and Castles. And although the Pope at that time was strong, many noble Gentlemen seruing him, his Armie neuertheless stirred not forth of the wallis of Rome, fearing if they should leaue the Citie, those of the contrarie partie would make some commotion.

Alphonso laying hold on this occasion, tooke diuers townes from the Pope, spoiling and wasting the whole countrey neere to Rome. The Pope wrote to the Venetians to send Roberto Malatesta to raise the siege. Though the Senate at that time was busied in the Ferrarese warre, it neuertheless commanded Vittor Souranza to wait the Sea coasts of Apulia and Calabria with a mightie fleet: They wrote to Francisco Diede their Ambassador with the Pope at their charge to raise forces in Rome: And willed Roberto of Arimini to march speedily thither with the greatest power he could to raise the siege. They sent Pietro Diede to be his Prouidator, to raise forces from all parts: this they did, because they would not onely aide his Holinesse with a Generall, but with souldiers. Roberto being commanded to goe to Rome, departed from Flaminia with many troupes of horse: but hauing intelligence by the way that Nicola Vitelli aided by the Florentines had taken the towne of Typherna, he went thither, where ruining certaine places belonging to the Typhernians, the danger of Rome calling him thither, by great iournies he arriued there: At his coming the state of the warre was changed, and they marched against the enimie.

Alphonso, hauing intelligence of the Venetians approach, encamped on the Veltinian territorie in a place called the Dead field. So soone as the Venetian Generall discovered him, he encouraged his souldiers, and full of hope marched against him: being more confident through the number of his men, whereby he enforced the Arragonois to fight on all parts at once. Alphonso was likewise strong both in horse and foote, but chiefly in horse: he had besides foure hundred Turkes which he had brought from Otranto: with these forces he brauely received Malatestas charge. The fight was hot for sixe houres: The Venetian Generall did greatly annoy him. The Arragonois on the contrarie presuming on the valour of his men, resolved eyther to die or conquer: many fell on both sides, in all places the battaile was bloudie, especially where the Turkes fought. At last the Pope and Venetians multitude, with the Generals encouragement preauailing, the enimie by little and little retired. Alphonso fought to reinforce them, but perceiving he could not, withdrew himselfe to a place of safetie, accompanied with some few horse: other braue Commanders preferring any hazard before flight were taken, in greater number than euer before in any battaile.

The conquerour within a while after entred Rome with his prisoners, representing the Romanes the forme of their ancient triumphes, and hauing by this victorie purchased immortall glorie, he died not long after. Some say that he was poisoned, but it is most likely that he died of a surfeit taken by his great trauell in the heat of the battaile. He was honourably buried in Rome, where this Epitaph was written on his monumēt. Veni, vidi, vici Lauream Pontifici retuli, Mors secundis rebus iniidit. In English thus, I came, saw, ouercame, brought victorie to the Pope, which death tooke from me. Some write that on one day two of the greatest Captaines of Italy died: he of whom we now spake; and Fredericke of Vrbis; that was carried away sicke to Ferrara from the campe at Stellata.

The death of Roberto of Arimini.

But

But whilest these things were done neere to Rome, Pietro Maria de Rosis following the Venetians partie in Lombardie, ceased not to annoy Sforzas troupes on the Parmean confines: But the Venetians intention was not so much to hurt the Milanais, as by entangling him in a domestick warre, to keepe him from aiding Hercules. Sforzas forces sodainly marched towards Parma, where Rosis being tharpeuilsailed, was not onely enforced to retire into his owne territories, but lost Nu-cetta, and the Castle Candida.

But Pietro Rosis a braue and valiant Gentleman falling sicke, died within a while after. Guidone whom he had made his heire, went with his bretheren to besiege a certaine Towne, but being abandoned by the Venetian succours, who could not follow them by reason of the Po, though for a time they did brauely withstand all Sforzas attempts, and sometime defeated his forces, yet being tired with so long a warre, they were enforced to retire.

Autumne was already more than halfe spent, when Sanseuerin hauing recouerd his health returned to his desolate camp, where nothing was to be seene but weake and sicke souldiers. Luca Pisani whom the Senate had sent from Verona after Laurenzoes death, commaunded the Armie as Prouidator, till Gianan Heme called from the confines of Brescia arriued at Ficarolles. He being come, Pisani who was already infected with the bad aire returned to Venice. The new Prouidator repayed the wallis of Ficarolles, when Frederico Cornari, and Francisco Sanuto came to the Campe as Prouidators. At their arriual, the Armie made some abode there, together with the fleet, not daring to enterprize any memorabile matters; for though their numbers were great, yet most of them were so weake, as they could hardly walke vp and downe. But towards the end of Haruest, the aire being purified, they beganne by litle and litle to recouer their healths: Then Sanseuerine loath to looke any longer time, sent Fracasso his sonne with many troupes of horse, to assault the Fort which Hercules had made vpon the Riuer bankes at the obscure Lake, for it did greatly annoy the Venetian vessells going to and fro: He planted his ordnance on the opposite shoare, from whence in short space by continuall shooting hee had so beaten downe the Rampires as hee was in good hope before long to driue them thence.

But whilest Fracasso was there busied, Vittor Souranza Generall by water, coming vp the Riuer Po as farre as the Argentine territorie with one and twentie gallies, foureteene foists, and other lesser vessells, determined to assault the Towne of Ianiola, seated at the mouth of Vaterna: For if it were not taken, it was certayne that the fleet could not goe vp farther but with greater daunger. To this end Souranza landed foure hundred horse, and fixe hundred foote at a place opposite to the Citie: These hauing begunne to fortifie the Riuer bankes to defend themselves from the enemies incursions, that they might afterwards without any let batter the towne walls, Sigismundo d'Este on a sodaine with Nicola Correggio, Hugo Sanseuerino, and other noble men comming forth of Argento with three thousand men, assailed them, and gaue their first charge vpon Andrea Burgenis quarter, where at first the Venetians had the work, but so soone as the alarme was giuen in the camp, euery man armed ranne fiercely to the fight. Sigismundo opposed to the Venetians front foure waggons, on each of which lay foure falconets. There the battaile was very doubtfull, till three hundred Venetian light horse wheeling about to giue in vpon the enemies backe, did so terrifie Hercules souldiers, as Sigismundo and the other Captaines betooke themselves to flight, then the Gallie called Valerefa coming with great rumor vp the water vpon their backs, the enemies changed their fight to flight. Sigismundo mounting a swift horse, escaped himselfe alone to Argento. Many were drowned in the Riuer, more were slaine in the battell, but the number of prisoners was greatest of all. Souranza that day obtained a great and notable victorie. For besides Hugo Sanseuerine, he tooke three score and tenne other Captaines whom he sent prisoners to Venice.

Roberto Sanseuerino being likewise delirous to execute some memorable enterprize, resolved to passe ouer into the Ferrarese Territory, and for effecting it hee commaunded a bridge to be made on galliots, and committed the worke to Bassan of Verona, which being soone finished, he left Barbadico at Ficarolles, and himselfe with Heme and Samuto the Prouidators, went a mile beneath the enemies Fort, where hee beganne to passe ouer his troupes, and so soone as one boate had passed, it cast anker, and so the rest serued for a bridge. By this time eightene hundred horse and foote were already gone ouer into the enemies Countrey, when they perceiued that there wanted vessels to finish the bridge, which happened by their error who had not taken the iust breadth of the Riuer: by the means whereof, a troupe of valiant souldiers remayned on the other shoare destitute of their fellowes aide: whereat Sanseuerino was moued, in great choller protesting, that if they did not before day prouide boats to finish the bridge, his brauest troupes through the carelesnesse & indiscretion of some, would vndoubtedly be cut in peeces before his face. But by the Prouidators diligence, it was prevented, and the bridge beeing wholly finished, the rest of the Armie crossed the riuer ere the enemy had anie notice thereof.

Hercules souldiers hauing discovered them, and not trusting to their Fort, threw their ordnance into the Riuer, and setting fire on their fortification, retired speedily to Ferrara. By their example others that held certaine fortified places vpon the Riuer, did for feare abandon them: whereupon the Venetian in an instant became Master of the Riuer (one Fort excepted, standing at the head of the Poeline which the enemies had fortified.) So soone as the Venetians perceiued that neither their riuer nor any forts could resist their furie, they wasted the whole territorie, burning farmes and country houses downe to the ground.

There is a Parke within a mile of Ferrara: Borsia was the first that inclosed it with walls, but Hercules enlarging it, did much beautifie it with lakes, ponds, groues, and other places fit for chace. The Venetian first encamped nere to the walls which are close to the riuer; and in the meane time made a new bridge ouer the Po, stronger than the former. They first placed a ranke of shippes of burthen, one close to another, from one side to the other, fastened to their ankors, by strong yron chains which could not bee cut in sunder, then they laid euen planckes vpon them so cunningly ioyned together, as it resembled a well-framed bridge of stone: This being done, they builded shoppes vpon it on both sides, wherein all sortes of wares were sold, which hindered Passengers from looking on the water: They made moreover draw-bridges at both ends, which when they were drawne vp, those shoppes seemed an Island in the midst of the Riuer. And to keep the enemy from firing it by night, some two hundred paces before it they hung vp aboue water great wooden plankes fastned to ankors with yron hookes to keepe out the fire-works, which might be throwne vpon it, till they were either quenched or burnt out.

The bridge finished, Sanseuerino brake downe the Parke walles, and through it marched with his armie in battell within a mile of Ferrara, where he remained for a time in the Cities view, but when he saw that the enemy did not fallie, he brought backe his troupes to the Campe: then he beganne to repaire the Fort vpon the riuer which the enemy had abandoned; hee did first enlarge it, then enuironed it with trenches of twenty foote deepe, with strong bastions, Towers, and Raulins: This worke vndoubtedly was in a manner impregnable, and would perpetually haue terrified the Citie of Ferrara, had it not by peace bene razed. The Venetian hauing in this manner asured his Campe, galloped with his Cauallerie to the very gates of Ferrara, filling all places with feare.

The Citizens viewing the bridge so neere them, and the Fort much neerer beganne to lament their owne and Common-wealths estate, saying, That Hercules Principallitie was ouerthrowne, themselves in great daunger, and that the strokes of warre had pierced their very heart, that they were out of hope euer to haue peace peace with the Venetians, who had displayed their victorious Ensignes at their gates: That the Marshes, Lakes, and Riuers had not bene of force to restrain the course of their Victorie, of whom they were to receiue verie vniust conditions of peace, or submit themselves to their mercie. The Venetian in the meane time omitted nothing that might further his Victorie; he did shut vp the riuers and lakes, placing corps du guard and garrisons in all passages. In a word, he held those of Ferrara at such a bay, as Conquerours are wont to do the vanquished, when they are desirous speedily to end the Warre.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE FOURTH DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

The Contents of the second Booke of the fourth Decad.

THe Pope maketh a new league, and abandoneth the Venetians. The Duke of Calabria comes to Ferrara. All Princes and Commonwealths of Italy band themselves against the Venetians. The Senate sends for the Duke of Lorraine into Italy, and gives him large pay. SANSEVERINO with great forces crosseth the Adda by a bridge, and encampeth at Frezzia. LODOVICO SFORZA doth easily overthrow the ROSSIANs. ALPHONSO taketh diuers townes from the Venetians on the Bressian and Verona territories; then crossing the Minchia, he scoures the country as farre as the River Adice, and not long after takes Azzola. The Venetian Infanterie vpon HERCVLES arrivall at Stellata leapes into the River. ALPHONSO leaving Azzola with an intent wholly to overthrow the Venetian forces vpon Po, being stoppt by SANSEVERINO, returnes without effecting it. GIACOMO MARCELLO Generall of the Venetian fleets, dies at the siege of Gallipolis, which being taken, the Venetians make farther incursions into Calabria. The enemies' Armie comes to Baignols where peace in vaine before motioned at Celenna, is determined and concluded. And lastly the triumphes, turnaments, and barriers made at Venice for joy of this peace.

LHE Venetians had already mightily prevailed, and the warre with Hercules would soon have been ended, had not Pope Sixtus by his badaine alteration not only snatched the victorie forth of their hands, but that which worse is, thrown them headlong into a dangerous war. For the Pope and Ieronimo Visconte by whose counsell and aduise all matters were directed, falling by little and little from the Venetians after Alatistes death, did at last openly declare themselves friends to the Ferrarois. Francisco Diede, who at that time was Ambassador with the Pope, had of a long time foreseene it, and a little before had by letters aduertized the Prince and Senate thereof, who to containe them still in league, omitted no kinde offices of good friends and confederates. It is not certainly knowne vpon what cause they did it.

The Pope hauing made a league with the enemy, did by letters goe about to cause the Venetians to lay downe Armes, to induce them no more to warre vpon the Ferrarois, and to restore vnto him whatsoeuer till then they had taken from him. The Senate moued by these letters, were vnwilling to let goe the victorie whereof whereof they had to sure hold, and yet desirous to answer the Pope; and to let him and all the Princes of Italy and Europe vnderstand that they were not Authors of that warre: for they would neuer haue taken armes against Hercules, had not Pope Sixtus provoked them therunto. They decreed that Bernarado Rustiniano a verie eloquent person should, in the Common-wealths name, answer the Pope.

The effect of those letters which he composed, and after the Senates approbation were sent to Rome, is this. That the Senate were so farre from entreaining this warre without his Holiness consent, as they did it by his instigation: That as at first so now they did not onely preferre peace before warre, but before victorie; so it were fought for in time; and not on such conditions as might make their lenitie interpreted in discretion: That they were confident his Holiness actions had no private end; but such as imported the common good of Christendome: onely in this it was notorious to the whole world, that he dealt more subtilly than sincerely: That for twentie yeares wherein both by land and sea they had beene singled out by dreadful Ottoman, none of the Princes of Italy afforded one drop of blood towards the quenching of this neighbour flame, but seemed deafe to all solicitations, lame in assistance: But in this private cause of Ferrara those which shranke backe from the publike quarrel could all bandie together, not as if they would arbitrate, but enforce peace: That they humbly desired his Holiness to deliberate this businesse temperately which others did passionately, & let his owne vnderstanding aduise him whether it more concerned him to fauour the Venetians or the Ferrarois. As for them they were resolu'd to prosecute that warre, which by his aduise they had vnderaken, hoping the successe should be as happy, as the cause iust and honorable;

The Venetians answer to the Pope.

This is in summe the import of the Venetian letters: But the Pope not respecting his ancient league, and perceiving the Venetians to continue their resolution, excommunicated them. He had already leagued himselfe with Ferdinand and others. And whilst this businesse was pursued by letters to and fro, Alphons Duke of Calabria came to Ferrara with two thousand men, among whom were foure hundred Turkes which he brought from Otranto, but they within a while after ranne ouer to the Venetian. Vpon his arrivall certaine skirmishes were made neere the Citie; himselfe stayed not long there, but leaving his troups with his brother in law, went first to Mantua, and then to Milan. But at a counsell held at the same time at Casal Maior vpon the Cremonse where the commissioners of all the confederate Princes and states met, warre was concluded against the Venetians by general consent. Frederick Gonzaga Prince of Mantua had the title of Generall of the Armie, but Alphons Duke of Calabria the honour. The Senate hauing intelligence of what had bene concluded in that assembly, and considering the dangerous warre they were to oppose the next Spring, (For the Genoueses excepted whom Giouanni Pascalis sent to that end had exempted, all other Princes and States of Italy had coniu'd their destruction) and for the strengthening of their partie, they sent into France for Renatus Duke of Lorraine, vnto whom they gaue honourable entertainment. Antonid Vinciguerra one of the Secretaries had long before solicited him from the Pope and Venetians to come into Italy against the Ferrarois, who now the Pope relinquishing the cause remained firme to the Venetians, and brought two hundred horse, and one thousand foote to their aide. Vinciguerra conducted him through the Alpes: Bartolomeo Victurnini, and Nicolao Foggarini Venetian gentlemen, went as farre as Trent on the confines of Italy to meete him.

He excommunicated the Venetians.

The Duke of Austria and the other Potentates of Germanie in fauour of the Pope denied passage to the Sauoyards, and other French whom Lorraine had enrolled. The Spring was already come, when Pietro de Priuli, and Marco Antonio Morefina came to the Armie as Prouidators. The enemies comminations were great: but the Senate hauing intelligence that their fauorites in Milan which yet stirred not, would if Sanseverin crossed the Adda, raise some commotion upon difference betwixt the widow of Galeas and Lodowick Sforza, after mature deliberation, commanded one part of the Armie to passe into Lombardie, and the other to remaine before Ferrara. Descha Anguillars went before with a braue troope of horse, and expected Sanseuerino at Azzola upon the Breslian Confines. Sanseuerino soone followed him, leauing the Prince of Mirandola, Bernardina Antonone, Antonace Dulcino, Gasparo Perusini, Alessandro surnamed the Turke, and diuers other Captaynes at the siege before Ferrara. The French Generall went thither like Wile with his forces: But their arriual was more terrible to their enemy than profitable to the Venetian, the French euery day mutining.

Sanseuerino with Marc Antonio Morgosini the Prouidator being come to the Breslian territorie, remained for a time at the new Orges, then making a bridge ouer the Adda aboue Trezzia, and fortifying it at each end, himselfe encamped on the further side, where he contained his souldiers without executing any hostilitie vpon the Countrey, rather like a guest then enemy, which was so farre from diminishing the malice of the Confederates, as on the contrarie it increased it, hastening not deferring this intended warre. Lodowick Sforza, with a mightie Armie was in field against the Refians of Parma, who till then had brauely defended their patrie, but now seeing so vnequall a power bent against them, fortified their toynes, and yet not thinking themselves secure, retired with their children into the Genouelles territories. Their Tenants following not their Lords but their fortune, presently vpon their departure yielded to Sforza. Lodowick vpon this victorie marched vnto the territorie of Cremona where Alphonse expected him, (as some say) called in by the Milanese vpon Sanseuerino's arriual to guard the frontiers in the absence of Lodowick. Others affirme that he came voluntarily offering his assistance against Sanseuerino.

Such was the state of the Venetian affaires, when the Commonwealth was shaken with a new feare by a transcurion of two of Sanseuerino's sonnes to the enemy. Hee had foure sonnes which serued in this Armie, all valiant and braue young Gentlemen, of whom Francisco and Galeas unknown to their father, dishonorably fled to the enemy, allured (as it seemes) by faile promises: yet their error was so much the lesse, as it extended no further then to themselves. This, at first did greatly perplex the father, who in great passion called God and men to witness of his sonnes treacherie, practizing not onely against their fathers honour, but life: yet herein comforting himselfe, that his fidelitie was sufficiently known to the Venetians, and should euery day be more and more manifested: whereupon hee sent messengers to Venice to make his owne Apologie, and excuse the temeritie of his children, which he hoped ere long to redeeme with his owne seruice and loyalty, and let the world know that he esteemed nothing so deere, as the safetie and honour of the Venetian Estate. But the Senate was so farre from imputing the error of his sonnes to himselfe, as they did by letters comfort him.

Alphonse in the meane time hauing made a bridge ouer the riuer beyond Cassian, passed ouer his Armie with great rumor into the Gyradade, and thence marching into the Bergamasco, tooke Colloigna and Anguana. Sanseuerino hauing intelligence of his coming, kept strong guard on the bridge on that side, and strengthened his Rampiers, and then retired with his forces towards Bergamo: Thence, crossing the Oglio at Palaznoles, he encamped at the new Orges. The enemy hauing taken Treccian, and reinforced the Popes and Florentines troupes, passed ouer the Oglio betwixt the new Orges and Quintiano. The Senate considering how dangerous the enemies Armie would bee to their territories (for it was reported that he had an hundred companies of men at Armes) did speedily send the rest of the Caualerie which lay vpon the Po, to Sanseuerino, that he might be better able to resist him.

Alphonse in the meane time, had taken all that part of the Breslian territory which lieth betwixt the Riuer Mella and the new Orges, a very fruitfull soyle abounding bounding in towne and villages, which vpon fearour of his arriual presently yielded vnto him. The Venetian being inferior to the enemy in strength, resolved not to confront but follow him, and prevent his attempts: And leauing Antonio Scarsio with 300. horse in garrison in the new Orges, himselfe went through by-waies first to Madou, then to Saint Zene three miles from Bressia. Angustino Barbado and Zacharia Barbado men of great authoritie, came from Venice to the Campe. But Alphonse and Barbado remaining with Sanseuerino in the Armie, Barbado went to fortifie Bressia. He was sonnet to that Francisco who in former time had for three yeeres space defended that Citie against all the attempts of Duke Philip, worthie indeed in being father to Stromolao, the learnedest of his time in Greeke and Latine. Alphonse crossed the Riuer Mella and seized on Baigriols.

The Prince of Mantua (who till then had caued himselfe as a friend not enemy to the Venetians) did openly shew himselfe their enemy, ioyning with Alphonse, whose Armie by this addition amounted to one hundred and thirtie companies of horse, which being diuided ouer the Breslian territorie rooke all the towne on this side the Riuer Mella (Azzola excepted) from the Venetians.

Sanseuerino vpon the enemies coming to Baigriols, retired to Regiana five miles from Bressia, but Alphonse taking all the other towne, brought his Armie to Calcinia. This is all which this summer, till the beginning of Autumne was done, vpon the Breslian and Bergamasch territories.

Neer to the Po, most of the French being dead by sickness, their Generall hauing intelligence of King Lewis death, who by his Testament had made him Governour and Protector of his Realme, returned into Fraunce: The Senate being advertised about the Spring, that King Ferdinand, assisted by the Pope and Confederates, had rigged a mightie Fleet, the better to resist the Enemy at Sea, wrote to Giacomio Marcello who succeeded Souranza in the Admiralty, to haue a care that the State were not preiudiced about the Islands, nor in the gulfe neere to Histria and Dalmatia; and if he might safely doe it, to inuade the frontier of Apulia and Calabria as Souranza had done.

Marcello had not long bene Admirall, when fortie of the enemies Gallies, vnder the commaund of Frederick of Arragon, sonne to Ferdinand, a braue young Prince, came into the Hauen of Ancona. Their arriuall did trouble the Senate, for it was likelie that the enemy, by tarrying in that place, would cut off the Venetians passage on the Sea. All Venice had then hope fixed on Marcello and his Fleet, despairing of their Dominion at Sea, vnlesse the enemy could be speedily repelled, expecting when Marcello should either assaile or fire them.

But whilest he intended the supplying of the Gallies, not yet compleat with souldiers and mariners, which he could hardly effect without promise of pardon and impunity to the Bandetti of Albania, Dalmatia, and Histria, the enemy thinking himselfe not safe departed from Ancona three dayes before his arriuall. This omission was hardly interpreted, especially by the vulgar, measuring things by the event: But better vnderstandings made more fauourable construction of it, saying, He did better to absent himselfe from fight, than vnadvisedly hazard his naked Fleet, and that victorie was more easie in discouering then action. Thus was hee vnjustly censured.

The enemy in the meane time being out at Sea vnwilling to seeme idle, made sodaine incursion vpon Lissa an Island in Dalmatia, putting all to fire and sword. From thence he sailed to Corfou, Georgia Viare a wife & valiant Gentleman gouerned the Island. He despoiling the Arragonian Nauie, encouraged the inhabitants, preparing all things requisite for defence: The enemies first assaults were very violent: for being many; they at one time scaled all parts: but through the valout of the defendants, they were not onely kept from entrance, but precipitated from the walls with great slaughter.

Notwithstanding this brave repulse, the assault continuing till night without intermission, and the Governour fearing, that the Defendants wearied, though not conquered, would give way to the enemies, invented this stratagem. Hee charged that the Venetian fleet should in few hours arrive there, whereupon hee commanded all the bells to be rung, acclamations of joy to be made by the soldiers on the walls, as though supplies were already arrived. The enemy terrified with this sodayne clamour, having lost 500. men in this assault, put to Sea. Shortly after the Venetian fleet, arrived and wintered there.

Alphonso was (as hath beene said) encamped at Calcina, and it was probable, that from thence hee would goe and besiege Lonata. Moresini the Provindator departed from the Campe at Rezza, and went thither to fortifie the Cittie, whither hee sent for Country people, who with the inhabitants and souldiers of the Garrison, made a trench and rampires. Giacomo Media was likewise there, who not long before had beene sent thither with three hundred men to guard the Citie. These, together with the light horse of the Towne, did by their frequent incursions, forestall all things from the enemies foragers so long as they remained there. Moreover, the Venetian had diverted the ordinary current of the River Seriola, that if the enemy came to encampe there, hee might want water. Neuerthelesse hee attempted to take Vidaciolla, which Sanfuerino having strongly fortified, and the enemy twice assaulting it, could not be taken. Then Alphonso being loath to loose 20 any longer time, determined to march directly to Verona.

Some say, that the Prince of Mantua, from thence returned home, discontented with Alphonso, for refusing to besiege Lonata and Piscara, which two townes hee specially desired to take from the Venetians. The Senate had beene aduertized of the enemies desire, and therefore sent diuers boats, and a strong Garrison to Piscara to guard the Towne and Lake of La Garda: they had beside commanded the Gallie which lay at Lalisa to bee armed, and brought into the Lake. The charge thereof was committed to Andrea Marcello, who had command of those vessels, till Pietro Diedo was sent thither by the Senate.

The enemy lying still at Calcina, Thomaso of Imola, who commanded the foot 30 forces upon the Po, crossing the River before day, gave a sodayne assault to the suburbs of Stellata, and to the rampires next the Cattle: the Sailers were mingled with the Souldiers. The suburbs were easily taken and burnt. The ordnance and other engines being taken from the enemies rampires were carried to the vessels: this being done, they gave a fierce assault to the Fort: The Souldiers and Mariners vrged with such furie, as in a moment they became masters of part thereof: Then they which were in the highest places craued parley, first of Immola, then of Andrea Zancane, who commanded the vessels, and of set purpose prolonged their parley, expecting some speedie aid from Ferrara, wherein they were not deceived. So soone as newes came to the Citie, that the enemy had taken the bastions, and part of the 40 Fort at Stellata, and that without speedie helpe, they within it would be enforced to yeeld; Hercules on a sodayne taking the light horse with him, and commanding the rest of his forces to follow in order of battell, shewed himselfe vnlooked for to the Venetians, whom hee charged: the Sailers running to the vessels, left the souldiers to the slaughter, who for a while made head, but vpon the arrivall of the rest of the troops, they threw themselves into the water, trusting to their skill in swimming, hoping thereby to get into the vessels, but most of them being carried away by the violent swiftnesse of the torrent, perished, those that escaped drowning were taken prisoners, among whom was Immola, who being but slightly wounded, and dying the night following, was supposed to haue beene poisoned.

Those that lay at the obscure Lake, made incursions as farre as Ferrara, where 50 among other places they spoiled the rich and beautifull Monasterie of the Charreux, burning part thereof. Giovann Hemo Provindator in that Campe having intelligence that the Fort of Stellata was taken, and making himselfe readie to march to the the reliefe of his soldiers, and in ioy of that good news curuetting his horse not well managed, it threw him, of which fall hee died not long after. Giacomo surnamed Media came to the Campe as Provindator in his sted, who by reason of the infectious aire falling sicke was carried backe to Venice, where not long after hee died. Lastly, they sent Francisco Troni thither, a discreet and brave young man, who had no better successe than his fellows.

While this was done on the Po, Alphonso departing from Calcina tooke Carpinetta, thence marching to Calauria, hee crossed the Mincia with part of his forces beneath Valegia, where having well viewed the whole Countrey, hee repassed 10 the River and came to Godia, where againe crossing the Mincia at a bridge, by the Mantuans confines came into the Veronois. Valegia stands vpon an high hill, and vnderneath it runnes the Mincia; the walls fortified with towers extend themselves as farre as the Marshes of Tartar. In this space stands Villafraanca in the midst of a Plaine, strong rather by Art than Nature. The Arragonois breaking down the walls in that place, approached with his armie neere to the Citie, and battering the Cattle, tooke it the third day after his arrivall.

From thence scattering his forces throughout the Veronois, he filled all places with terror, euen to the Cittie walls: Hee likewise sent some of his Captaines to view the strong townes of the Countrey, and without difficulty became Master of 20 Vigatia, the Isle of Elcalla and Sanguineta. Then coming to the River Adice, and being discouered by the Inhabitants of the farther shoare, they terrified, fled, which terror ranne as farre as Padua and Vincenza, the Country people flying to the cities and strong townes. In this alarme the Magistrates of both places assembled forces to oppose the enemies passage over the Adice. Alphonso stayed not long at Villafraanca, ere Sanfuerino coming vp the Lake of Benac encamped neere Valegia, where Marc. Antonio Moresini met him with part of the forces which were at Lonata; at his arrivall Augustino Barbado his Colleague fell sicke, and was carried to Venice.

Alphonso perceiuing the Venetian to be encamped before him, and not able to 30 draw him to the fight, nor yet safely to assaile him, on a sodayne rose and marched into the Bressan, where he besieged Azzola. Some thought that the enemy did not without cause remoue and give out his other designs for that siege, but that he had correspondence with some of the Garrison and Citizens for surrender of the towne. It is certaine, that the towne being afterwards deliuered backe to the Venetians by agreement, some by decree of Senate, who feeling themselves guiltie had remoued their habitation, were absolutely banished, whereby we may perceiue that it was not a publike but priuate surrender. But howsoeuer, the City repented impregnable yielded at the first assault, the Cattle following their example: 40 Sanfuerino after Alphonso's departure recovered all the Townes which hee had taken vpon the Veronois, and leauing Antonio Souranza for the guard of Valegia, hee went into the Bressan, and encamped at Calcina.

While these things were done abroad, the State receiued an ill presage at home. For the Dukes pallace was in part burnt downe by night. It is thought one of the Chappell negligently leauing a candle lighted, the snuffe thereof falling downe kindled the fire, which about the second watch of the night brake forth into a flame: the mischief would haue extended farther, as in former time, had it not bin speedily preuented. Sanfuerino strengthened at Calcina with new supplies, was desirous to pursue the enemy, when contrary to all expectation hee vnderstood the losse of Azzola and the Cattle. This newes bred generall amazement, many expostulating why the Azolans euer fauoured by the Venetians should so betray them? 50 why the Cattle should so distrust it owne strength? That this yeelding proceeded not from feare but treacherie: and that the enemy not vninuided had so confidently entred the Bressan. These rumors passed in the Venetians Campe. But Alphonso deliuering the Towne to the Mantuan, resolved by all meanes to free his brother

Hercules from the siege, from whom he daily receiued letters full of complaint, how that he gained not by the Venetians losse; that his Victories benefited others, not secured his subjects still besieged: That the Venetian Ensignes still braued Ferrara, and possessed the banks of Po: That he thought he treated him in such extremitie not to relinquish his sister Lemora and her children parts of himselfe, and desired him to consider how that he should be able to hold out a winter siege, if the enemy should perseuer and his associates fall from him, (the only thought whereof was terrible) were not he and his whole estate ruined? Therefore he importuned him whilest he had time and means, that he would doe his utmost to remoue the enemy from the Po, and raise the siege ere Winter.

These Letters did not moue but spurre this forward Prince, who sending his infanterie before by the Po to Hostilia, himselfe about midnight followed with the horse by land. Sanseuerino hauing intelligence of the enemies departure, and assuring that his haste tended to the surprisall of the Venetians on the Po, remoued likewise before day, and by great iournies came to Verona with two companies of men at armes, and sent order to the magistrates to prepare all the vessels vpon the Adice, that nothing might retard his desaigne. Francisco Diedo was then Governor of the Citie, the yeare before Ambassador with Pope Sixtus (as hath beene said) and Francisco Marcello Prouost. These spending most part of the day in gathering the boates, and the busines not yet ended, were faine to labour all night, so that vpon 20 Sanseuerines arrivall, the souldiers imbarqued and sailed directly towards the enemy.

The Venetian troupes following after the Generall being come to Piscara, they diuided themselves and tooke sundry waies. Moresini the Prouidator, and Fracasso comming to Verona with certaine companies of horse, followed Sanseuerino to aide him if neede required. Antonio Vittorini who had beene Prouidator at Verona returned to the Campe at Calcina with Deisebo Angulare, and the other part of the armie. The Venetians had the good fortune that those whom Alphonso had sent to Hostilia by the Po, were detained by a south winde. They being wind-bound, Sanseuerino with a more fauourable gale arrived at Castel-Nouo as soone as Alphonso. The enemy amazed with the sodaine noise heard from the Castle, and wondering at so many confused voices, what, and whence those numbers were, at last vnderstanding Sanseuerino to be come, Alphonso brake into these words; O immortal God! doth this olde fellow sit now he can not goe? must the vigour of my youth be outstripped by his decrepitude? and, his journey being greater than mine, must his speed be so too? Then turning to his Captaines and Pilots, he exclaimed against the windes and waters, as confederate against him; and so grinding his teeth, and bewraying much passion, returned frustrate to Hostilia.

Vittorini in the meane time, Deisebo, and Rodolpho Gonzaga departing from Calcina; went to Castagnolles. There they vnderstood that Lodouico Sforza did with great force batter Romagna vpon the Bergamasch. The Venetian crossing the Oglio went to Passafuoles, from whence Thomaso Primiano was sent to Bergamo, and Pietro of Carthage to Martimengo to secure those Townes: But Sforza remaining before Romagna after long siege tooke it. The Venetian Armie comming afterwards to Pontoglio, and from thence, neere to the Oglio, did in short space recover diuers towne lost that Summer.

In the meane time, Sanseuerino and Moresini the Prouidator returning from the Po, ioynd with the Armie: All things succeeding prosperously, Pietro Marcello as Prouidator was left to winter at Valegia, and the Albanian horsemen at Villafraanca vnder the command of Nicolaso Enonio and his brother, two braue young men, and the rest in other places of the Veronois neere to the Mantuan confines, who by their frequent incursions, did all that winter disturbe Mantua and the Territories adiacent. Sanseuerino vniued with Vittorini and Rodolpho Gonzaga, tooke Manerbia and the strong garrison in it: From thence Moresini by the Senates licence returned to to Venice, leauing Vittorini in the Campe. Manerbia taken, the Venetian Generall recovered Valcriota, Scorariola, and to conclude, all townes lost that Summer, but Azola, Quinciana, and Senica: Then, sending the troopes to Garrison, himselfe in mid winter honourably accompanied, went to Venice. Prince Mocerrigo attended by the noblest Senators in the Bucentauro richly hung, went to meet him, and because he had honorably borne himselfe in his place, the State gaue him many rich gifts: they afterwards bestowed vpon him Catadella a towne on the Paduan territory, and Montorio on the Veronois, with a delicate and pleasant place neere to the citie, with a goodly pallace in it: and that his wife might bee a sharer of his good fortune the Senate enriched her with many colly iewels. The like acknowledgement did the Rossians of Parma receiue, who being by Sforza expelled their Countie, were at the same time in Venice, where they were bountifully entertained by the Prince and Senate, promising neuer to forget their good seruice, and for the time present gaue them certaine summes of gold forth of the publicke treasury for the entertainment of their great familie: afterwards assigning a perpetuall annuities of 32000. crownes to the two brethren Guido and Guacemo, and to the third, who had taken holy Orders, a very rich benefice vpon the Veronois.

Whilest these magnificent rewards were giuen at Venice, it fell out after Sanseuerines departure forth of Lombardie, Giuoanni Antonio Scariotta leading six hundred horse to their Garrison at Cremona, by the treacherie of his guides fell into an Ambuscado, in which he lost most of his horse, but himselfe, sonne, and one seruant, made way through the enemies and escaped. Sanseuerino toward the latter end of winter together with Nicolaso Pisaura the Prouidator came to the new Orges where Fracasso lay in garrison; vpon their arrivall, Antonio Vittorini by the Senates permission returned to Venice, so that Pisaura was sole Prouidator in the Armie, till the comming of Luca Pisani, who after Zacharia Barbaro had for a while commanded Breslia. They remained still in the Armie till the end of the warre, and in the meane time wearie of Idleness, made a bridge ouer Oglio, and a Fort at it, which crossing, they tooke the Tower Trislania on the farther side the Riuier, and finding store of corne, victuall and hay, it was a great helpe to them that winter: And because the place seemed of some importance, they sodainly fortified it, placing a strong Garrison there.

The spring already approached when a rumour was spread that the Consultation of the confederate Princes which Aifonso held at Cremona had no prosperous issue, and that they dissented concerning the renouation of the warre. This did put the Venetians in some hope that peace propounded in Flaminia by the Popes Ambassadors, might vpon reasonable termes take effect, and to these ends being solicited, the Senate sent Zacharia Barboza and Frederico Cornaro to Lefenna; where after long consultation, they perceived by the vnust conditions propounded, that this treatie of peace was motioned onely to amuse the Venetians, and to keepe them from pursuing that which they had begonne the yeere before in France and Germanie.

The Venetians the precedent summer, careful of the issue of that warre, and incensed against Pope Sixtus had sent Ambassadors to the French Armie and Germane Princes to incite them to summon the Pope and all Christendome to a generall Councell, wherein it might be lawfull to complaine of the Pope, and to implore the aide of all Christians against him; and to this end they sent Sebastiano Badorio to the Emperour Frederick, Antonio Lauretano to the French king, Paulo Pisani to the Duke of Austria, and Nicolaso Foscari into Flaunders to Maximilian, the Emperour Fredericks sonne.

The Pope fearing this matter, was desirous to hearken vnto peace. The Venetians in the meane time, though they intended peace, did not omit their warlike preparations against the Spring: for besides the Italian forces which by new supplies were mightily encreased by sea and land, they drew from Morea and the Islands

Islands next adjacent to Corfou, from Albania, and Dalmatia, twelve hundred horse, one part of these were quartered in the villages neere to the enemy, from whence they daily made roads into his Country, and the rest vpon the Bressan.

The Spring was already past when Sanseuerino sent commaundement to all the Garrisons, to meet him on the 27. of May, betwixt Variola and Cortiana. But whilst this was done on the Bressan, the failers of Diede his Galley, and foure other Gallies of Marcello's Fleet mutined. The Authours of the mutinie were secretly punished by the commaundement of Tomaso Zeno Generall of the Fleet on the Po: which the other Mariners hauing notice of, went with their Gallie to the enemies side, who lay neere to Philocina, but they were by him basely stript, spoiled and sent away. The Senate vpon these newes proclaimed them traitors; and that they might serue as an example to others, banished them from their territories, with this addition, That if any of them were euer afterwards taken in the Venetian iurisdiction, they should be put to death as Capitall offenders.

The arrogant brag of Porco.

At the same time that this Galley was lost, Captaine Porco, a great enemy to the Venetians, made daily incursions from Hostilio euen to the trenches of Mellaria, and among other brauadoes against the Venetians, hee did by oath protest vnto Gio:anni Canalis (at that time Governour of the Castle) that within few dayes he would come knocke a naile into the gates of Mellaria. This bragge cost him deere; for being taken and brought before Canalis, the Venetian said to him; Thou arrogant and vaine-glorious fellow, performe thy insolent promise: and seeing as victorious thou canst not performe this bragge, at least as a captiue; And because thou shalt not be forsworne, take this naile and hammer: (which he deliuered to him.) This being done, he presently sent him to Venice to be executed.

The Venetians besiege Gallipolis.

Marcello, Generall of the Venetian Fleet, toward the latter end of the Spring left Corfou, and went to besiege Gallipolis. This citie is like an Island, and seated in that part of Calabria aduancing towards the Ionian sea, confining vpon it and the Adriatick. Plinie saith, That in time past it did belong to the Gauls, which is not vnlikelie to be true in regard of the name. The Nauall Armie consisted of 56. vessels, among which were 16. Gallies, and five shippes of burthen. The Venetian before he would assault the Citie, summoned it to know if they would voluntarily yeeld, but seeing that labour was vaine, he drew his vessels neere the shoare, and landed part of his souldiers to assault it by land, and on the water from his Fleet annoyed the enemy so, as on both sides a cruell fight beganne. Marcello from his Admirall Galley encouraged his soldiers, willing them brauely to mount the Rampiers; the soldiers obeyed and desperately ranne through the midst of the enemies shot. Dominico Delfino, Lodouico Garzone, Constantino Lauretano, Tomaso Diede, and many other Captaines of Gallies, did brauely acquite themselves at the assault: And the Venetians had already, not without great slaughter, reared ladders against the wals, on which some were mounted, when Marcello from the poope of his Admirall Galley, encouraging by name the soldiers and Captaines, approuing the valliant, and condemning cowards, executing all offices of a skilfull Captaine and Generall, being shot with a bullet, presently fell downe dead. Sagidino the Secretarie saw him fall, and couered him with a cloake, and after that he had conueyed the bodie into his Cabin, encouraged his COUNTRYMEN to pursue the victorie, telling them that the Generall was slightly hurt, and gone to be drest, willing them, in the meane time, to let the enemy see that they could fight valliantly without a Commander, and in recompence of their valour, the Cities sacke was theirs, it being once taken.

The death of Generall Marcello.

Dominico Maripietro Captaine of the shippes of burthen, so encouraged his soldiers, as in despite of the enemy they mounted the walles. At last the victorious Venetian entered the Citie, not yet knowing their Generall was dead. Every street was filled with slaughter and spoile. Commaundement was giuen not to rauish women or spoile Churches. The Citizens threw downe their armes and cryed for mercy: all places echoed the cries and lamentations of women and children. The noble Venetian presently grew passionate, and pitied their distresse, by sound of Trumpet commanding his Souldiers and Mariners to abstaine from spoile and slaughter. Gallipolis taken, the command of the fleet was by a Generall consent committed to Maripietro, till such time as the Senate should prouide a new Generall. The victorious Venetians did forthwith fortifie the Citie, and made it a safe retreat for their forces.

In the meane time Nerita a Citie of the Salentines Radisca and many other neighbour townes daunted with the disaster of the Gallipolitans, voluntarily yeelded. Marcello's death reported at Venice, did somewhat fower the sweetnesse of the victorie. The Citie neuertheless reioiced, because that by the taking of Gallipolis, a means was offered them at their pleasures to any king Ferdinand their enemy, whose pride was no whit daunted, notwithstanding that he saw the Venetians make incursions into the verie bowels of his Kingdome; yet that turbulent spirit of his when it perceived his country entangled in a difficult and tedious warre inclined to peace.

His sonne Alphonso who lay on the Crémone, hauing intelligence by spies that the Venetians coming from their Garrisons, were with a mightie Armie encamped at Varioles, did with his troups (which were farre inferior to the Venetians) march to Quintiana, where fortifying himselfe, his Armie by supplies from the confederates, did daily encrease. Sanseuerino in the meane time, because he would not be idle, thought it fit, that Nicolas Pisano the Prouidator, and his sonne Francisco should with certaine troups of horse make incursions into the enemies country: These hauing at a bridge crossed the Oglio, did on a sodaine surprize Calce, and other townes of small importance, some of which they fortified, and razed the rest.

The Venetians take Calice.

The enemy being not farre off, lay still and would not remoue, so as all that harvest there was no other memorable exploit done. In the end, after that Alphonso had assembled all the confederate forces consisting of fixe score companies of men at Armes, with an infanterie to their Cauallerie, he marched against the new Orges. Sanseuerino though he were inferior to him in number of horse, yet being his superiour in foot forces, went to the old Orges, supposing that the enemy would come thither. Nicolas Trevisano Governour of Bressia, accompanied Sanseuerino with a gallant troupe to the new Orges.

Alphonso in the meane time being come to Metella, enforced the townsmen to yeeld, together with some other places of meane importance: From thence he went and seized on Varioles and Scorsialles, and then continued at Baignolles: But the Venetian who still followed him, seeking for a fit occasion to giue him battle, went from Macclodia to Torbolles, and from thence not long after encamped at S. Zenes betwixt Bressia and the enemies campe. There peace was motioned with more likelihood of good successe, than before at Celsenna, and as it had a better beginning, so was the end more prosperous. For the Captaines (which seldome happens) who were wont to abhorre the name of peace, became Authours and Vmpires thereof.

A motion of peace.

Sanseuerino on the one side, and Lodouico Sforza on the other, after sundrie messages from both parts vnderooke this treatie so much desired, not onely in Lombardie, where warre was hote, but ouer all Italy.

During this treatie of peace, or not long before, the Venetians received a great overthrow neere to Ferrara. Certaine foot-companies of the Garrison of the obscure lake had made incursions to the verie gates of Ferrara, seeking to draw forth the enemy into some Ambuscado: but the Ferrarois still contained themselves within their walles till the Venetians retired towards their campe; for then they sent certaine troups of horse against them, who skirmished with them as farre as the Parke corner which confrontes Cassago, where the Venetians in disorder were put to rout, diuers were there slaine, and many wounded: but the number of prisoners was verie great, who (according to the manner of the Italian warre) being stript, were dismissed. Troni Prouidator at that time of the obscure lake, falling sicke, and being carried to Venice, died there.

Peace concluded with the Venetians.

Conditions of peace.

Peace (as hath beene said) being motioned by the Capitaines did then take effect, on these conditions: That the Venetians should reenter Asola Romania, and all other townes lost during that warre of Lombardie: That they should withdraw all their Garrisons on this side, & beyond the Po; raze all the Forts built vpon the riuer banks; and should surrender to Hercules whatsoever they had taken from him: the Pollesin of Rouigo excepted, which themselves retained; and should enioy the same liberties old and new as they were wont to haue in Ferrara, and places neere adioyning: That Sanseuerino should still continue in the Venetians pay, and yet should be General to all the Princes and States of Italy.

Venetians spent in this warre.

Such was the end of the confederate warre of all Italy against the Venetians, the greatnesse of whose preparations may be imagined by this: That in two yeares space or little more whilest this warre lasted, they spent three millions and 600000. Ducates. The Venetians of a long time had not so willingly entertained peace. In all Townes and Castles ouer their dominions, bonfires were made in signe of ioy.

Besides, triumphes, turnaments, and fight at barriers, were proclaimed which should continue certaine daies. The rewards propounded to the combatants were two peeces, the one of cloth of gold, and the other of siluer. Great multitudes of people came from all parts to behold those shewes. Hercules de Este, and Julio Count of Camerin were present at them, whom the Prince and Senate went to meete. Leon, sonne to Lodouico Sforza, and Galeas Sanseuerino came from Milan to Venice. Old Sanseuerino chose rather to be a dealer in the triumphes than a spectator. The Rosians of Parma, and the Prince of Mirandula came thither likewise, with many other great Lords, some to fight, others to looke on. The market-place of S. Marke as farre as S. Geminians Church was to this end sumptuously adorned. The combatants preparations were magnificent: Three of Sanseuerins sonnes, who sundrie times made shewes a-part, caused fife and twentie braue coursers to be richly trapt with gold and purple: The Rosians of Parma shewes were in a manner like this: But that of Count Camerins nephew, sonne to his brother, was accounted more sumptuous than all the rest. More than an hundred thousand persons beheld these triumphs.

Prince Mocenigo accompanied with the Senate and Citie Magistrates had a place prepared for them. These turnaments lasted certaine daies. In the end, the honour of the triumph was adiudged to Sanseuerins sonnes, as they that had best deserued it, Fracasso and Antonio Maria diuided the cloth of gold betwixt themselves, and Galeas alone had that of siluer. Count Camerins nephew, who in all mens iudgements had done brauely, refused three hundred crownes, which the State would haue giuen him. Some thought he did it in disdain, because others were preferred before him. Mariotto, a younger brother of the Rosians of Parma, doing more at barriers than his yeares promised, was rewarded with a horse richly barded. Many others were recompenced according to their merit, many were likewise knighted. Julio Count of Camerin was made General of the Venetian troupes, seeing Sanseuerino commanded those of all Italy.

That part of the Dukes Pallace which was burnt during the warre, was from the foundation reedified this first yeere of the peace: It is an admirable peece of worke, and likely to last long. The Citie was greatly molested with the Infection the next Summer, which increasing in Autumne, did make Venice very desolate. This domestick losse was accompanied toward the end of Summer with an other farre from home. But before wee enter into this Discourse, it shall not bee impertinent to mention the Venetians great industrie, & wealth, purchased by traffike at sea.

The Dukes palace is reedified

A great plague at Venice.

There is no place in all the Sea from Gades, betwixt Affricke and Europe, towards Syria and Egypt in the Leuant; nor from the North and West towards Bosphorus and the Fennes Meotides; nor any place so remote, which the Venetian Gallies haue not at all times frequented in trade of Merchandize. It is almost incredible to thinke how the Venetian vessels doe ordinarily enter into the Hauens, not onely of Italic, but of Liburnia, Dalmatia, Macedonia and Greece, as if it were in the suburbs of Venice. Wee will speake of those, who at the Common-wealths charge are yearly sent to take in lading in the remotest places of the world.

Of these, foure great galleies bring home into Italie, Spice, Silke, Pretious stones, and Pearles from Syria and Egypt. Three others goe into Lybia, for gold, jewells, and slaues. Two saile into Fraunce and bring home wooll and Spanish silke. Others goe towards the Tana is, and Fennes Meotides, from whence they returne laden with Tapistrie and Emeraldes. And besides this number, foure direct theyr course into the French Ocean, and from the Martes there, loadeth themselves abundantly with woolls, gold, tapistrie, and cloth of Flaunders.

According to this custome foure Gallies for this purpose were abroad vnder the commaund of Bartolomeo Minio, who coming into the Spanish Seas, mette with young Columbus, (nephew to Columbus the famous Mariner) who with fifteen tall shippes of warre incountered them in the night neere to the sacred Promontorie, modernely termed S. Vincents Cape. But although at first hee determined to assault the Venetian Gallies, yet hee abstained that night, and resolving to fight with them, came so neere, as the prowes of the pirates shippes were afterne the poopees of the Venetian Gallies. So soone as it was day Columbus assailed the Venetians, who were inferior to him in men and vessels, but superior in courage and resolution. They fought fiercely for certaine houres space, and with such great slaughter as is seldom seen in any fight with such enemies, who rarely come to fight but vpon constraint. Diuerse that were present at the bickering lay, that three hundred Venetians were slaine at that fight: others mention not so many. Among the dead were Lorenzo Michael Captaine of a Gallie, and Giouanni Delfino brother to another Captaine. The Venetians were wearied with long fight. The Gallie Delfina was taken by the enemies, whereupon the rest yielded. Some say, that in one Gallie foure score dead bodies lay betwixt the prow and poope, which spectacle the victorious enemy lamented, saying in despite, That the Venetians by their wilfulness had procured that losse. The dead bodies were throwne into the Sea, and the wounded set on shoare. Those which escaped went to Lisbon, and from thence were sent home.

Lisbon is a Citie of Portugall standing vpon the Sea, I thinke it was in old time called Olisipone. It is at this day very famous, as well for the ordinarie residence of kings, as for her great wealth. The Venetians were there very kindly entertained by the king, and those that were sicke he commaunded to be carefully looked to, the rest, according to each mans qualitie, receiued mony and cloaths, and were sent home into their country.

The Venetians are in ancient league with the kings of Portugall, the which being deriued from the Father to the Sonne, they inuolubly obserue. They say, that the cause of this league and friendship proceeded from the Venetians courtlie and liberalitie. It is reported, That a king of Portugall came in time past with a small traine to Venice to see the Citie, where he remained certaine daies in disguised habite. But so great a guest could not long be concealed: For the Senate hauing intelligence, that a Noble man of royall parentage lay in the Citie, it did honourably receiue and conducted him to a goodly Pallace, where he lodged, being accompanied by certaine Senators to shew him the singularities of the Citie, and to wait vpon him whither soeuer hee went: At his departure they gaue him rich giftes, and for his greater honor appointed some to attend him as farre as the Venetians confines. This did the Venetians, not (as they thought) to a king but only to a priuate person of blood royall. At his returne into Portugall hee acquainted his Princes with the Venetians curtesie and liberalitie; and made a Decree, That his successors should for euer acknowledge the Venetians bounty towards him. And for this cause the king of Portugall gaue such good entertainment to the distressed Venetians:

ans: he did likewise commaund that none of his subiects should buy any part of the Venetians goods which had bene stolen from them. The newes of this losse did greatly afflict the Citie, the which exceeding (as it was reported) the summe of 20000. crownes, touched some particular persons: But the death of so many men did much augment their sorrow. The pestilence at this time did greatly infect the Citie, in regard whereof, the Senate was of opinion at that time not to reuenge that wrong, but to deferre it to a fitter time.

At the same time there arose some troubles in Friulli. Certaine light horse, sent by the King of Hungarie (as it was afterwards knowne) made sodaine incursions vpon the very confines of Italy, to surprize Porto-nouo, a towne vpon the Riuier Lizonza. The Hungarians made a stay vpon the Thyrtyfines territorie. But the Senate, though it certainly knew that the same King made warre still vpon Frederick, and that those troupes were expressly sent into Italy to surprize Porto-nouo and Tryeste, which Frederick yet held; yet because they were not well assured of the Kings intention, they forthwith sent certaine troopes of horse which lay in Garrison betwixt Verona and Padua, to the Carnons territories. But the Hungarians passing quietly through the territorie of Vdina, and frustrate of their hope to take the Citie, which the Bandetti had assured them of, left Italy, and returned without any farther attempt.

The better part of Haruest was alreadie spent, when Roberto Sanseuerino (who notwithstanding the peace in Lombardie still remained in the Venetians pay) earnestly solicited by Letters from Pope Innocent who succeeded Sixtus, went without the Senates consent or knowledge (who were then at peace by sea and land) with his sonnes Fraunce and Galeas and two and thirtie companies of horse, first into Faminia, and afterwards to Rome in the midst of winter: but hee arriued somewhat before his forces; for the Pope being pressed by Alphonso, hastened his coming.

The cause of this warre proceeded from the commotions of the Volaterrans, and rebellion of certaine Princes, who by a sodaine conspiracie, reuolted from Ferdinand, retiring to Pope Innocent, requesting his aide against that King. The Pope finding them not onely worthie to be protected by his authoritie, but likewise to be freed from all wrong by the forces of the Church of Rome, it fell out that Virginio Vrsino, who (as we haue elsewhere said) besides sundry townes which hee possist neere Rome on this side, and beyond Tiber, had likewise diuers others in the Marshes as farre as the lake Fuscino in the confines of the Realme of Naples, remained still loyal to the King. At first he resolved (as it is reported) not wholly to abandon the King, nor likewise in any sort to take Armes against the Pope, but together with Ferdinand defending the Realmes frontiers, following his Ancestors steps, to make no attempt neere Rome. In this manner he remained, as it were, neuter amidst these new garboiles of warre, when after Sanseuerins arriual, by the perswasion (as it was thought) of some chiefe Commanders of the contrarie faction, the Pallace of the Vrsino vpon Mount Iordano, (which is the name of some part of the Citie) was sodainly by the soldiers spoiled and burnt: whereat Virginio being incensed, did presently declare himselfe together with the other Lords of that familie, an enemy to the Pope. Alfonso strengthened by this mans power, and hauing seized on certaine bridges neere Rome, began after Sanseuerins arriual, to waite and spoile all places round about the Citie. We onely mention this to acquaint the reader with the cause of the warre betwixt the Pope and King Ferdinand.

Now while these things were done neere Rome, Prince Moerigo died the seventh yeere of his Gouvernement.

Sanseuerino
aideth Pope Innocent,

Marco Barbadico, a Senator of great wisdom and authority, was by a generall consent chosen Prince in his stead. This man (the Commonwealth being quiet at home and abroad) repaired the Ducall Pallace begunne a while before, with such expedition, as in a few months whilst he remained Prince all that part thereof towards the East was with stately Architecture almost finished. The cold weather nothing abating the furie of the Pestilence, it did greatly afflict the Citie. Therefore three Senators were appointed, who had ample commission to doe whatsoever they should finde necessarie, to free it from that calamitie. These men, that they might the sooner take away the cause of the sicknesse, in an open place for the purpose caused a great quantitie of infectious apparell which the couctous graue-makers had layed vp together, to bee burned in one fire. And because great numbers of people did furcharge the Citie, they sent a great part of the vulgar to inhabit elsewhere. At the same time the great Chanell, opposite to the great market-place, was clenfed, the which by a decree of Senate, though it were of great extent, was in all places scoured. They sent certaine foote companies (according to their vsuall manner) into Cyprus for to guard the Island.

In the meane time, warre betwixt the Pope and the Vrsini (who as hath beene said, shewed themselves openly for Ferdinand) brake forth into great flames, after the arrivall of *Sanfuerino*s forces. For Pontenomentana being recovered, which they had taken, and Fracasso, sonne to old Sanfuerino almost slaine with a bullet, the whole burthen of the warre fell on Paulo Vrsino, and other of *Virginio*s kinsmen. For Nomentana being taken by force, was sackt and ruined. Sanfuerino marched towards Monterotonda, when Cardinall Baptista Vrsino came to the Pope, and assured him that himselfe and friends would be obedient to the holie Sea, by means whereof there were none other attempts made nere Rome.

*Virginio*s troopes of horse did in the meane time waste the Roman territorie, till *Alphonso*s returne from Tufcanie, where according to their agreement they received a braue caullery from the Florentines and Milanefes, with which they made so towards Rome: Sanfuerino with farre fewer number went to encounter him nere Flisco; there in skirmish the enimie lost certaine horse; but this notwithstanding, Alphonso presuming on his owne strength did in despite of Sanfuerino make furious incurfions vpon the Romanefca.

The Pope who till then had constantly maintained this great warre, though he alreadie before resolved (as some say) to craue aide from France, having sent for Renatus Duke of Lorraine to come into Italy against Ferdinand; and had likewise by his Nuncio Nicolas Fracasso elect Bishop of Treviso, requested the Venetians to associate him in that warre, yet because supplies from France are accounted farre off, and tedious, and that the Venetians in respect of their league sworne in Lombardie at the finishing of the Ferrarois warre, with Lodovico Sforza, Alphonso and the Florentines, would not take Armes; having thereby lost all hope of aide from any other place, and fearing to precipitate the State of Rome into greater dangers, he did willingly incline to peace which the enimie offered him on honourable termes. For though he was a great Protector of the papall dignitie, yet he loved peace and quietnesse, in concluding whereof, he did as much as in him lay, procure the wealth and advancement of the Church of Rome, together with that of his friends and confederates.

Sanfuerino presently after peace was made, being casheerd, and resolving to carrie backe his troups of horse into Lombardie, did by letters and expresse messengers craue leaue of the Senate to retire with two thousand horse into some towne belonging to their territories: But his demand not granted, himselfe destitute of all counsell, as a man forsaken, having no safe place of retreat, and Alphonso still at his backe, who had followed him into Flaminia, was enforced to leaue his Cavallerie to his enimie, and himselfe with a few followers to make a speedier retreat into the frontiers of Rauenna.

Such was the end of Sanfuerino and his sonnes renowned journey from Lombardie to the warre of Rome, which we haue not so much mentioned for himselfe, as to let the world vnderstand the Venetians great constancie and loyalty. For although an occasion was offered to ruine king Ferdinand intangled in a domestick war, or at least mightily to endanger him if they would haue embraced those offers, promises and conditions, yet because they would in no sort violate the treatie of peace which they had once sworne to, they stopp their eares to these motions. Now whilst these things were done nere Rome, newes was brought from France, that Maximilian sonne to the Emperour Fredrick was chosen King of the Romanes, a name verie hatefull to the Citie of Rome, taking it original in the daies of that Charles who ouerthrew the Lombards greatnesse in Italy. For many Historians affirme, That he did afterwards make his sonne Pipin, King of Italy, himselfe being Emperour: and by this meanes it came to passe in time, that he is not only called king of Italy, but of Romans, which enioyeth the same dignitie and greatnesse like him.

Maximilian had married the daughter and heire of Charles Duke of Burgondie, who died in the war against the Swisses, and by this marriage purchasing great and ample Signories, being young, valiant and apt either for warre or peace, had after some new troubles and difficult menaces of warre; enforced that stirring nation to obey his commandement: Himselfe and Fredrick his father, acquainted the Venetians, (as their great friends) with this new election. Dominico Trevisano, and Hiermolao Barbaro were sent Ambassadors to them both, with commission in the States name to congratulate that royall election: They were both knighted. Another Ambassador was likewise sent into Portugall, to thanke that king from the Prince and Senate, for that not long before he had relieved and assisted the Venetians, who by Pyrates had beene robbed and spoiled and set on shore in his countrey. Ieronimo Dantas a verie excellent Philosopher was appointed to goe thither. Toward the Spring, the sicknesse lessened, and before Summer ended, so it wholly ceased, so as of a long time before, the Citie was not seene more healthfull. This prosperitie was accompanied by another, proceeding from Prince *Barbadico*s care and diligence, which was, great plentie and abundance of all things, for such store of corne, wine, oyle, and all sorts of meate was brought to the Citie, as in the memorie of man the like had not bene seene. This ioy was likewise seconded
